There is one other direct credibility resolution called for by the conflicting testimony that is best resolved now, because it goes to the heart of one of the two 8(a)(3) violations alleged in the complaint. On 11 July John Wagnon, whose starting time was 6 a.m., telephoned in about 6:30 to say he could not come to work that day. He spoke to Lawrence Loveland, his supervisor. He told Loveland that during the night and later in the morning his wife had been very sick, had bled badly, had been taken to the hospital, and suffered a miscarriage. He added that hospital doctors had advised him to take her to see her personal physician quickly, and that therefore he could not come to work that day. Loveland's answer, as Wagnon recalled, was "[W]ell, I hope she is okay, and here is my home phone number, my phone number." Wagnon said, at the hearing, he did not understand why Loveland gave him his personal phone number; but he took the general conversation as acceptance of his excuse for not working that day.

When Wagnon next reported for work, on 14 July, he was fired after some talking with supervisors. There, Loveland took the position, which he repeated at the hearing, that he had not given Wagnon permission to take the day off. Three weeks earlier, on 20 June, Wagnon had been given a written warning for too many latenesses and absences, with explicit wording that the next offense would mean a 3-day suspension without pay. That warning was issued and signed by Loveland. On 25 June Wagnon was penalized for excessive absences and tardiness by suffering 3 days' suspension without pay. And again the formal punishment notice issued was signed by Loveland. Without question Loveland knew, on 11 July, that one more full absence by Wagnon meant discharge. If Loveland's thinking at the time of Wagnon's 6:30 a.m. call was that the man must be discharged outright, and never mind his family responsibility and his wife's critical condition of the moment, would he have so graciously asked to be kept informed of the lady's dangerous condition? In an office memo he wrote later—the same day— "I gave him my home phone number and asked him to call me if anything serious developed." No man asks another to lean on him in moments of stress if at the same time he intends to destroy the other. Loveland's state of mind—correctly understood by Wagnon then—was that the employee could take the day off with full permission. Later, on thinking it over, with management agents helping him decide, it was deemed a good cover to get rid of the prounion man. Loveland's statement at the hearing that he did not intend to excuse the man's 1-day absence—absences that have time and again been excused, as this record amply shows—was just not true. This credibility finding verges as much on intent as on fact, but it is compelled by human experience no less. A supervisor does not tell a subordinate who he knows is going to be discharged to stay in touch with him.

There were other unfair labor practices committed that shed light on the two discharges to be considered. Early in June Supervisor Williams asked Zais "if I knew about a union trying to come in the warehouse." When Zais answered that she did not, Williams continued, still as Zais recalled, by saying "she heard that the union was trying to come in and that Coyote was trying to start one." (Coyote is a nickname by which John Wagnon was known.) Zais also testified that on 27 June Williams again talked about the Union to her, this time in the presence of several other employees. "Linda told us the union was trying to come into the warehouse, and if it did that we would probably close down, that Wards would not have two union locations, such as Baltimore and us, that close together, and that they would combine us in an area inbetween the two of us. . . . She said that our jobs would be questionable, whether we would have a job or not." Zais' testimony about that 27 June talk with Williams was corroborated by Menage, who was also present. "She said that if we went union, the plant would close down. The warehouse would close down. . . . She said because they wouldn't have two unions so close together in Baltimore as a union, too, and they would close us down and get a different warehouse." Late that same week Williams again asked Menage what she thought about the Union.

Zais was also questioned by James Schmidt, one of the highest officials at this location of the Respondent. In the 3 years Zais worked there as a clerk, Schmidt had never once spoken to her. Zais said he came into her office and just sat down to chat with her:

> He introduced himself, and he asked me what I thought about the meeting the day before with Mr. Cato, the vice-president, and we discussed the meeting, and he said that he heard that the union was trying to come in the warehouse, and he did not want that. He asked me what I thought about it, and I said, well, I had never really thought that much. It was kind of personal.
> And Mr. Schmidt said that I was a good worker, that he would like to keep me, and he said that he was going to talk to Mr. Thompson later, and he kiddingly said I'm going to ask you what he thinks about you, and I said, well, he's going to tell you that I was a good worker.

Williams denied all the testimony by Zais and Menage about all that union talk. Schmidt did not appear as a witness. Of course I credit Zais, as well as Menage. The uncontradicted testimony about Schmidt's intimidating talk with Zais serves perfectly to prove it was a policy of the Respondent at that point to further its antiunion campaign by resorting to intimidating tactics. When a top official of so large a company chats amicably with a simple clerk, asks does she agree with the company's position that the union is a bad thing, and, when she equivocates, tells her he is going to see that she advances in the company, the threat of discrimination should she choose to favor the union could not be clearer. Williams was simply following the pattern set by her superiors.

I find that by interrogating employees about their union sentiments, and by telling them that their place of work would be closed by the Employer if they should favor the Union, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

One other incident merits little comment. Robert Kemp, a receiving clerk, testified that on 21 June Cardemon, already mentioned above, talked to him at work: "Mike [Cardemon] asked me how the union was going. I said, 'You scared everybody off, man' I said 'I don't think we're going to have it,' like that. He said, 'Before we get the union here, we'll close the warehouse completely down.' He said, 'We'll close down and move to the Laurel somewhere.'" Cardemon denied having so spoken to Kemp. I do not credit him. Not only does he stand discredited, as explained above, but his threat to this employee is in complete accord with the conduct, undenied, of a supervisor of his superior—Schmidt. In keeping with the Respondent's policy, this was but another violation of the statute, and I so find.

Wagnon

This man, a merchandise handler, was the principal activist in the union movement. He contacted the Teamsters in late May and, after talking it up with 15 or 20 other employees, he arranged a union meeting for 19 June, when six or seven men signed union cards. The very next day he was given a "corrective notice," another phrase for a warning, based on his earlier tardiness and absences. His last offense—a late arrival—had occurred 15 days earlier. Beginning that same day Wagnon started obtaining signatures to union cards in the plant, getting 10 to 15 the first day. He put union stickers on his car, usually parked in the company lot, distributed stickers to other employees, wore a Teamsters Union button at work, gave out many pamphlets to others, and did all this in the break room and lunchroom on the company premises.

On 24 June he was given a 3-day suspension without pay for having been absent the day before. His position was then, and as he repeated at the hearing, that Loveland, his immediate supervisor, had given him permission in advance of that absence. The supervisor denied that. During his 3 days off, Wagnon continued his open activities on behalf of the Union in front of the plant—giving out his literature to the employees as they came and went. When he returned to work, after losing 3 days, again he talked the Union up during lunch and break periods, giving out leaflets again to others. Normally, supervisors come and go in the break room also.

On 11 July came the incident in which Wagnon called in early in the morning to tell Loveland he could not come in because of his wife's critical illness, and when Loveland asked him to keep the supervisor informed concerning the wife's progress or increasing danger.

On his next workday, Monday, 14 July, when Wagnon arrived on time, at 6 a.m., he spoke to Loveland and showed the medical certificates dated 11 July about his wife's illness. He did not want Loveland to think he had made up the story. Loveland's response was "I hope she's fine, you know, I hope she's okay." Less than a half hour later— about 6:30—Wagnon was called to the office and discharged. Loveland stated clearly at the hearing that he was involved in that decision, as well as the earlier criticisms and penalty imposed on Wagnon.

Considering all the related factors, I find that the Respondent suspended Wagnon for 3 days, and then discharged him, because of his union activity. That the Respondent was opposed to his union movement, even to the extent of committing a great number of very marked violations of the statute, could not be clearer. The intent to stop the union campaign regardless of legality is shown again and again in this record. Wagnon was the most active of the employees. The Company may not have known that it was he who started the ball rolling, but there can be no doubt it very soon learned he was the most active of all the employees. Since Loveland expressed concern about Wagnon's wife's dangerous condition, as he said to the man during the critical conversation on 11 July, if he in fact believed that day's absence was going to cost the man his job, the least he would have done was tell him he had better come to work. He did not. This means one thing and one thing only. After thinking it over, and after consulting with the other managers of the location who had been doing their share in the Company's program, he, together with his colleagues, decided it was a good pretext case—i.e., fire the man to stop union activities and make it appear the objective was to enforce a company rule.

That the supervisors, or managers, have discretion in deciding whether a lateness, or an absence, is to be excused was shown again and again on this record. Even the supervisors admitted as much. Tedschi, the superior who, as Wagnon testified, told him on 24 June he could have the day off to get his children enrolled in school, said the situation for permitting latenesses or absences required "extenuating circumstances."

On 20 June, the very day of the union meeting that Custer watched for 3-1/2 hours, Wagnon got his first warning notice. By that time his record showed 12 occurrences—that is, violations. The rule, as written, calls for warnings after only six "occurrences." His last violation occurred on 5 June. Why did the Respondent wait so long before issuing the intimidating document? The supervisor's explanation that they were too busy means nothing to me in these circumstances. Wagnon's next criticism came on 25 June. He said he had talked to Loveland twice about his obligation to take 24 June off from work. Tedschi, also told by Wagnon of his problem, marked the man's timecard that day as okay for the absence. Later, he changed it; the card, received in evidence, shows clearly it was doctored after the event. At the hearing Tedschi testified he changed it later because Loveland told him he could not recall having given permission. Loveland contradicted him at the hearing, saying he did not tell Tedschi he could "not recall" giving permission. The only explanation must be that the supervisors decided, again after the event, to change their stories in order to cover their ulterior motive. The facts must all be taken together. This was the very day—25 June—when Cato came to Landover from Chicago to solicit grievances and to promise to satisfy the employees' demands to coerce them into giving up the union idea. I find that, by suspending Wagnon for 3 days and by discharging him on 14 July 1986, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

Finally, the record shows many other employees who were excused for absences for many reasons. There was no objective reason for treating Wagnon differently than all the others. If ever there was a case of extraordinary circumstance, this was one of them. See Associated Milk Producers, 259 NLRB 1033, 1035 (1982).

John Douglass

The case of John Douglass starts with the fact that to me the reason now advanced by the Respondent for having discharged him is unbelievable, and therefore false. He was a very active unioneer; the Company without question was opposed to the Union, even to the extent of committing calculated unfair labor practices; the discharge came at the very moment after the first regular union meeting was held by the employees, where Douglass was seen and reported by his supervisor. See Shattuck Denn Mining Corp v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 466, 470 (9th Cir. 1966):

> Actual motive, a state of mind, being the question, it is seldom that direct evidence will be available that is not also self-serving. In such cases, the self-serving declaration is not conclusive; the trier of fact may infer motive from the total circumstances proved. Otherwise no person accused of unlawful motive who took the stand and testified to a lawful motive could be brought to book. Nor is the trier of fact—here the trial examiner—required to be anymore naif than is a judge. If he finds that the stated motive for a discharge is false, he certainly can infer that there is another motive. More than that, he can infer that the motive is one that the employer desires to conceal—an unlawful motive—at least where, as in this case, the surrounding facts tend to reinforce that inference.

Douglass worked 12 years for this Company and not once did the Respondent find fault with him or his performance. It will be enough to quote from the testimony of his supervisor, Custer:

> He worked there for about 12 years when this happened, is that correct?
> A. Yes.
> Q. And he was a pretty good employee?
> A. Yes, sir.
> Q. He never missed time from work?
> A. Not much, no.
> Q. Ever late to work?
> A. I don't think so . . . .
> Q. . . . Did you ever notice a problem with his coming late to work?
> A. No, sir.
> Q. Did he get along with the other employees?
> A. Yes, sir.
> Q. Was he good at fixing—what kind of stuff did he fix.
> A. Major appliances. Refrigeration mainly.
> Q. Did he do that good?
> A. Yes, sir.
> Q. Did customers call up and say he came and fixed my refrigerator but it still isn't fixed?
> A. It happens to everybody.
> Q. Often?
> A. Here and there, yes.
> Q. Well how about compared to other employes? Did they call up more or less frequently for John Douglass?

A. Probably less frequently.

Accordingly, the picture shows a perfectly desirable employee fired without notice or warning in advance. A man named Hoffman also worked under Supervisor Custer but was not authorized to take his company van to his house at night. One day he did that, against the rules, because he was using the van "for personal reasons." He had an accident in front of his house. Hoffman was neither fired nor disciplined for such personal use of the company van. At the hearing Custer said he did not know of any difference between the Hoffman incident and that of Douglass.

Logan was a field technician like Douglass, also taking his van home at night. One day Minasi, the company supervisor over Custer who later participated directly in Douglass' discharge, went to Logan's home looking for a certain company tool that was needed. But the van was not there. It was Logan's day off from work, and the van was not to be used for "personal use." Minasi learned that Logan had driven the van away somewhere. Logan did not testify and Minasi tried to explain the incident on the ground that Logan later told him—Minasi—that he had taken the truck somewhere to have it cleaned. This hearsay evidence will not do to explain away the further admission by the supervisor that inside Logan's van that day he saw a barbecue pit, admittedly not a company tool. Like Hoffman, Logan also went off scot free—with neither punishment nor criticism.

That Douglass was treated differently from his coworkers is clear. All Douglass did on 19 June was to stop on the direct route home from his last assignment and have dinner. There is much evidence in this record that employees did that at times, without criticism. The only difference in Douglass' case is that he stayed at the same location much longer to attend the union meeting. But insofar as the Company's interests in the man was concerned, this made no difference; the van was never moved from near the restaurant.

A look at the Company's discharge records involving Douglass serves to strengthen the finding that its now advance reason is false. Again and again the management people repeated the reason for discharge was personal use of the van, precisely quoting its written rule. One document—labeled corrective action notice—signed by Custer and a higher supervisor, says the reason was "unauthorized use of a company vehicle . . . left unattended." What did the fact the van stood by itself—unattended—on the parking lot have to do with the personal use rule? Another document, also labeled corrective action notice, is dated 23 June, also signed by Custer and the highest supervisor. This one adds another offense by Douglass: "Fraudulent—deceptive practices." There is not a word of explanation in the record for this added and totally different reason for Douglass' discharge. The supervisors themselves were unable at the hearing to explain it. This means, of course, that management knew its first recorded reason was not a good one.

The only reason I can see in this record for the Respondent's change of position is certain testimony by Minasi. When told, on 20 June, that he had violated the rule by stopping for dinner, Douglass protested on the ground that Minasi had told him he was permitting him to do that. When asked by the other managers had he so told Douglass, Minasi equivocated, saying both no and that perhaps Douglass had "misinterpreted" what he had said. His own handwritten statement, added to the discipline document, reads: "This may have been misinterpreted by Mr. Douglass."

With all this—a very desirable employee summarily dismissed without a word of warning after 12 years of perfect service; disparate treatment of one man against a number of others who committed worse offenses—if offense it was; and doubletalk in the Respondent's own records regarding why it did what it did—the conclusion is inescapable that the supervisors were not telling the truth about why Douglass was fired. But a reason they had to have. In the light of the timing—right after the man came out of a union meeting, the Company's knowledge of the union activity, interrogation of employees before Douglass was discharged, and the Respondent's proven intent to put a stop to the union movement—the only rational explanation of the dismissal of this man is furtherance of the Company's program to ensure the end of the union activity.

On 6 June the Company held a meeting with a number of supervisors present, including Minasi; 30 employees were present. Douglass testified, without contradiction, as follows:

> He [Minasi] was saying he was getting a lot of flak from the other technicians that they didn't want to do this. They didn't want to do that. They were overworked, and he said he's not going to listen to it. If you don't like the way things are run around here, Anna Curry [personnel manager] is sitting right here . . . come up here. He'll fill out papers and pay you, and you can hit the road.

Douglass spoke up to complain that "the work was unreal. It was getting too much." As the meeting was ending Douglass spoke up with "What we need is a union." Minasi testified he did not hear the man make that statement. His testimony is no more credible than that of Custer, that after sitting for 3-1/2 hours looking at Douglass' van in the parking lot 2 weeks later in order to "see who was going to get into the truck" he had no knowledge of a union meeting having taken place. I have no doubt the managers knew all along of Douglass' union activity.

In conclusion I find that by discharging Douglass the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

The Respondent must be ordered to cease and desist from again committing the unfair labor practices found. John Wagnon and John Douglass must be reinstated to their former positions, and they must be made whole for any loss of earnings they suffered in consequence of the illegal discrimination against them. Because of the nature of the unfair labor paractices committed, the Respondent must be ordered to cease and desist from in any other manner violating the statute hereafter.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth in section III, above, which occurred regarding the operations of the Respondent described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States, and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By suspending John Wagnon without pay for 3 days and by discharging John Wagnon and John Douglass, the Respondent has violated, and is violating, Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

2. By the foregoing conduct, by interrogating its employees concerning their union activities, by telling employees the Respondent is aware of their individual union activity, by offering to escort employees to their union hall to assist them in canceling their union authorization cards, by soliciting grievances from the employees to avoid bargaining with their chosen representative, by granting improved conditions of employment such as medical insurance, improved safety equipment on operation machinery, and faster and more efficient evaluation and pay, by inviting its employees to form an employee committee to deal with the Company concerning condition of employment, and by threatening to close its plant and to discharge its employees, all for the purpose of inducing its employees to abandon their prounion activity, the Respondent has violated and is violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. The above-described unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

G. Heileman Brewing Co., Inc. and Local Union 309, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO. Case 14–CA–17796

August 25, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT[1]

On December 13, 1985, Administrative Law Judge Marvin Roth issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Charging Party filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order, as modified.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, G. Heileman Brewing Co., Inc., Belleville, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraphs 1(a) and (b).

"(a) Failing or refusing to recognize and bargain collectively in good faith with Local Union 309, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit consisting of all maintenance electricians employed at its Belleville, Illinois plant, or unilaterally changing the wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of the unit employees without prior notice to the Union and without affording the Union an opportunity to meet and bargain concerning such matters as such representative.

"(b) Terminating maintenance electricians at its Belleville plant without affording the Union prior notice and an opportunity to negotiate and bargain concerning any change in subcontracting arrangements and its effect on the unit employees."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(b).

"(b) Recognize and, on request, bargain in good faith with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the unit employees."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT fail or refuse to recognize and bargain collectively and in good faith with Local Union 309, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of our employees in the appropriate unit consisting of all maintenance electricians employed at our Belleville, Illinois plant.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally change the wages, benefits, and other terms and conditions of employment of the unit employees without prior notice to Local 309 and without affording Local 309 an opportunity to meet and bargain concerning such matters as such representative.

WE WILL NOT terminate maintenance electricians at our Belleville plant without affording Local 309 prior notice and an opportunity to negotiate and [1] Member Johansen did not participate in the decision on the merits.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established practice is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In part III,A, of his decision, the judge inadvertently ascribes to G. Heileman Brewing Plant Manager Allen LaCombe's testimony that in early 1981 he could not use electrician Alfred Valetin because Valetin was not eligible to do construction work outside the Heileman plant. The decision is corrected to reflect the testimony of Lowry Superintendent George Fischer Jr. We also modify the remedy portion of his decision to reflect that the Respondent is found to be in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) and (5) and not Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3).

We do not adopt the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) by breaching contractual obligations to the Union. The complaint alleged only that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) by the unilateral subcontracting of the electrical maintenance work to Bienco Electric Co. (Bienco), and the issue of whether the Respondent breached a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union was not fully litigated. We shall modify the recommended Order and notice accordingly.

Member Cracraft notes that in its brief the Respondent does not contest the judge's finding that the decision to subcontract the electrical maintenance work to Bienco was a mandatory subject of bargaining.

In light of the other reasons given by the judge for rejecting the Respondent's waiver defense, Member Cracraft finds it unnecessary to rely on the judge's finding that the Respondent "was in fact bound by a collective-bargaining agreement, effective through August 1985."

[3] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

bargain concerning any change in subcontracting arrangements and its effects on the unit employees.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Gerald Warden, Joseph Poell, Lawrence O'Dell, Elwood Harres, Albert Lorentzen, Tom Chasteen, and Dave Pusa immediate and full reinstatement to the positions of employment which they occupied in December 1984, either jointly with Lowry Electric Company, it being willing, or if not, as our employees, dismissing if necessary anyone who may have been hired or assigned to perform the work that they had been performing prior to January 1, 1985, or if their former positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights, privileges, and benefits previously enjoyed, and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and benefits they may have suffered by reason of their unlawful terminations, with interest.

WE WILL recognize and bargain in good faith with Local 309 as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the unit employees.

WE WILL reimburse the various trust funds established under the prevailing basic inside agreement between Southwestern Illinois Division, NECA and Local 309, for any failure of contributions from Lowry Electric Company by reason of our failure to employ maintenance electricians under the subcontracting arrangement.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARVIN ROTH, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard at St. Louis, Missouri, on 19, 20, and 21 August 1985. The charge was filed on 8 January 1985 by Local Union 309, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO (the Union). The complaint, which issued on 11 June 1985, alleges that G. Heileman Brewing Co., Inc. (the Company or Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act. The gravamen of the complaint, in sum, is that (1) the Company and Lowry Electric Co. (Lowry) were joint employers of employees performing electrical maintenance work at the Company's Belleville, Illinois facility, (2) the Union was the designated and recognized collective-bargaining representative of these employees in an appropriate unit, and (3) the Company violated its bargaining obligations by subcontracting the electrical maintance work to Bienco Electric Co. (Bienco) without prior notice to the Union and without affording the Union an opportunity to negotiate and bargain concerning such subcontracting and its effects. The Company by its answer denies these allegations, and further contends that the complaint should be dismissed by reason of the General Counsel's failure to join Lowry and Bienco as parties to this proceeding, and that the Union failed to exhaust its contractually established grievence and arbitration procedure.[1] All named parties were afforded full opportunity to participate, to present relevant evidence, to argue orally, and to file briefs. The General Counsel, the Union, and the Company each filed a brief.

On the entire record in this case[2] and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and having considered the briefs submitted by the parties, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

The Company, an Illinois corporation, maintains an office and brewery at Belleville, Illinois, where it is engaged in the production and distribution of beer, related malt beverages, and other products. In the operation of its business, the Company annually sells and ships from its Belleville plant, goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside of Illinois. I find, as the Company admits, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. As the named Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce, I find that it would effectuate the policies of the Act for the Board to assert its jurisdiction in this case.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background: The Brewery Operation, the Union's Representative Status, and Developments Leading to the Subcontracting Arrangement Between the Company and Lowry

The Belleville brewery has been in existence since at least the early 1940s. From 1954 until 1975 Carling Brewing Company operated the brewery. In 1975 Carling was acquired by National Brewing Company, the resulting firm being known as Carling National, and in April 1979 that firm was acquired by the Company. (The plant itself has sometimes been called the Stag Brewery, although many brands of beer are produced there.) The brewery employees have for many years been represented by various labor organizations. The Teamsters Union represented the production and some maintenance employees. District #9 of the Machinists Union, Local #101 of the Plumbers and Pipefitters Union, and the present union have historically represented the plant maintenance employees in their respective crafts. Since the 1940s the Union has represented the maintenance electricians as the brewery, and those employees were, until August 1980, covered by a series of collective-bargaining contracts between the Union and the firm operating the brewery. On acquiring the brewery, the Company assumed the bargaining obligations of its predecessor. As of that time there was in effect a collective-bargaining contract between Carling National and the Union covering the maintenance electricians at the plant, and effective by its terms from 15 April 1975 through 14 April 1979. The Company initially anticipated that it would close the brewery. In March 1979 the Company jointly negotiated a closing agreement, entitled "Craftsmen Memorandum of Understanding" with the three maintenance craft unions. The agreement covered the effect of termination of operations, including servance pay, and specifically provided that if the Company resumed operations, it would operate under the existing collective-bargaining contracts for 90 days, after which the contracts would be open for negotiations or modifications.[3] Following the acquisition the Company laid off its employees, including the maintenance electricians. However, the Company subsequently decided to resume operations at the brewery, and in August the Company recalled the eight maintenance electricians who had previously worked there.[4] Thereafter the Company negotiated new or modified contracts with the Machinists and Pipefitters Unions, but requested that the present Union await the outcome of those negotiations. In the meantime the electricians worked under an extension agreement of the 1975–1979 contract, which provided for a 70-cent-per-hour wage increase. The Company eventually executed contracts with the Machinists and Pipefitters Unions which each provided for annual wage increases ranging from 40 to 47 cents per hour over a 3-year period. In early 1980 the Company and the Union commenced their negotiations, and the maintenance electricians continued to work under an extension agreement. Union Assistant Business Manager James Hankins, accompained by maintenance electricians Gerald "Red" Warden and Alfred Valentin, represented the Union, and all three were presented as the General Counsel witnesses in this proceeding. Plant Manager Allen LaCombe and Industrial Relations Manager Charles Rhein represented the Company, and they were presented as Company witnesses. I am not persuaded that any of these witnesses gave a complete and accurate picture of the 1980 negotiations. Hankins was not credible in certain specific respects, and the employees tended to be somewhat vague in their recollection of the negotiations, LaCombe and Rhein, while denying certain specific aspects of Hankins' testimony, were sparse in their description of the negotiations, and did not specifically explain how it came about that the Company proposed subcontracting the electrical maintenance work. However, on considering the overall tenor of the witnesses' testimony, a clearer picture emerges. It is evident that the Company was concerned about the wage disparity between the electricians and the other maintenance crafts. It is undisputed that the electricians were paid at a higher rate than the machinists and pipefitters. In response to my question, Plant Manager LaCombe testified in sum that in 1980 the Company wanted to subcontract the electrical work becuase (1) the Company was finding it difficult to obtain qualified, competent electricians, which sometimes had to be done on short notice; and (2) the Company initially planned to operate the brewery on a seasonal basis, and therefore needed an electrical subcontractor in order to be assured of a ready pool of electricians. However, this would not explain whey the Company proposed subcontracting after the negotiations were under way. (Rhein testified that LaCombe proposed subcontracting at the second bargaining session in 1980.) Electricians Warden and Valentin both testified, in sum, that the parties were having difficulty in reaching agreement on the terms of a collective-bargaining contract, and that the Company proposed subcontracting as a means of breaking what appeared to be a deadlock in negotiations. By subcontracting to a union firm, the Company would not be able to reduce the electricians' wage scale. However, it would be in a position to disvow responsibility for electricians' wage rates. Therefore, although I do not credit the testimony of Hankins in all its aspects, I credit his testimony to the effect that the Company proposed subcontracting as a means of justifying to the other union, why the electricians were receiving a higher rate of pay.[5]

The Union was not adverse to the idea of subcontracting, although it expressed some concerns. Hankins asked if the Company might eventually train Teamsters, i.e., production unit employees, to perform electrical maintenance work. LaCombe answered that the Company would not do this. The employees expressed concern about what would happen to them. LaCombe answered that they could be transferred to the contractor's payroll.[2] Both parties understood that the electrical mainte-

[3] The closing agreement was nominally between Carling National and the unions, because the Company was awaiting SEC approval for its acquisition of Carling National. Plant Manager Allen LaCombe and Industrial Relations Manager Charles Rhein, who signed the agreement for Carling National, remained in their respective position after the acquisition.

[4] The eight electricians were Gerald Warden, Joseph Poell, Elwood Harres, Lawrence O'Dell, Edmond French, Alfred Valentin, Albert Lorentzen, and Lindell Zimmerman.

[5] I do not credit Hankin's testimony that LaCombe referred to the other union contracts as "crap." I find it unlikely that LaCombe would so disparage the contracts he had negotiated and thereby encourage the Union to demand higher wages. I also do not credit Hankins' testimony that the Pipefitters and Machinists took wage cuts in 1979. Rhein and LaCombe testified in detil concerning the wage increase negotiated for the other units, and their testimony was corroborated by Pipefitters Business Agent Joseph Nebgen, who was presented as the General Counsel's witness. Nevertheless, as indicated, the electricians were paid more than the other company employees, and this resulted in problems when the Company negotiated with the other uniors.

[6] This finding is based on the credited testimony of LaCombe and Rhein. I do not credit Hankin's testimony that LaCombe wanted the contractor to agree to a seniority list in order that the Company could retain nance work would be contracted to a union firm, selected by the Company, which was a signatory to the area contract between the Union and the local chapter of National Electrical Contractors Association (NECA), a multiemployer bargaining association. Therefore the employees would be covered by that contract, except to the extent that different terms and conditions were negotiated. The Union agreed that the Company and the Union could negotiate shift differentials and starting times which differed from those in the NECA contract, and they did so. The Union informed the Company that under the NECA contract, there would have to be a working foreman on the job. By July 1980 the Company and the Union reached agreement on the terms and conditions of subcontracting insofar as they affected the employees. However, they did not reduce their agreement to writing. Instead the Company next selected a subcontractor. The Company awarded the electrical maintenance work to Lowry, an established union electrical contracting firm which was a member of NECA and signatory to the current NECA contract with the Union. It is undisputed that at all times the Company and Lowry were and are separately owned, and operated and controlled firms, engaged in different businesses, and did not constitute a single employer under the Act.

On 5 August 1980 the Union and Lowry executed a "Maintenance Work Supplement to the Prevailing Inside Agreement Between Local Union 309 of the I.B.E.W. and Lowry Electric Company," which by its terms was limited to the performance of maintence work at the Company's brewery. The phrase "prevailing inside agreement" referred to the current NECA contract, and the agreement signed on 5 August 1980 constituted an addendum to the NECA contract (I shall hereafter refer to the agreement as the "Addendum"). The Addendum, which was effective by its terms for the duration of the NECA contract, specifically incorporated all the provisions of the prevailing NECA contract except as modified by the Addendum. (The current NECA contract was scheduled to expire on 1 September 1981.) The Addendum incorporated the shift schedules and premium pay rates which were negotiated and agreed on by the Union, and contained additional provisions which imposed requirements on the Company. Thus the Addendum required both Lowry and the Company to post their safety and health rules "at conspicuous places throughout the job," and provided that Lowry and the Company "reserve the right to send into the area of work as many supervisors and engineers either deems necessary but they shall not perform any work." On 6 August 1980 the Company and Lowry entered into a written contract agreement whereby Lowry agreed to "provide all supervision and labor according to" the Addendum. However, Lowry was not required to furnish tools or materials. Under this contract, the Company agreed to provide Lowry "with information as to seniority of electricians, size of crew needed from time to time and dismissal of employees." The Company further agreed to reimburse Lowry for the cost of wages, fringe benefits funds under the NECA contract and other payroll costs imposed by law, plus a 3-1/2-percent contractor fee. On signing its agreements with the Company and the Union, Lowry commenced providing maintenance electricians at the brewery, using the seven employees who had until then been working regularly for the Company (all of those recalled in August 1979, except Zimmerman). The Company informed Lowry that it wanted Warden as foreman, and he was so designated. Assistant Business Manager Hankins testified that about 1 September 1980 he prepared and Lowry and the Union signed a memorandum of understanding which listed the seven employees in order of their seniority, based on company employment records, and provided that they would be laid off and recalled in accordance with their seniority date. A comparison of this memorandum with prior Company seniority rosters indicates some minor different in seniority dates, but the employees maintained their positions on the seniority roster (in order, Warden, Poell, O'Dell, Harres, French, Valentin, and Lorentzen). Hankins testified that he mailed a copy of the memorandum of understanding to the Company. Plant Manager LaCombe testified that he never saw the memorandum. Hankins testified that he prepared the memorandum because the Company requested such an agreement. As indicated, I have found that the Union requested and the Company agreed that the present employees would be retained. Hankins further testified that the Company and the Union agreed that the Addenda agreements between Lowry and the Union would be renewed on an annual basis and concurrently with the NECA contracts. The Addendum and each renewal provided that it "shall run concurrently with the term" of the NECA contract and "shall apply to any contractor who has been recognized by a Letter of Assent to" the NECA contract. However, a comparison of the contract agreements between the Company and Lowry, the Addenda agreements between Lowry and the Union and the NECA contracts indicates that although they were usually executed in August, they did not always run for concurrent periods. The Addenda agreements were renewed annually, effective as of 1 September of each year (1981–1984). The contract agreement between the Company and Lowry, originally effective for a 2-year period, was renewed on 5 August 1982 for an additional 2-year period, and was renewed on 5 August 1984, effective until 31 December 1984. (The circumstances concerning this last renewal will be discussed at a later point in this decision.) The NECA contract which was in effect from 1 September 1979 to 1 September 1981 was periodically renegotiated and successive contracts were effective from 1 September 1981 through 31 August 1983, 1 September 1983 through 31 August 1984, and 1 September 1984 through 31 August 1986. The Company never signed the Addendum agreement or renewal, did not participate in NECA negotiations, and never signed a "Letter or Assent" to be bound by the NECA contract, although the NECA contract provided that it would apply to all firms who signed such letter of assent. The Union routinely informed the Company of its experienced employees. The Union, rather than the Company, was concerned about the job security of all of those employees. Because subsequent developments, it is evident that the Company valued some of those employees, but was not satisfied with the performance of others.

changes in pertinent wage rates and benefit payments under the NECA contract. The Company had maintenance subcontracting arrangements at other plants. However, although Lowry had numerous contracts to perform electrical work, including from time to time, jobs at the brewery, this was its only maintenance contract.

As indicated, there are some conflicts in testimony concerning the agreements among the Company, Lowry, and the Union. Resolution of these conflicts has been hampered by the fact that the individuals who executed the initial Addendum agreement between Lowry and the Union were not presented as witnesses in this proceeding. However, on consideration of the pertinent documents, particularly the contract agreement between the Company and Lowry, certain salient and crucial facts emerge. First and foremost, the Company contractually agreed that the electrical maintenance work would be performed in accordance with the Addendum and the NECA contract. Specifically, the Company agreed that Lowry would provide supervision and labor in accordance with the Addendum, and the Addendum expressly incorporated "all of the provisions" of the NECA contract except as modified by the Addendum. Second, it is evident from the comparison of the Addendum with the testimony concerning the negotiations between the Company and the Union that the Addendum, although not signed by the Company, was in fact negotiated by the Company and reflected the results of those negotiations. Moreover, the Company indicated its approval of the Addendum when it signed the contract with Lowry, thereby agreeing that maintenance work would be performed in accordance with the Addendum. Third, it is evident from the language of the contract agreement and the Addendum that all parties anticipated that the Company would exercise supervisory authority over the maintenance electricians. The Company specifically agreed to provide Lowry with information about "dismissal of employees." This provision would be superfluous unless the Company actually had the power to terminate the employees. This power was particularly significant for the regular employees who had previously worked for the Company, and who, as will be discussed, continued to perform most of the maintenance work. If the Company wished to terminate an employee who had initially been furnished by Lowry, then Lowry could simply transfer that employee to another job. However, the employees who had previously worked for the Company were not qualified under the NECA contract to perform outside construction work. Therefore the Company had life or death power over their jobs. The contract agreement further provided that the Company would provide Lowry with information about "seniority of electricians." This information would also be superfluous unless, as was actually the case, the Company understood and agreed that the employees who previously worked for the Company would be retained by reason of and in accordance with their seniority with the Company. The Addendum provided that both the Company and Lowry reserved the right to send supervisors and engineers into the work area, "but they shall not perform any manual work." It is evident from this provision that the Company, Lowry, and the Union anticipated that the Company would have at least authority to supervise the manner in which the maintenance electricians performed their work. As will be discussed, only the Company regularly sent supervisors "into the area of work."

B. Day-to-Day Operations Under the Subcontract Between the Company and Lowry

After the Company subcontracted the electrical maintenance work to Lowry, the electricians who were formerly on the Company's payroll continued to perform their work in the same manner as they had done before. They did not fill out a job application for Lowry. They continued to report for work at the brewery, and never had occasion to report to Lowry's facility. They punched the same timeclock (using the Company's cards) as the maintenance employees who were directly employed by the Company (pipefitters, machinists, and some oilers). As agreed by the Company and the Union, they worked the same shifts as the other maintenance employees. Those shifts differed both from the shifts worked by the Company's production employees and from Lowry's employees engaged in outside work. As working foreman, Gerald Warden compiled weekly timesheets from the daily timecards, and turned in the sheets the Company Electrical Superintendent Richard Voss, who forwarded them to Lowry. Lowry prepared the paychecks, made all deductions, and sent the checks to Voss. Warden or an acting foreman would pick up the paychecks and distribute them to employees. The electricians' weekly pay period was the same as that for other Lowry employees. There were normally seven maintenance electricians regularly on duty during a 24-hour period. Four electricians worked the day shift (7 a.m. to 3 p.m.). Two, including Warden, were assigned to the bottle shop and two to the brewhouse. The facilities were about one block apart. Two electricians were assigned to the second shift (3 to 11 p.m.). They were based at the bottle shop, but serviced the entire plant. One electrician was assigned to the third shift (11 p.m. to 7 a.m.). When replacements were needed, Voss would notify the Lowry vice president and superintendent, George Fischer, who would refer them from Lowery's complement of employees. From time to time, Lowry furnished electricians on a temporary basis in accordance with the Company's needs, e.g., as replacements for employees on sick leave or vacation, or to meet special maintenance problems which required additional help. These employees worked on other Lowry jobs when they were not working at the brewery. However, the Company needed permanent replacements when Edmond French died and Alfred Valentin retired. Lowry furnished replacements, and two of these (Tom Chasteen and Dave Pusa) worked at the brewery on a permanent basis and became part of the regular crew. As indicated, the remaining electricians, who had formerly been on the Company's payroll did not work on other Lowry jobs.

The maintenance electricians were primarily troubleshooters, i.e., their function was to correct electrical problems and maintain electrical equipment in such a manner as to assure continuity of production operations.

Therefore their work was complementary to that of other maintenance employees and closely involved with production. The electricians furnished their own hand tools, and the Company furnished all power tools and other supplies and equipment. Lowery did not furnish any tools and materials. Lowery also did not regulary assign a supervisor to the brewery. Lowry Vice President and Superintendent Fischer testifeid that during the period from August 1980 through December 1984 he went to the brewery only 5 or 6 times in connection with maintenance work, although he regularly visited other Lowry jobsites and indeed, went to the brewery some 25 to 30 times during the same period in connection with other jobs or bidding for jobs. Fischer explained that he had no reason to go to the brewery in connection with maintenance work because he did not know what had to be done. It is evident from the nature of the work involved that Fischer was correct. The work of the maintenance electricians was so closely related to the Company's normal production operation that only the Company could exercise meaningful supervision over that work. Nonetheless the Company contends (Br. 21, 36) in sum that the maintenance electricians were skilled personnel who were capable of performing their work as needed, without supervisory direction, and that consequently neither the Company nor Lowry supervised their work on a regular basis.[7] To a considerable extent the Company's position is accurate. The electricians performed most of their work on an "as needed" basis. Superintendent Voss, production or other maintenance employees, and even rank-and-file production employees could and did inform the electricians of needed repairs simply by paging them over the plant intercom system. An announced "red" condition meant a breakdown which stopped production and therefore had to be handled immediately. An announced "green" condition meant a less serious problem which did not require priority attention. When electricians (usually on the first shift) were unable to reach or complete jobs on their shift, then Superintendent Voss, Warden, or another electrician (usually Joseph Poell, who worked with Warden and sometimes served as acting foreman) would enter the jobs Voss' ledger book. When electricians on succeeding shifts reported to work, they would check the ledger book to see what jobs remained to be done. Usually second- and third-shift electricians had more time to perform nonpriority work. As these jobs were completed, the electricians would so indicate in the ledger book. Under this system, it was seldom necessary for Voss or any other supervisor to exercise supervisory rather than technical discretion by deciding to what work had to be performed and which employees should perform the work. This did not mean that the electricians worked without day-to-day supervision. Rather, the evidence indicates that when supervisory authority was exercised, it was usually done at the first level by Superintendent Voss, and at a higher level by Plant Manager LaCombe or Industrial Relations Manager Rhein, usually in consultation with the Union or Lowry. The complaint in this case alleges, and the anwser admits, that Voss is and was at all times material the Company's electrical superintendent, and a supervisor and agent of the Company within the meaning of the Act. If so, then it is difficult to see who Voss would be supervising unless it were the maintenance electricians. In fact, Voss was their supervisor, and they so regarded him as their supervisor.[8] Joseph Poell testifeid about two instances in which a question arose concerning the placement of certain electrical switches. In each instance Voss decided how and where the switches should be installed, although the electrician or electricians involved preferred to do it differently. Electrician Alfred Valentin similarly testified concerning two occasions on which another company maintenance supervisor instructed an electrician to redo certain work which in the opinion of the supervisor had not been done properly. Poell testified that when he reported to work each day, he and Voss would discuss what jobs had to be performed, and they would go through the ledger book and work orders together. When the Company needed an electrician or electricians to work overtime, Voss would so inform Valentin, who was the Union's shop steward, indicating how many were needed and when they would work. Valentin, in accordance with prior practice before subcontracting, would assign those employees with the least accumulated overtime in order to equalize distribution of overtime. He would post their names on the electricians' bulletin board, and if an employee declined overtime, he would give it to someone else. Lowry was never notified of such overtime work unless more electricians were needed, in which case Voss called Lowry Superintendent Fischer, indicating time and shifts. Voss was present about 10 percent of the time that the electricians were working, he was usually present when they were working on a major breakdown, and he would usually come by when they were working on a weekend. He also provided them with diagrams when necessary. Although Voss was a trained and experienced electrician, he did not normally perform manual work unless the electricians needed assistance.

At a higher lever, Plant Manager LaCombe and Industrial Relations Manager Rhein became involved in the supervisory process. The Company was dissatisfied with electrician Valentin's performance. In early 1981 Lowry Superintendent Fischer met with LaCombe, at Voss' request, concerning Valentin. LaCombe said his work was not good or fast enough, and he asked Fisher to get rid of him. LaCombe said he could not use him because he was not eligible to do outside construction work, but would fire him if LaCombe so requested. LaCombe said he would give Valentin another chance. In 1983 Voss told Assistant Business Manager Hankins that LaCombe

[7] The Company does not contend that electrician Warden was a Lowry supervisor by reason of his status as "Foreman" under the NECA contract. In any event, Warden was primarily engaged in performing electrical maintenance work, and his functions as foremen, to the exetent that they might be arguably regarded as supervisory, were routine in nature and did not involve the exercise of such discretion, in the interests of the employer, as would qualify him a a supervisor under the Act.

[8] Voss was not presented as a witness in this proceeding. The evidence concerning his duties substantially consists of the testimony of the General Counsel's employee witnesses, and documents which were presented in evidence.

was still dissatisfied with Valentin's performance, and asked when he was going to retire (Valentin eventually retired in June 1984). In 1982 LaCombe asked Fischer to come to the brewery to talk to electrician O'Dell, because his work was too slow. Fischer came a few days later, but LaCombe told him that the matter was settled. On another occasion Rhein told Fischer that an electrician who had initially been referred by Lowry was constantly talking and interfering with work, and that LaCombe wanted him off the Company's property. Fischer answered that he was a good electrician, but he agreed to transfer the employee. Fischer testified that he never disciplined the maintenance employees or even discussed their work (except to talk to Warden about mistakes on the timesheets), but would give them a "pep talk" if suggested by Voss Rhein. In sum, Lowry never took the initiative in monitoring emloyee performance, and the Company never asked Lowry to do so. Rather, the Company monitored individual performance, and decided what action should be taken if it believed that the employee's performance was substandard. Fischer would express his opinion, but would either carry out the Company's decision or let the Company resolve the matter. As indicated, the Company was aware that rejection of any of the initial crew of electricians was tantamount to discharge. Rhein also sought to become involved in the hiring process, although his efforts in this regard never reached fruition. In 1983 Rhein told Hankins that LaCombe wanted a particular electrician to work at the brewery. Hankins said he would try to get him, but the electrician was not hired or referred by Lowry. Also in 1983 Rhein proposed to Hankins that the Company could use college students as summer help for electrical maintenance work and suggested a wage rate of $5 per hour. Hankins agreed, subject to approval by the employees at the brewery, but Rhein subsequently decided not to hire summer help. Neither Rhein nor Hankins indicated that such summer help would have to be referred through Lowry.

The parties stipulated in this proceeding that Worker's Compensation claims were filed only against Lowry and were paid by Lowry's insurer. The evidence is inconclusive regarding formal grievance handling because no contractual grievances were filed after the Company subcontracted the electrical maintenance work. Jurisdictional disputes were always resolved by the stewards for the respective crafts or units. However, on at least one occasion the Company dealt directly with the Union in resolving an informal grievance. Hankins testified without contradiction that in early 1984 Hankins told Rhein that electrician Lorentzen wanted to work the day shift. Rhein said he wanted Lorentzen on nights, and they agreed that there should be no shift preference. The maintenance electricians continued to enjoy benefits which were available to company employees but not to nonemployees, and they enjoyed such benefits either because of a continuation of past practices or through negotiations with the Company in which Lowry was not involved. The Company had programs whereby it awarded prizes of beer or small amounts of cash to the employees at the plant as a reward for overall plant safety or productivity. These programs were known respectively as "safety bingo," "production beer," "No lost time accident beer" and "monthly beer." Prior to subcontracting, the maintenance electricians participated in and were eligible for prizes under these programs. After subcontracting began, Steward Valentin asked Rhein if they could remain in the programs. After consulting with LaCombe, Rhein informed the Union that they could do so. The parties stipulated that these programs covered "all persons performing services at the plant," including maintenance electricians. However, no evidence was introduced which would indicate that any persons not on the Company's payroll, other than the maintenance electricians, fell into this category. The maintenance electricians had the use of a company lunchroom facility, and those who worked regularly at the brewery had their own lockers, and stored their tools at or near their workbench. These regular electricians were always invited to the Company's Christmas party for its employees, but were not invited to Lowry's party. Electrician Poell, who had worked at the brewery since 1964, testified in sum that his working conditions remained substantially the same after the Company subcontracted the electrical maintenance work, except that he now received his paycheck from Lowry.

C. Developments Leading to the Subcontracting to Bienco, and the Company's Alleged Unlawful Conduct

As indicated, in August 1984 the Company and Lowry renewed their contract agreement only until 31 December 1984, although their preceding agreements had run for 2-year periods.[9] None of the company or Lowry officials who were presented as witnesses in this proceeding, testified directly concerning the reason for this short renewal term. However, the evidence indicates that the Company was concerned about what it regarded as escalating wage rates under the NECA contract, and was determined to avoid the impact of those rates. In December 1983 the Company and the Pipefitters Union were engaged in contract negotiations. The Pipefitters Union wanted wage parity with the electricians. Pipefitters' business agent, Nebgen, testified without contradiction that the Company's attorney told him that no one in the units would make more than the pipefitters, and that parity would be at the pipefitters' rate, not the electricians' rate. Hankins testified that in January, following a conversation with Nebgen, he called Rhein and said that he heard that the Company's attorney threatened to get the Union. Rhein answered that there was no problem, that this was just bargaining tactics, but that he would like to talk to Hankins after the Pipefitters negotiations were completed. However, he never contacted Hankins. Nebgen testified that he did not discuss the Pipefitters negotiations with the Union. Whether he did or did not, it is evident that Hankins somehow learned about what the Company said in those negotiations. Most significantly, the uncontroverted testimony of Nebgen and Hankins concerning the Company's statements demonstrates that (1) the Company was determined to significantly reduce the wage rates for its electricians even to the point of making a commitment to the Pipefitters in this regard, and (2) the Company attempted to conceal its aim from the Union, and indeed, avoided dealing with the Union concerning the matter of wage rates. The Union did not learn until late August, when it asked Lowry to sign a 1-year renewal of the Addendum, that the Company and Lowry had extended their contract agreement only through December 1984, i.e., that unlike prior years, the agreement would come up for renewal during the term of the Addendum. Lowry President Oliver Hartman, who was presented as the General Counsel witness, testified that he so informed the Union, and that the Union told him that they would go along with that arrangement. I credit Hartman's testimony in this regard.[10] In the meantime, Hankins heard as early as July 1984 that the Company was shopping around among electrical contractors for a lower rate. Plant Manager LaCombe testified that in early November, before he contacted Lowry about a renewal of their agreement, he instructed Rhein to solicit bids for the electrical maintenance work.

In mid-November (probably the week of 12 November), at the Company's request, Hartman and Fischer of Lowry met with company officials LaCombe and Rhein at the brewery. All four testified concerning the meeting. However, their versions of the meeting, although differing in some aspects, conflict in only one significant respect. LaCombe told Hartman that their contract would expire soon, and that the Company needed a $5-per-hour reduction in the electricians' base wage rate. He asked Hartman to talk to the Union to see if they would accept the reduction. Hartman said he would get back to the company officials after he spoke to the Union. Hartman and Fischer testified that LaCombe said the reduction was "non-negotiable." LaCombe and Rhein testified that LaCombe did not make such a statement. I credit the Lowry officials. First, it was in their interest to present the Company's position to the Union in the most flexible light possible because if they failed to reach agreement Lowry would be out of a contract. Therefore it is unlikely that Hartman would have represented to the Union, as he did, that the Company's demand was nonnegotiable, unless the Company actually said so. Second, as has been and will be discussed, the Company's overall course of conduct indicates that it was taking a nonnegotiable stance because the Company was determined to substantially reduce the electricians' wage rate, with or without the Union, and preferably without.

The next development was a meeting at the union hall between Hankins and the two Lowry officials. Although there is considerable confusion in the testimony of these three witnesses as to when they met, the overall testimony concerning the course of developments indicates that Hartman was probably correct when he testified that they met some 3 to 7 days after the Lowry officials met with the Company.[11] I credit the testimony of Hartman and Fischer concerning their meeting. Hartman reported what LaCombe told him, i.e., that the Company wanted a $5-per-hour reduction in the base wage rate, which would be nonnegotiable. Hankins said that he did not think that the employees would accept such a cut, but that he would talk to Hartman. Shortly thereafter, in late November, LaCombe called Hartman and asked him whether there had been any "progress." Hartman answered that Hankins had to get with the employees.[12] The Union did not contact Hartman until after Christmas. On December 26, Hankins told him that a $5 base wage reduction was unacceptable, but the Union might put together a package of cuts totaling $2.40 per hour which would not include a reduction in the base wage rate. Hartman promptly informed LaCombe of the Union's position, but LaCombe did not respond to the proposal. On 27 December Hartman proposed to LaCombe that he meet directly with Hankins. LaCombe declined, asserting that his contract was with Lowry. LaCombe told Hartman that Lowry no longer had a contract, but could submit a bid for the maintenance work. On 28 December Hankins presented Hartman with a proposed document for signature by the Company, Lowry, and the Union, by which the Company acknowledged its status as a joint employer and obligation to bargain with the Union if it terminated its relationship with Lowry. That same day Hartman telephoned LaCombe and told him that the Union would agree to cuts in the range of $2.50 to $3 per hour if the Company signed the document. LaCombe answered that the Company could not sign such a document. Hartman delivered the document to LaCombe the next day. On 31 December Hankins told Hartman to inform the Company that the Union would agree to cuts totaling $2.50 per hour without the document. Hartman immediately informed Industrial Relations Manager Rhein of the Union's proposal. After consulting with LaCombe, Rhein called back and informed Hartman that the Union's proposal was "too little, too late."[13] On 1 January 1985 the Company exe-

[10] Hankins testified that Hartman did not inform him of the limited renewal until December 1984 and that until then he assumed that the Company and Lowry renewed their agreement for another 1-year period. However, Hankins admitted that in September 1984 Union President Faust told him that Hartman said the Company wanted a 6-month extension. If so, then it is probably that the Union would have checked to determine whether in fact Lowry signed a renewal agreement of such short duration.

[11] Hankins was obviously far off base when he testified that he met with the Lowry officials on 12 December. Indeed he subsequently admitted that he learned from Union President Faust in late November that the Company wanted a $5- or $6-per-hour wage cut. LaCombe testified that he called Hartman about 10 days after their meeting and learned that Hartman had already talked to Hankins. I find that the Lowry officials met with Hankins in the latter part of November, before Thanksgiving.

[12] I credit LaCombe's testimony concerning this conversation. I do not credit the testimony of Superintendent Fischer about a three-way conversation in early December among LaCombe, Hartman, and Fischer in which Hartman allegedly said that the Union made no offer because the Company said its proposal was nonnegotiable, and LaCombe said the Company might be willing to negotiate a wage reduction of $3 per hour. The testimony of the other witnesses (Hankins, Hartman, LaCombe, and Rhein) indicates that the Union did not state a position until late December, and the Company never indicated a willingness to accept anything less than a $5-per-hour wage reduction.

cuted a maintenance contract with Bienco, which does not have a contract with the Union, and Bienco commenced performing the electrical maintenance work with its own complement of employees. By letter dated 3 January 1985, Hankins demanded that the Company bargain directly with the Union concerning "the terms and conditions of employment of employees performing electrical work." By reply letter dated 4 January 1985, LaCombe denied that it was a joint employer of those employees, and asserted that the Union's dispute was solely with Bienco.

D. Analysis and Concluding Findings

The Company asserted in its answer, by way of affirmative defense, that the "Union has failed to exhaust its contractually established grievance and arbitration procedure." The Company has evidently abandoned this assertion, having presented neither evidence nor argument in support thereof. Because the Company's contention that it has no contractual or other bargaining obligation to the Union, it is evident that the subject matter of the present complaint cannot be resolved through any agreed-upon contractual grievance and arbitration procedure. Therefore I find this affirmative defense without merit, and I shall proceed to consider the merits of this case.

I agree with the General Counsel (Br. 13) that in addressing the merits, the first question to be decided is whether the Company and Lowry were joint employers of the maintenance electricians employed at the brewery during the period from August 1980 through 31 December 1984. If not, then the Company owed no contractual or other bargaining obligation to the Union, and therefore the complaint would have to be dismissed.

In Laerco Transportation, 269 NLRB 324, 325 (1984), the Board recently had occasion to define joint employer status in the following language:

> The joint employer concept recognizes that two or more business entities are in fact separate but that they share or codetermine those matters governing the essential terms and conditions of employment. Whether an employer possesses sufficient indicia of control over petitioned-for employees employed by another employer is essentially a factual issue. To establish joint employer status there must be a showing that the employer meaningfully affects matters relating to the employment relationship such a hiring, firing, discipline, supervision, and direction.

In sum, separate firms that "share, or co-determine, those matters governing essential terms and conditions of employment" of the employees involved are joint employers of those employees, regardless of whether the firms are commonly owned, operated, or controlled. NLRB v. Greyhound Corp., 368 F.2d 778 (5th Cir. 1966), citing Boire v. Greyhound Corp., 376 U.S. 473 (1964). Accord: NLRB v. Checker Cab Co., 367 F.2d 692, 698 (6th Cir. 1966), cert. denied 385 U.S. 1008 (1967); NLRB v. Browning-Ferris Industries, 691 F.2d 1117, 1121–1124 (3d Cir. 1982).[14]

Applying the foregoing principles to the present case, I find that the Company and Lowry shared and codetermined the matters governing essential terms and conditions of employment of the maintenance electricians employed at the brewery, and therefore were the joint employers of those employees. First and foremost, the Company and the Union in fact directly negotiated and agreed on the overall framework of terms and conditions of employment under which the maintenance electricians would work. They agreed that the employees would be covered by the NECA contract, except in certain particulars, including starting times and shift differentials. They agreed to retain the employees who had been on the Company's payroll, and that consequently the employees would retain their jobs in accordance with their company seniority notwithstanding that they would be on Lowry's payroll. The Addendum agreement, which governed terms and conditions of employment, although signed by Lowry actually reflected the negotiations and agreements between the Company and the Union. Similarly the memorandum of understanding on seniority, although signed by Lowry, reflected the verbal agreement on job retention that was negotiated between the Company and the Union. Thereafter the Company alone determined when additional employees were needed, how many were needed, and for how long, and what shifts they would work. Lowry selected additional or replacement employees to meet the Company's needs. However, throughout the period from August 1980 through December 1984, most of the work was performed by former company employees, i.e., those employees who retained their jobs by reason of agreement between the Company and the Union. The Company, the Union, and Lowry, through their interrelated agreements, further agreed that the Company as well as Lowry would have the right to supervise and even terminate the employees. In practice, only the Company exercised meaningful supervision over the day-to-day work of the employees. As discussed, the Company through its supervisory personnel, principally Electrical Superintendent Voss, supervised and directed the work of the employees to the extent that it determined that such supervision and direction were necessary. Indeed the nature of the work involved, i.e., maintenance work which was closely related and essential to the Company's normal production operations, effectively precluded Lowry from playing any meaningful role in day-to-day supervision and direction of work. The Company alone determined when employees would work overtime, and by informal understanding with the Union's steward, and without any notice to or consultation with Lowry, permitted the steward to designate those employees who would work weekend overtime. The Company initiated disciplinary action, determined what action was warranted, and Lowry, although it might make recommendations, invariably deferred to the Company's decision in this regard. As indicated, the Company was not a member of NECA, did not sign a letter of assent to be bound by the NECA contract, and unlikely Lowry, did not participate in contract negotiations between NECA and the Union. However, the Company did deal directly with the Union or the employees concerning terms and conditions of employment which were not specifically governed by the NECA contract or the Addendum. Thus the Company informally discussed and resolved grievances with the Union, and granted benefits to the maintenance electricians which were available to company employees, but not to other Lowry or noncompany employees. It is also significant that the Company did not, by subcontracting the electrical maintenance work, manifest a desire to relinquish control over that work, the employees performing that work, on their terms and conditions of employment. Rather as discussed, the Company subcontracted the work to avoid the appearance of granting a higher wage rate to the electricians than to other maintenance crafts, although the Company was well aware that by subcontracting to a union electrical contractor, the electricians would in fact be paid a higher rate than the other crafts. Therefore the evidence demonstrates that the Company and Lowry were joint employers of the maintenance electricians at the Belleville brewery. Sun-Maid Growers v. NLRB, 618 F.2d 56 (9th Cir. 1980), is precisely in point. Sun-Maid, like the present case, involved a producer (in that case, a raisin processor) who arranged to have its maintenance electricians placed on the payroll of an outside contractor. In affirming the Board's finding that Sun-Maid was the joint employer of the maintenance electricians, the court held as follows (618 F.2d at 59):

> A joint employer relationship exists when an employer exercises authority over employment conditions which are within the area of mandatory collective-bargaining. . . . Here, Sun-Maid controlled the electricians' work schedules, assigned the work and decided when additional electricians were needed. These actions amply support the Board's finding that Sun-Maid was the joint employer of the electricians.

In the present case, all the factors relied on by the court are present. Specifically, the Company controlled the electricians' work schedules (in accordance with its own agreement with the Union), assigned the work to the extent such assignment was necessary, and decided when, how many, and for how long additional electricians were needed. Moreover, as discussed above, the Company exercised authority over employment conditions in other respects, including discipline, granting of benefits, and informal adjustment of grievances.[15]

The next questions presented concern the appropriate bargaining unit and the Union's representative status. The complaint alleges, and the answer denies, that all maintenance electricians employed at the Company's Belleville facility, excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act and all other employees constitute a unit appropriate for collective bargaining. The Company contends (Br. 43) that "a unit limited to Lowry electricians working at the brewery is inappropriate in view of the fact that they frequently worked elsewhere, and in view of the fact that Lowry frequently transferred its electricians from other facilities to work at the brewery." The complaint further alleges, and the answer denies, that since 6 August 1980 the Union has been the designated exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the asserted unit, and that the Union has been recognized as such representative by the Company. However, in its brief the Company makes clear that it does not dispute the Union's representative status vis-a-vis Lowry and NECA, albeit in a larger unit. Rather the Company's denial of representative status is based on its denial of joint employer status, and consequent position that it owes no bargaining obligation to the Union.

The General Counsel's unit position presents some problems. First, the General Counsel has presented no evidence that either the Company or Lowry ever recognized the Union as representative of a unit that was defined in the language of the complaint. None of the contracts or related documents that were presented in evidence contain such a unit description. Second, the cases principally relied on by the General Counsel as authority for the asserted unit (Sun-Maid Growers, 239 NLRB 346, 352–353 (1978), enfd. 618 F.2d 56, 59–60 (1980), and U.S. Pipe & Foundry Co., 247 NLRB 139, 142 (1980)), stand for the proposition that a larger unit would be appropriate, although under the authority of those cases the Company would nevertheless be obligated to bargain with the Union concerning that portion of the unit for which the Company occupied joint employer status. However, on consideration of the evidence in this case, I find that the General Counsel's position is substantially correct, and that in fact the Company and the Union have historically bargained for the unit as described in the complaint, although they did not define that unit in the same language as the complaint. For some 35 years, the Company and its predecessors recognized, bargained with, and executed collective-bargaining agreements with the Union covering only the maintenance electricians at the Belleville facility. The 1975–1979 contract, which as modified was extended by the Company and the Union until August 1980, defined the unit by stating that: "The Employer recognizes the Union as the exclusive bargaining agent for all maintenance electricians at its Belleville, Illinois plant." That unit did not, either before or after 1980, include any of the categories which are excluded from the unit as described in the complaint. Although as requested by the Company, Lowry designated a "foreman" as required under the NECA contract, that foreman was not a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. To the extent that Gerald Warden performed functions that were arguably supervisory, those functions were routine or clerical in nature, did not involve the exercise of supervisory discretion, and comprised only a small portion of his work. Warden spent nearly all of his time performing electrical maintenance, i.e., unit work. Neither Voss nor any other company supervisor or engineer was ever included in the bargaining unit. The Company's other maintenance employees and its production employees were represented by other labor organizations in other bargaining units. It is possible to find, under the authority of Sun-Maid and U.S. Pipe & Foundry, that since August 1980 the maintenance electricians were included in a larger unit, i.e., either encompassing all Lowry's employees or all employees covered by the NECA contract. However, in light of the facts in this case, such a finding is not warranted. The maintenance electricians were at all times covered by a separate agreement, i.e., the Addendum, which was negotiated by the Company and the Union and executed by Lowry and the Union. They were covered by the NECA contract by virtue of the agreements among the Company, Lowry, and the Union, and as modified by those agreements. To a significant extent, their terms and conditions of employment, including seniority rights, nature of work performed, starting times, shift differentials, and privileges and benefits, differed from that of other Lowry employees. Contrary to the Company's argument, there was not frequent interchange among the maintenance electricians and other Lowry employees. Throughout the entire period from August 1980 through December 1984, most of the electrical maintenance work was performed by employees who had previously been on the Company's payroll, who worked exclusively at the brewery, and who could not work elsewhere for Lowry because they were not qualified to perform outside work for Lowry. After French died and Valentin retired, they were eventually replaced by employees who had also worked at the brewery on a regular basis. Interchange was substantially confined to those employees who as needed supplemented or replaced the seven maintenance electricians who worked regularly at the brewery. Moreover, in light of the language of the NECA contract, it is questionable whether the maintenance employees could be included in a unit encompassing all Lowry employees or all employees covered by that contract. The NECA contract does not contain an inclusive unit description. However, the contract does provide that: "The Employer shall be a person, firm or corporation whose principal business is electrical contracting." This language indicates that the Union and NECA contemplated that the employer signatories to the NECA contract would be electrical contractors. The Company is not engaged in the business of electrical contracting. The Company, Lowry, and the Union could agree, as they did, that the maintenance employees would be covered by provisions of the NECA contract. However, this agreement would not automatically operate to place the employees in a larger unit, particularly where the joint employer would not qualify as a signatory to the contract. Rather, the language of the NECA contract tends to support the General Counsel's position. Therefore, I find, in agreement with the General Counsel, that the maintenance electricians employed at the brewery, with the indicated exclusions, constitute an appropriate unit for collective bargaining.[16] I further find that at all times material the Union was the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the unit employees, i.e., the maintenance electricians at the brewery. Those employees were continuously covered by collective-bargaining contracts which contained a union-security clause, and they were union members. Neither the Company nor Lowry disputed that the Union was their representative. Indeed in November 1984, the Company asked Lowry to deal with the Union in that capacity. Rather, the Company's denial of representative status was based on the erroneous premise that it was not an employer of the maintenance electricians.

[15] Furniture Distribution Center, 234 NLRB 751 (1978), principally relied on by the Company (Br. 37–38) is distinguishable on its facts. In that case, Compton performed warehousing and delivery functions for FDC. The Board held that FDC was not the joint employer of Compton's warehousemen and drivers, finding that Compton alone handled all personnel actions including grievances, suspensions and new hiring, and instituted work rules and demonstrated the extent of its control over labor relations by closing the warehouse on one occasion against the wishes of FDC and without consulting FDC. In the present case, unlike Furniture Distribution Center, only the alleged joint employer (the Company) exercised day-to-day supervision and direction over the employees involved, including assignment of work and overtime and determining the number of employees needed and when they were needed.

As the Company was the joint employer of the maintenance electricians in an appropriate unit, and the Union was the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of that unit, it follows that the Company was obligated to recognize and bargain with the Union concerning the terms and conditions of their employment. Therefore the next question presented is whether the Company violated that obligation when it subcontracted the electrical maintenance work to Bienco.[17] The Company contends (Br. 38–40) that assuming arguendo, the Company had a duty to bargain with the Union, the Union failed to act with due diligence because it did not request the Company to bargain until 3 January 1985, after the Company subcontracted the maintenance work to Bienco. Therefore, the [16] Assuming arguendo that a larger unit were appropriate, this would not relieve the Company of its obligation to bargain as joint employer of the maintenance electricians. See Sun-Maid and U.S. Pipe & Foundry, supra.

[17] The General Counsel contends (Br. 31–32) that the Company's decision to subcontract the maintenance work to Bienco rather than Lowry, even standing alone, was a mandatory subject of bargaining. I agree. The Company's decision involved "the replacement of employees in the existing bargaining unit with those of an independent contractor to do the same work under similar conditions of employment," Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 215 (1974). Therefore, Fibreboard, rather than First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, 452 U.S. 666 (1981), would govern. See also Whitehead Bros. Co., 263 NLRB 895, 898–899 (1982). The General Counsel also correctly points out that the Company's decision turned on labor costs. See Otis Elevator Co., 269 NLRB 891, 892 (1984). However, the Company's decision also involved other changes in terms and conditions of employment, including termination of employees with seniority rights, and substantial reductions or other changes in wages and fringe benefits, including reduction in the base wage rate amounting to much more than $5 per hour. All these changes involved mandatory subjects of bargaining. See Sun-Maid, 239 NLRB at 355.

Company argues that the Union waived any right to complain that the Company violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. I find this argument without merit. The Company's argument is based on an erroneous premise, because in late December the Union did, through Lowry, submit counterproposals to the Company's demand for a $5-per-hour reduction in the base wage rage. The demand was the only proposal ever submitted by the Company to the Union, either directly or indirectly. It is true that the Union waited for about a month before it responded to the Company's demand, and that the Union failed to offer an explanation for the delay. However, the Company's argument fails for more fundamental reasons. First, the Union was under no obligation to bargain or agree concerning any reduction in wage rates because the Company was bound by a collective-bargaining agreement effective through August 1985. The Addendum, although signed by the Union and Lowry, was negotiated by the Company and the Union and reflected the results of their 1980 negotiations. As a result of those negotiations, the Company and the Union understood and agreed that the maintenance electricians would be covered by wage rates under the NECA contract, except as modified by their agreements on shift differential. The Company reduced its commitment to writing when it agreed with Lowry that the unit employees would be covered by the Addendum, which specifically provided that the unit employees would be covered by the NECA contract except as modified by the Addendum. Thereafter the Addendum was renewed annually in accordance with the agreements between the Company and the Union. Therefore, and by reason of its status as joint employer, the Company was in fact a party to the Addendum, and the Union was not obligated to bargain over terms and conditions that differed from those provided in the Addendum until the Addendum came up for renewal. See O. Voorhees Painting Co., 275 NLRB 779 (1985).[18] Second, even if the Company could lawfully compel the Union to negotiate concerning wage rates, the Company effectively prevented any meaningful bargaining by refusing to meet and deal directly with the Union. The Company and the Union originally negotiated the Addendum, which governed the terms and conditions of employment of the maintenance electricians. Under their agreement, the employees were paid hourly wage rates as provided in the NECA contract. The Company proposed to change that agreement when it demanded a $5-per-hour reduction in the base wage rate. As the Company had originally negotiated the terms of the Addendum, and only the Company was proposing to change those terms, it follows that the Company was an essential party to any negotiations. Instead, the Company presented an ultimatum to Lowry for submission to the Union without giving Lowry any authority to negotiate over the matter. However, LaCombe also made clear from the time he presented the Company's demand that the Company would not meet or deal directly with the Union concerning its demand.[19] In these circumstances, Lowry could function only as a messenger between the Company and the Union. Therefore, assuming that the Company's demand was a mandatory subject of bargaining, the Company violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to meet and deal directly with the Union concerning that demand. It is settled law that face-to-face negotiations between the "bargaining principals" (here the Company and the Union) is "an elementary and essential condition of bona fide bargaining." Colony Furniture Co., 144 NLRB 1582, 1589 (1963); Redway Carriers, 274 NLRB 1359 (1985).[20]

Third, the Company effectively precluded any meaningful bargaining when it characterized its own demand as "non-negotiable." Because of this characterization, it is understandable that the Union would be at a loss to present any immediate responses. Fourth, even if the Company's demands were a mandatory subject of bargaining, and the parties bargained in good faith to an impasse, this would have permitted the Company only to unilaterally implement a $5-per-hour wage reduction. The Company could have done this by placing the maintenance electricians on its own payroll. Instead the Company not only terminated its subcontracting arrangement with Lowry, but also terminated employees with contractual seniority rights, and entered into a subcontract with another contractor which provided for wage reductions amounting to substantially more than $5 per hour, as well as loss of employees benefits. All this was done by the Company without giving the Union notice or an opportunity to bargain concerning such matters. In sum, I find that the Company failed and refused to recognize and bargain with the Union, and violated its contractual obligations to the Union by terminating employees with seniority rights, subcontracting the electrical maintenance work to Bienco, reducing wages, and otherwise changing terms and conditions of employment of maintenance electricians employed at the Company's Belleville facility. The Company thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. For reasons which will be discussed, the Company's contention that the complaint should be dismissed for failure to join Lowry and Bienco as parties to this proceeding is more properly addressed to the matter of remedy, and therefore will be discussed in the remedy section of this decision.

[18] Although the Union learned that the Company and Lowry renewed their subcontracting agreement only until the end of 1984, the Union did not waive its rights under the Addendum by failing to protest this arrangement. The Union could properly assume that whatever the term of the subcontract agreement, the Company would continue to abide by the terms of the Addendum, in accordance with their longstanding agreements.

[19] Therefore the Company's argument that the Union did not make a timely request for bargaining with the Company is erroneous because the Company had already infomed the Union through Lowry that it would not engage in such bargaining.

[20] I do not agree with the Company's suggestion at the hearing that the most-favored-nation clause in the NECA contract precluded any meaningful bargaining over wages. The Union did not "adamantly" stand on the NECA contract. Rather as indicated the Union offered to make concessions in the area of wage costs. See NLRB v. Superior Fireproof Door & Sash Co., 289 F.2d 713, 718 (2d Cir. 1961). Moreover the language of the NECA contract indicates that the clause would not be applicable to the Company. The clause (sec. 2.05 of the NECA contract) applies when the Union grants better terms and conditions to "any other Employer in the electrical contracting industry." However, the Company is not engaged in the electrical contracting business.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and at all times material has been a joint employer with Lowery of maintenance electricians employed at the Company's Belleville facility.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All maintenance electricians employed at the Company's Belleville, Illinois facility, excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act any all other employees constitute a unit appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. At all times material, the Union has been and is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described above.

5. By refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as the representative of the unit employees, and violating its contractual obligations to the Union by terminating employees with seniority rights, subcontracting the electrical maintenance work to Bienco, reducing wages, and otherwise changing terms and conditions of employment of maintenance electricians employed at the Belleville facility, the Company has violated and is violating Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has committed violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom, and from like or related conduct, and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. I find for all purposes, including remedy, that Lowry and Bienco are not indispensable parties to this proceeding. The complaint charges only the Company with unfair labor practices, and the General Counsel requests remedial relief which is addressed to and requires action only by the Company. The relief sought by the General Counsel (Br. 36–37), insofar as pertinent to the operations of Lowry and Bienco, is substantially identical to the remedy which was granted by the Board and approved by the court of appeals in Sun-Maid, supra. See also Hillside Manor Health Related Facility, 257 NLRB 981, 986 (1981), enfd. mem. 697 F.2d 294 (2d Cir. 1982). Specifically, the General Counsel requests that the Company be ordered to offer to reestablish the subcontracting arrangement with Lowry, and that if Lowry is unable or unwilling to reemploy the maintenance electricians and resume its obligations under the subcontract, the Company be obligated to offer reinstatement directly to the maintenance electricians and employ them as part of its own work force. The proposed order would substantially provide for restoration of the status quo without requiring Lowry to resume its subcontracting arrangement. I find, on the authority of Sun-Maid and Hillside, that the proposed relief is appropriate in this case, and that such relief does not require that either Lowry or Bienco be joined as a party in interest. In Hillside, neither the former subcontractor (Environmental) nor the new subcontractor (Blaine) were named as parties in interest, nor was the former subcontractor (Control) in Sun-Maid (Sun-Maid terminated its contract with Control and performed the work in question with its own employees. Therefore there was no current subcontractor). Nevertheless the Board in both cases, and the court in Sun-Maid granted and approved the proposed remedy, and in the process distinguished Mobil Oil Corp., 219 NLRB 511 (1975), enf. denied sub nom. Alaska Roughnecks & Drillers Assn. v. NLRB, 555 F.2d 732 (9th Cir. 1977), on which the Company principally relies (Br. 41–42). They did so for reasons which would also distinguish the present case from Mobil. Thus in Sun-Maid both the Board and the court pointed out that in Mobil the union's alleged representative status was based on a Board election proceeding in which the alleged joint employer was not named as an employer or given an opportunity to participate, contrary to the Board's rules. In Hillside, the Board pointed out, as it did in Mobil itself, that in Mobil "neither the contract termination nor the actual displacement of unit employees was alleged as a violation of the Act;" and therefore the proposed remedy would "require reinstitution of a legitimately terminated contract" with a firm (Santa Fe) which was not a party to the unfair labor practices proceeding and not represented in the proceeding. In the present case, the complaint alleged and I have found that the termination and displacement were unlawful. Moreover, in Mobil the recommended order would require reinstitution of the contract between Mobil and Santa Fe, i.e., would require action by Santa Fe, whereas in the present case, as in Sun-Maid and Hillside, the remedy would simply require the named Employer to offer to reestablish the contract. The Company's reliance on Consolidated Edison Co. v. NLRB, 305 U.S. 197, 233 (1938), is also misplaced. That case stands for the proposition that the Board cannot set aside a collective-bargaining contract on the grounds that the employer unlawfully dominated, interfered with, or assisted the signatory union, unless the union is named as a party in interest in the unfair labor practice proceeding. The Board's Rules and Regulations (Sec. 102.8) have since provided that such a labor organization is a party to the proceeding. However, the Supreme Court's rationale has not been extended to other forms of contractual arrangements, including subcontracting between employers. Thus in Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, supra 379 U.S. at 215–217, the Supreme Court approved the Board's remedial order, which required Fibreboard to resume its former maintenance operation with its own unit employees, although the subcontractor (Fluor) was not named as a party in interest in the proceeding. See also Syufy Enterprises, 220 NLRB 738, 741 (1975).

I shall recommend that the Company be ordered to recognize and on request bargain in good faith with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the unit employees, and to maintain and give full effect to collective-bargaining contracts covering those employees. I shall further recommend that the Company be ordered to offer Gerald Warden, Joseph Poell, Lawrence O'Dell, Elwood Harres, Albert Lorentzen, Tom Chasteen, and Dave Pusa (the maintenance electricians who were working regularly at the brewery as of December 1984) immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions of employment without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, dismissing if necessary anyone who may have been hired or assigned to perform the work that they had been performing prior to 1 January 1985. The Company shall be ordered to effect these offers of reinstatement by first offering to reestablish its subcontracting arrangement with Lowry. If Lowry is unable or unwilling to reemploy the maintenance electricians and resume its obligations under that arrangement, then the Company shall offer reinstatement to the maintenance electricians as part of its own work force. I shall further recommend that the Company be ordered to make whole all the above-named employees for any loss of earnings and benefits they may have suffered by reason of their terminations. Backpay shall be computed in accordance with the formula approved in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest computed in the manner and amount prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[21] The Company shall also be ordered to reimburse the various trust funds established under the NECA contract for any failure of contributions from Lowry by reason of the Company's unlawful termination of its subcontracting arrangement with Lowry and failure to employ maintenance electricians under the arrangement. In accordance with Board policy, the amount of interest if any due on such payments shall be determined at the compliance stage of this proceeding Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979). The Company shall also be required to preserve and make available to the Board, or its agents, on request, payroll and other records to facilitate the computation of backpay due.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[22]

ORDER

The Respondent, G. Heilman Brewing Co., Inc., Belleville, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing or refusing to recognize and bargain collectively in good faith with Local Union 309, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit consisting of all maintenance electricians employed at its Belleville, Indiana plant, failing or refusing to honor collective-bargaining agreements applicable to those employees, or unilaterally changing the wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of the unit employees without prior notice to the Union and without affording the Union an opportunity to meet and bargain concerning such matters as such representative.

(b) Terminating maintenance electricians at its Belleville plant in violation of their contractual seniority rights or without affording the Union prior notice and an opportunity to negotiate and bargain concerning any change in subcontracting arrangements and its effect on the unit employees.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Gerald Warden, Joseph Poell, Lawrence O'Dell, Elwood Harres, Albert Lorentzen, Tom Chasteen, and Dave Pusa immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions of employment in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision, dismissing if necessary anyone who may have been hired or assigned to perform the work that they had been performing prior to 1 January 1985 or, if their former positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights, privileges, and benefits previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and benefits they may have suffered by reason of their unlawful terminations, as set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Maintain and give full effect to collective-bargaining agreements covering the unit employees, including the maintenance work supplement to the prevailing inside agreement between the Union and Lowry Electric Company and the memorandum of understanding governing seniority rights, unless and until a new agreement or agreements are negotiated or the employees bargain in good faith to an impasse in accordance with the requirements of Section 8(d) of the Act.

(c) Reimburse the various trust funds established under the prevailing basic inside agreement between Southwestern Illinois Division, NECA, and the Union, for any failure of contributions from Lowry Electric Company by reason of Respondent's unlawful termination of its subcontracting arrangement with Lowry and failure to employ maintenance electricians under that arrangement.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its Belleville, Illinois place of business, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[23] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 14, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[21] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716, 171–721 (1962).

[22] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[23] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

Howard University and Howard University Hospital and American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, Council 20, Local 2094, AFL–CIO. Case 5–CA–18268

August 26, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On a charge filed August 8, 1986, by American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, Council 20, Local 2094, AFL–CIO, the Union, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 5, issued a complaint December 22, 1986, against Howard University (Respondent University) and Howard University Hospital (Respondent Hospital). The complaint alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by failing and refusing to provide certain information to the Union that it requested in relation to processing a grievance to arbitration.

On August 21, 1987, all parties entered into a stipulation of facts and filed a motion to transfer the proceeding to the National Labor Relations Board. The parties agreed to waive a hearing before or a decision by an administrative law judge and to submit the case directly to the Board for findings of fact, conclusions of law, and an order based on a stipulated record consisting of the complaint and answer, other formal Board documents, and stipulation of facts with attached exhibits.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

On September 28, 1987, the Board approved the stipulation and ordered the proceeding transferred. The General Counsel and the Charging Party filed briefs.

On the basis of the stipulation of facts, the briefs, and the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent University is chartered by the Federal Government and, as a part of its operation, operates the Respondent Hospital, engaged as a health care institution providing inpatient and outpatient medical and professional services to the community. During the 12 months ending October 31, 1986, the University derived gross revenues in excess of $1 million and purchased and received goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the District of Columbia. Additionally, during the same period, the Hospital derived gross revenues in excess of $250,000 and purchased and received goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the District of Columbia.

The parties stipulated, and we find, that the Respondents are employers engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that the Hospital is a health care institution within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The parties stipulated, and we find, that American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, Council 20, Local 2094, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

The Respondent[1] and the Union have been parties to a collective-bargaining agreement effective from October 1, 1985, to September 30, 1988. The agreement contains a grievance-arbitration procedure.

On October 15, 1985, Carolyn J. Beale, a medical technologist in the unit covered by the agreement, performed compatibility tests on five units of blood that were to be transfused to patient Frances Jackson. During the transfusion Jackson suffered a reaction and died.

The Respondent's investigation showed that two of the five units Beale reported as compatible were incompatible. Based on this investigation Beale was terminated on November 6, 1985.

The Union grieved the discharge and an arbitration hearing was scheduled for May 28, 1986, but eventually was postponed indefinitely.

On May 19, June 2, and July 30, 1986, the Union requested, in preparation for the hearing, inter alia, physicians' and nurses' progress notes and the autopsy protocol report.[2] The Respondent refused to provide the information without written permission, claiming that the information was confidential and privileged.

It is stipulated that in determining the nature and severity of discipline the Respondent considers: (1) the nature and severity of the error, (2) any mitigating factors, and (3) the skill and experience level of the employee. The consequences of the error are also taken into account.

[1] Unless otherwise noted the Respondent to the Respondent Hospital.

[2] The physicians' and nurses' progress notes are a daily record of the case and treatment administered, the results of diagnostic tests, and general observations of the patient's status. The autopsy protocol report sets forth the condition of all the organs examined during the autopsy. It contains the nature of any infirmities that the patient may have had at the time of death and that may have caused or contributed to the death.

B. Discussion

The Union and the General Counsel contend that the information is necessary and relevant to the Union's duty to represent the grievant in arbitration. The Respondent's answer denies the information's relevance and also submits that it is not permitted to divulge the information because the documents are "privileged and confidential." The Respondent's belief is apparently[3] based on its two written policies and procedures for the preparation and maintenance of medical records. The policies are premised on the statutory physician-patient privilege found in D.C. Code § 14–307[4] and the District of Columbia Municipal Regulations, 22 D.C.M.R. Public Health & Medicine, § 2216.2.

The policies of the Respondent provide for release of the medical records or information from the records on written authorization of the patient, court order, subpoena, or statute.

The General Counsel correctly argues that D.C. Code § 14–307(a) applies only to in-court evidentiary disclosures. Doe v. DiGenova, 642 F.Supp. 624 (D.D.C. 1986). Further, autopsy reports do not fall into the category of records relating to diagnosis and treatment that may be privileged. Eureka-Maryland Assurance Co. v. Gray, 121 F.2d 104 (D.C. Cir. 1941). Additionally, the Respondent's own rules permit disclosure where required by "statute." The relevant statute here is the National Labor Relations Act, and it is well established that an employer has an obligation to provide a union with information relevant to its duty as a representative of the employees. Washington Gas Light Co., 273 NLRB 116 (1984). This obligation extends to information required by the union to process a grievance. NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967); Designcraft Jewel Industries, 254 NLRB 791 (1981). The standard for the relevancy of the information sought by the Union is set forth in W-L Moulding Co., 272 NLRB 1239 (1984), in which the Board citing NLRB v. Rockwell-Standard Corp., 410 F.2d 953, 957 (6th Cir. 1969), stated, "The Board's only function in such situation is in 'acting upon the probability that the desired information was relevant, and that it would be of use to the union in carrying out its statutory duties and responsibilities.'"

We find that the information contained in the doctors' and nurses' progress notes and autopsy protocol report are clearly relevant and that it "would be of use to the union" in determining whether Beale's error was the direct cause of the death of the patient. Relevancy, however, is not the sole factor in deciding whether the information must be produced by the Respondent. Although the requested information may be relevant, an employer may not be required to produce it if such production violates confidentiality and privilege. The Respondent's claim of confidentiality must be balanced against the Union's need for relevant information in pursuit of its role as a representative of the employees. Detroit Edison v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301 (1979).

In support of its claim of confidentiality, the Respondent refers to D.C. Code § 14–307. But, as shown, that section refers to "in court" disclosures and specifically excludes autopsy reports. The Respondent further relies on its own policies regarding disclosure. However, these policies, aside from being self-imposed, recognize that in some circumstances medical records and information are disclosable. One of the circumstances is whem it would be required by statute. The party asserting confidentiality has the burden of proof. McDonnell Douglas Corp., 224 NLRB 881 (1976).

We find that the Respondent has failed to carry its burden of proof. The policies under which the Respondent claims confidentiality are not absolute but, rather, provide for disclosure in certain circumstances. The necessity of the Union to evaluate a grievance and adequately represent Beale in an arbitration hearing requires disclosure of the doctors' progress notes, nurses' progress notes, and autopsy protocol report.[5]

For the reasons set forth above, we conclude that the Respondent's failure to provide the Union with the doctors' progress notes, nurses' progress notes, and autopsy protocol report violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. We note that although confidentiality here is not absolute, the Respondent has an interest in ensuring that the information contained in the medical records sought is not divulged to individuals other than those necessary for the evaluation and preparation of Beale's grievance. Thus, in accord with the General Counsel's and the Union's suggestions, our remedy shall direct that the Union refrain from any disclosure of the information to unnecessary persons.

[3] The Respondent has not filed a brief.

[4] The D.C. Code § 114–307(a) provides:

> In the Federal courts in the District of Columbia and District of Columbia courts a physician or surgeon or mental health professional as defined by the District of Columbia Mental Health Information Act of 1978 . . . may not be permitted, without the consent of the person afflicted, or his legal representative, to disclose any information, confidential in its nature, that he has acquired in attending a client in a professional capacity and that was necessary to enable him to act in that capacity, whether the information was obtained from the client or from his family or from the person or persons in charge of him.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of Howard University and Howard University Hospital set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Howard University and Howard University Hospital are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, Council 20, Local 2094, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Union is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act of certain employees in the following appropriate unit:

> Regular, probational staff, temporary and part time employees of Howard University Hospital excluding: security and nursing employees, covered by other contracts, personnel employees, trainees, requisition and student employees, supervisory, confidential office employees, administrative and managerial employees, physical and occupational therapists, and social services and pharmacy professional employees.

4. By failing and refusing to furnish to the Union doctors' progress notes, nurses' progress notes, and the autopsy protocol report as requested in relation to the grievance of Carolyn J. Beale, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

5. The unfair labor practice affects commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in an unfair labor practice within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist and take certain affirmative action that we find necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.[6]

[6] We deny as unnecessary the General Counsel's request for a visitatorial provision. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

ORDER

The Respondent, Howard University and Howard University Hospital, Washington D.C., its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing or failing to bargain in good faith with the Union by failing to furnish to the Union information relevant to the processing of grievances or the administration of the collective-bargaining agreement.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, furnish the Union the doctors' progress notes, nurses' progress notes, and autopsy protocol report on patient Frances Jackson; provided that on receipt of these medical records the Union, its officers, agents, members, and attorneys shall not divulge the information to any other persons who are not involved in or necessary to the resolution of the grievance in question.

(b) Post at its facility in Washington, D.C., copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[7] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain in good faith with the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees Council 20, Local 2094, AFL–CIO by refusing to furnish information relevant to the processing of grievances or the administration of the collective-bargaining agreement.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request furnish the Union the doctors' progress notes, nurses' progress notes, and autopsy protocol report on patient Frances Jackson; provided however, that on receipt of these medical records the Union, its officers, agents, members, and attorneys, shall not divulge the information to any other persons who are not involved in or necessary to the resolution of the grievance in question.

HOWARD UNIVERSITY AND HOWARD UNIVERSITY HOSPITAL

Star Video Entertainment L. P. and Production, Merchandising and Distribution Employees Union, Local 210, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO, Petitioner. Case 22–RC–9934

August 31, 1988

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

The National Labor Relations Board has considered objections to an election held May 13, 1988, and the Regional Director's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows 8 for and 15 against the Petitioner, with 1 challenged ballot, an insufficient number to affect the results.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and brief, has adopted the Regional Director's findings and recommendations, and finds that a certification of results of election should be issued for the following reasons.

As indicated above, an election was held by secret ballot on May 13, 1988.[1] The Petitioner filed timely objections to the election on May 18.[2] The Regional Director, by letter dated May 20, notified the Petitioner of the requirement that evidence in support of objections to an election be submitted in accordance with Section 102.69(a)[3] and that the deadline for submission of supporting evidence was May 26. The Petitioner failed, however, to submit evidence by that date. Although noting the Petitioner's submission of evidence on June 2, the Regional Director issued his report recommending dismissal of the Petitioner's objections for failure to proffer timely evidence in support of the objections.

The Petitioner's attorney contends,[4] inter alia, that on May 27, the day following the Regional Director's deadline, a Board agent granted the Petitioner an additional 48 hours to submit the names and addresses of witnesses and set aside June 3 as the date he would take statements from the Petitioner's witnesses. The Petitioner's attorney stated that he immediately contacted the Petitioner and advised it to present the names and addresses of witnesses within 48 hours. Despite this additional time, however, the Petitioner did not submit any evidence in support of its objections until June 2.[5]

As of September 29, 1986, the Board revised its Rules and Regulations regarding the time periods in which to file documents with the Board, including the submission of evidence in support of objections to an election. In pertinent part, Section 102.69(a) was revised to increase the time period allowed by the rule for the filling of objections to an election and the submission of evidence in support of objections from 5 to 7 days. These revisions, along with an explanatory statement, were published in the Federal Register on July 1, 1986.[6] In so doing, the Board put all parties on notice, with full explanation, that the new rule would be strictly applied. The Petitioner's argument that the Regional Director mechanically applied the rule is particularly unpersuasive in light of the additional time granted by the Board agent.[7]

For these reasons, the Board adopts the Regional Director's recommendations and issues a certification of the election results.

CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

It is certified that a majority of the valid ballots have not been cast for Production, Merchandising and Distribution Employees Union, Local 210, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO, and that it is not the exclusive bargaining representative of the unit employees.

[1] All dates are in 1988 unless otherwise specified.

[2] The Petitioner's objections were filed in accordance with Sec. 102.69(a) of the Board's Rules and Regulations which states, in pertinent part:

> Within 7 days after the tally of ballots has been prepared, any party may file with the Regional Director an original and five copies of objections to the conduct of an election or to conduct affecting the results of the election, which shall contain a short statement of the reasons therefor.

[3] Sec. 102.69(a) states, in pertinent part:

> Within 7 days after the filing of objections, or such additional time as the Regional Director may allow, the party filing objections shall furnish to the Regional Director the evidence available to it to support the objections.

[4] The Petitioner's attorney submitted an affirmation of certain facts that are not challenged in the record.

[5] The Petitioner's attorney, in his affirmation, states, "[u]pon information and belief, the message was misunderstood by the Petitioner's business agent . . . ."

[7] In response to the Petitioner's argument that affidavits were to be taken June 3, it is obvious that the submission of names and addresses within the 48 hours granted by the Board agent was a prerequisite to the taking of statements, both because the Petitioner had already missed the previous deadline and because the Board agent specifically requested the names and addresses of witnesses who were to give statements on June 3. In fact, as indicated above, the Petitioner's attorney acknowledges the terms of the Board agent's extension of time.

Ohio Masonic Home and District 1199, WV/KY/OH, National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, AFL–CIO. Case 9–CA–24009

August 31, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On August 14, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Claude R. Wolfe issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[1]

Relying on Tri-County Medical Center,[2] the judge found, and we agree, for reasons explained below, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by maintaining and enforcing its no-access rule concerning off-duty employees.

The Respondent's rule prohibits off-duty employees "from entering [its] premises to engage in publicly hostile or adverse confrontations." Eight days after the rule was publicized, and shortly before contract negotiations were to begin, employees marched to the Respondent's administration building in an attempt to meet with management officials about resident care issues and employee working conditions.[3] The Respondent thereafter issued written reprimands for violating its rule to those off-duty employees who participated in the march.

In Tri County, the Board stated that a no-access rule concerning off-duty employees is valid only if it:

> (1) limits access solely with respect to the interior of the plant and other working areas; (2) is clearly disseminated to all employees; and (3) applies to off-duty employees seeking access to the plant for any purpose and not just to those employees engaging in union activity. Finally, except where justified by business reasons, a rule which denies off-duty employees entry to parking lots, gates, and other outside nonworking areas will be found invalid.

In the instant case, the judge found that the rule is prima facie invalid because it excludes off-duty employees from all areas of the Respondent's premises and is maintained and enforced for the purpose of preventing a repeat of employee marches on the administration building. The judge also found that the rule is ambiguous because it does not advise employees of what conduct is prohibited and the Respondent can easily ban any statutorily protected activity it decides is a publicly hositile or adverse confrontation.

Generally, the Board has applied the principles of Tri-County to those situations where off-duty employees engaged in organizational activities.[4] However, we agree that Tri-County should apply here, even in the absence of organizational activities, because the Respondent's rule is so overly broad and vague that it could be interpreted to prohibit any type of statutorily protected activity, including organizational activity. Furthermore, the ambiguity of the rule tends to chill protected concerted activities because employees cannot discern what type of activity will be prohibited and, therefore, may avoid engaging in organizational activities out of fear of being disciplined. Thus, the rule here effectively precludes employees from engaging in organizational activities.[5] Accordingly, we conclude that in circumstances where, such as here, an employer promulgates a no-access rule concerning off-duty employees, which, under a reasonable interpretation, could interfere with employees' organizational activities, the legality of that rule will be analyzed under the principles of Tri-County. In this case, inasmuch as the rule could interfere with employees' organizational activities, and because, as the judge found, and we agree, that it does not meet the first and third criteria of Tri-County and the Respondent's business reasons are insufficient to warrant its existence, we find that the Respondent's maintenance and enforcement of its rule violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[6] [3] Off-duty employees had engaged in similar marches on six other occasions. The judge found, and we agree, that the employees were engaged in protected concerted activities.

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and brief adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[4] See Orange Memorial Hospital, 285 NLRB 1099 (1987); Woodview Rehabilitation Center, 265 NLRB 838 (1982).

[5] The Respondent's argument that its no-access rule was not promulgated to restrict union solicitation and other traditional organizational activity, nor applied to any such activity, misses the point. The issue is whether the rule, as written, would encompass any such activity. It is the potentially far and overreaching nature of the rule inherent in its broad and ambiguous language that offends, not whether the particular conduct to which it here was addressed involved organizational activity.

[6] Member Johansen agrees with his colleagues that the Respondent's maintenance and enforcement of its vague and overly broad no-access rule violates Sec. 8(a)(1) because it neither limits access solely to interior or other working areas nor applies to all off-duty employees seeking access to such areas for any purpose. Further, he agrees that the Respondent has not demonstrated that the rule is supported by legitimate business justification. Member Johansen finds it unnecessary, however, to comment on what specific union acitivity is chilled by a rule where all protected activity is prohibited because any such distinction would be unfounded in precedent. See, e.g., Independent Stations Co., 284 NLRB 394 (1987).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Ohio Masonic Home, Springfield, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Raymond D. Neusch, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Dean E. Denlinger, Esq., for the Respondent.

DECISION

CLAUDE R. WOLFE, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me at Springfield, Ohio, on 16 June 1987 pursuant to charges filed and served on 18 February 1987 and complaint issued on 31 March 1987. The complaint alleges that Ohio Masonic Home (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by maintaining and enforcing the following rule since on or about 18 August 1986:

> Off duty employees may not enter the home's premises to engage in publicly hostile or adverse confrontations.

Respondent admits maintaining and enforcing such a rule, but denies such conduct violated the Act, and proffers the following affirmative defenses:

> The Employer maintains a nursing home consisting of both buildings and grounds, all of which are used by its residents.
> Both the residents and their families expect that the premises, including buildings and grounds, can be used quietly, peacefully and serenely. The average age of the residents is 83, with many residents in their 90s and over 100. Many of them are frail.
> The rule which the General Counsel claims is illegal only prohibits "publicly hostile or adverse confrontations" on the Home's premises. This restriction is essential to provide the residents peace, rest, and serenity that they expect and are entitled to.
> Peace, rest and serenity throughout the buildings and the grounds are precisely what the Home produces for its customers.
> The existence of the rule is subject to the grievance and arbitration procedure under the Collective Bargaining Agreement, Articles XVII and XVIII. The Board policy for deferral to arbitration applies in this case.

On the entire record, and after considering the posttrial briefs of the parties, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is an Ohio corporation engaged in the operation of a nursing home in Springfield, Ohio, providing medical and professional care services for the elderly. During the calendar year ending December 31, 1986, Respondent, in the course and conduct of these business operations, derived gross revenues in excess of $100,000. During the same period of time, Respondent, in the course and conduct of these business operations, purchased and received at its Springfield, Ohio facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $5000 directly from points outside the State of Ohio. Respondent is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and a health care institution within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The Union is now, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Respondent and the Union have been party to collective-bargaining agreements covering Respondent's service and maintenance employees since 1973.

On 29 July 1986,[1] Respondent amended its written administrative policy by adding the following to a list of "Offenses which require disciplinary action":

> Off-duty employees may not enter any buildings or work areas for any activity which is not closely related to or a part of an employee's job. Off-duty employees may not enter the Home's premises to engage in publicly hostile or adverse confrontations. These activities are threatening to the residents and are inconsistent with sympathetic care for the elderly.

It is the second sentence of this instruction that is alleged as an unlawful restriction on access to the premises. Thomas D. Scott, Respondent's administrator, explains the reason for this amendment was "[d]emonstrations and threats of demonstrations that bec[a]me so prominent that it was affecting very seriously the well being and attitude and security of the residents who live in the home. We felt obligated to curtail that sort of activity for everyone's benefit." Joyce McGonigal, the assistant administrator, agrees that this new restriction on access was caused by frequent demonstrations. She explains that these demonstrations consisted of large groups of employees walking to the administration building for the purpose of presenting their protest of actions taken by Respondent. This, she states, caused too much confusion for the administrative staff and especially for the elderly residents of the home.

Off-duty employees did, under the leadership of union delegates,[2] several times gather in the home's parking lot in groups ranging from 50 to 100 employees. From there they proceeded in a column of twos to the administration building and attempted to meet with management. These processions, which Respondent calls marches, from the parking lot, past buildings lodging residents who, I find, could observe them if they chose to look out the window, and continuing to the administration building, took place six times, once in August, once in October, and twice in November 1985, and once in August and once in September 1986. There is some testimony by union delegates that these events were conducted with such decorum that one could hear a pin drop when the employees involved were in or at the administration building. I have considerable doubt that a group of 50 or more employees bent on seeking redress for their perceived grievances were that quiet. On the other hand, it does not appear that the conduct of the participants was unusually boisterous, offensive, or uncontrollable. Administrator Scott does testify to a couple of marches that had television coverage as instances where the employees involved were somewhat vociferous and given to chanting their demands. Scott further testifies that when the first march occurred on 27 August 1985, he was called from a meeting with Respondent's board to meet with the participating employees who had entered the building's lobby. According to Scott, there was considerable noise and hostility when he met with them for from 25 to 40 minutes and discussed the new rules prohibiting smoking in residents' rooms and eating in patients' rooms. He advised them Respondent wanted to meet with a union representative rather than an unruly mob. The group dispersed without unusual incident. After this first march, each succeeding march ended at the door of the administration building when Respondent's security officer advised the participants that neither the administrator nor the assistant administrator would meet with them. I have noted that it is unlikely the demonstrations were attended by absolute silence. On the other hand, Respondent's evidence that the congregation of employees was an "unruly mob," as Scott characterized it, consists only of general claims of considerable noise and hostility that do not warrant a finding the characterization was correct. On the whole, it seems to me that given the television coverage of a couple of the processions, which has been known to incite some of those pictured to perform for the camera, together with the strong feelings of the employees involved, it is most probable some of the employees did indeed voice their complaints in more than moderate terms, tone, and volume. It is impossible to discern from the evidence before me exactly how loud the employees were or exactly what they said, but I am persuaded their behavior fell somewhere between the pindrop quiet and unruly mob opinions expressed by witnesses for the opposing parties. I conclude, given the emotional content usually present in such confrontations, that there were some strong statements made by both employees and management at one point or another during the demonstrations but, as Scott concedes and I have previously noted, even in the presence of television coverage employee conduct was not overly boisterous or uncontrollable.

The new rule was announced to the Union by letter of 31 July 1986, 8 months after the last previous march. The reason for this timing, I am persuaded, was that the Union had requested negotiations on a new agreement, those negotiations were about to get underway, and Respondent feared a resumption of the marches. That expectation was met by a march on 7 August. Thereafter, Respondent issued written reprimands to the participants. The reprimands quoted the new rule and characterized the employees' conduct as publicly hostile, adversely confrontational, threatening to the residents, and inconsistent with Respondent's obligation of providing sympathetic care for the elderly. The reprimands were grieved under the collective-bargaining agreement. Respondent denied the grievance, and the Union did not pursue it to arbitration.[4]

Tri-County Medical Center,[3] on which the General Counsel relies, explains that a no-access rule concerning off-duty employees is valid only if it "(1) limits access solely with respect to the interior of the plant and other working areas; (2) is clearly disseminated to all employees; and (3) applies to off-duty employees seeking access to the plant for any purpose and not just to those employees engaging in union activity," and that "except where justified by business reasons, a rule which denies off-duty employees entry to parking lots, gates, and other outside nonworking areas will be found invalid." Respondent's rule is ambiguous and does not meet criteria (1) and (3). Moreover, it is prima facie invalid because it bars entry to all areas of the facility's premises, and because it is maintained and enforced for the purpose of preventing a repeat of the employee marches on the administration building. The marches marshaled by union delegates were protected union and concerted activity for the purpose of pressing employee complaints about working conditions.

Respondent sets forth its view that it has compelling business reasons for the no-access rule as follows:

> There are three compelling business reasons that require the Home to prohibit public, hostile confrontations on its grounds by off-duty employees. First, the Home's product is a peaceful, secure home for the elderly, and it is obligated to provide that atmosphere for its residents. Second, the Home provides daily care to the frail, elderly residents, and it must protect the residents from activity that disturbs them or interferes with their care. Third, the Home is financially dependent on the support of Ohio Masons, both as financial contributors and as the only source of future residents. Hostile public activity on the grounds by the Home's employees threatens the Home's ability to continue receiving the Masons' financial support and to attract new residents. The rule is necessary for these business reasons and is a valid restriction on off-duty employee access to the property.[4]

Administrator Scott relates that of the 409 residents, 264 are ambulatory, the average age is 83, 82 residents are between 90 and 100 years of age, 2 are over 100, 100 are between 85 and 89, 168 are 75 to 84, 44 are 65 to 74, and 13 are less than 64. To gain admission to the home, a resident must be a member of a Masonic Lodge or a member's spouse, must be sponsored by an Ohio Masonic Lodge, and must surrender 90-percent of his or her current and future assets to the home. In return, the resident receives total lifetime care as well as funeral and burial expenses.

[4] The deferral to grievance and arbitration defense raised by Respondent in its answer to the complaint was expressly withdrawn by Respondent in its posttrial brief "in the interest of finally establishing the validity of its rules." The General Counsel contends deferral is inappropriate. Inasmuch as no party requests deferral, its appropriateness in this proceeding need not be determined.

Respondent's premises consist of between 400 and 450 acres. Of this, about 120 acres are the site of Respondent's buildings of which four are occupied by residents. This site also includes outdoor parking, large grassed and wooded areas with benches and picnic tables, and a cemetery for residents. There are benches in the cemetery. The open areas, with the probable exception of parking lots, are regularly frequented by ambulatory residents. Respondent argues that all the home's premises is one big patient care area. This view is also held by Dr. David Dienenfeld, who is an assistant professor of psychiatry and the director of the Division of Geriatric Psychiatry at the University of Cincinnati and whose curriculum vitae[5] clearly demonstrates that he is an expert witness on geriatric psychiatry as the parties stipulated. Dr. Dienenfeld visited the home on 22 May 1987, toured the facilities, and interviewed four of the residents presented by Respondent as individuals who might have suffered ill effects from the employee demonstrations and who were articulate enough to express their views to Dr. Dienenfeld. Dr. Dienenfeld concluded and testified that the resident care area of the home included the grassy and wooded areas as well as the buildings. In so concluding he noted there were many residents on the grassy area when he was there, and further explained that in his view residents are receiving the care of the facility even when no one is giving them direct service because the residents are provided with a reassuring psychological atmosphere of comfort, safety, and containment of the entire facility. Dr. Dienenfeld emphasizes that each of the residents he spoke to spontaneously referred to the home as "our home" and told him they considered the home to be the property of a community of Masons to which they elected to belong. He further states the fact the residents made the single payment for life care created a sense of ownership and community he had not seen in other systems where people pay monthly and can leave at will. He summarizes, "So, there's both the sense of commitment that results from the single payment system and a sense of ownership and community that results from the affiliation of the home with the Masons to whom these residents belong." Dr. Dienenfeld further testified it was his opinion any hostile or adversary conduct on Respondent's premises would have a deleterious impact on residents. As a reason for that opinion, he recites that, as a general rule, hostility or discord in the care system of a controlled community has an impact on the residents of the community who rely on the caretakers, and this impact is shown by anxiety, worry, or depression to some degree. He continues that the four residents he spoke to experienced worry, anxiety, and fear from either witnessing or hearing of the 1985–1986 employee processions. Many of their fears impressed him as beyond those a rational person outside the situation might have. One of the residents feared the Union would take over the home and make residents behave as it wanted them to. Two or three of the four interviewed were concerned there would be a strike, adversely affecting the care provided them. Dr. Dienenfeld stated that, as an expert, he thought that orderly processions of the sort previously conducted by the employees would, if witnessed by residents, be viewed by them as evidence of some tension within the caretaking administration.

In addition to the testimony of Dr. Dienenfeld, Administrator Scott's report that one elderly lady was so upset by one of the employee demonstrations that she could not eat, and some unspecific testimony that other residents were disturbed, Respondent, without objection by the General Counsel, placed a 29 November 1985 note from its medical director in evidence. It reads as follows:

> Re: Stress on the Elderly
> The elderly have less resistance to stress than their younger counter parts, it therefore takes less to upset the elderly because of loss of resilience. The residents here realize that they depend wholly on the employees for their care and daily living activities, food, clothing, etc., and when this care is threatened—real or otherwise—it causes severe emotional stress on an already compromise [sic] nervous and physical system.
> Rumors, strikes, picketing, marches and other activities of this nature along with the attitudes of the employees that take care of them have pronounced negative effect on the residents who are in the end our primary concern.

One cannot question Respondent's assertion that its product is a peaceful and secure home for the elderly. Nor can it be disputed that the avoidance of disruption of health care operations or the disturbance of patients in health care facilities are legitimate business objectives.[6] There is no evidence that the employee activities that caused Respondent to adopt its current no-access rule in any way disrupted or tended to disrupt health care operations at the home. I am persuaded, however, that the employee conduct giving rise to the rule did and would probably continue to cause some residents a degree of anxiety. This is unfortunate, but I do not believe this result warrants a rule so broad as that maintained by Respondent. It is clearly ambiguous, does not advise employees of exactly what conduct is or will be banned, and leaves to the unpredictable discretion of Respondent the ad hoc determination of exactly what is meant by "publicly hostile or adverse confrontations," and whether the purpose of an off-duty employee's entry onto Respondent's premises is to engage in such conduct.[7] Moreover, with all due respect to Dr. Dienenfeld's expertise, I do not believe that the interview of 4 of 409 residents and the observation of residents present in the grassy and wooded areas on a single day, together with the provision of benches and tables for their use, is sufficient predicate for his conclusion, and that of Respondent, that the entire 400 or even 120 acres of the premises are a health care area as such areas are contemplated in the various Board and court cases. There is no objective evidence, and I seriously doubt, that a visitation to parking lots by a resident puts him or her in a health care area, or that any resident receives any kind of hands-on medical care in the home's outside areas. Furthermore, while I have no doubt that a feeling of security and equanimity by residents is a desirable thing, I am not persuaded that important protected activities may be proscribed where there is no persuasive showing, as here, that this overall psychological atmosphere has been seriously eroded by the conduct sought to be prohibited.

With respect to Respondent's claim that the rule is necessary to preserve its financial structure, Greg Nelson, a witness with expertise in health care management, opined that hostile relations among the care providers, which I conclude means management versus employees, would have an impact on future business of the home in that it would discourage others from living there. This speculative testimony unsupported by any other evidence falls far short of establishing a reason for the rule on which Respondent can reasonably rely.

Conclusion

Respondent's rule is an overreaction to a perceived threat without giving due weight to employee rights. As the Supreme Court has noted, this is neither surprising nor unnatural.[8] The evidence clearly shows that the rule was enacted in response to protected union and concerted activity by employees, and it is so ambiguous that it could easily be construed as banning any statutorily protected activity that Respondent decided was a publicly hostile or adverse confrontation. Employees have no way of knowing from a reading of the rule exactly what is prohibited. The ambiguity of the rule, the precipitating reason therefor, the exclusion of off-duty employees from all areas of the home, and the failure of Respondent to convincingly show the rule is necessary to avoid disruption of health care operations or disturbance of its residents,[9] or is necessary to preserve Respondent's financial structure, require a conclusion the rule is invalid, and constitutes unlawful interference with and restraint and coercion of employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by the Act.

Conclusions of Law

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and a health care institution within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By maintaining and enforcing the following rule since 18 August 1986, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act:

> Off duty employees may not enter the home's premises to engage in publicly hostile or adverse confrontations.

4. The unfair labor practice found above has an effect on commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law, and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[10]

ORDER

The Respondent, Ohio Masonic Home, Springfield, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Maintaining or enforcing the following rule:

> Off duty employees may not enter the home's premises to engage in publicly hostile or adverse confrontations.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Rescind the rule quoted above, remove it from its administrative policy, and advise the employees in writing it is no longer being maintained or enforced.

(b) Post at its offices at or near Springfield copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.[12]

[10] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[11] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

[12] The circumstances of this case do not warrant the visitatorial clause requested by the General Counsel.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT maintain or enforce the rule set forth in our administrative policy and reading as follows:

> Off duty employees may not enter the home's premises to engage in publicly hostile or adverse confrontations.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL rescind the above rule and remove it from our written administrative policy.

Lenkei Bros. Cabinet Co. and United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO. Cases 8–CA–20157 and 8–RC–13593

August 31, 1988

DECISION, ORDER, AND DIRECTION OF SECOND ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On May 23, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Marvin Roth issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions[1] and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Lenkei Bros. Cabinet Co., Mount Vernon, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the election held in Case 8–RC–13593 is set aside, and that the case is remanded to the Regional Director for Region 8 to conduct a new election when he deems the circumstances permit the free choice of a bargaining representative.

[Direction of Second Election omitted from publication.]

[1] The General Counsel excepted only to the judge's findings concerning the no-distribution rules.

Charles Z. Adamson, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Roger L. Sabo, Esq., of Columbus, Ohio, for the Respondent Employer.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARVIN ROTH, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were heard at Mansfield, Ohio, on November 2 and 21, 1987.[1] The charge was filed on June 8 by United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO (the Union). The complaint, which issued on July 31, alleges that Lenkei Bros. Cabinet Co. (Respondent or the Company) violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act. The gravamen of the complaint is that the Company allegedly engaged in unlawful interrogation, solicitation of grievances, promises and grants of benefits, threats of plant closure, and withholding of benefits, creating the impression of surveillance, and maintaining an unlawful no-distribution rule. The Company's answer denies the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices.

Pursuant to a petition filed on February 11 by the Union, and a Stipulated Election Agreement approved on March 2, an election was conducted on April 2 among the employees of the Company in the following appropriate unit:

> All employees, including all sanding employees, sub-assembly employees, hardware employees, finishers, laminating employees, mill machine operators, drivers, journeymen, leadmen and maintenance employees, but excluding all salesmen, office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The tally of ballots showed that of approximately 73 eligible voters, 17 voted for and 55 against the Union. One challenged ballot was insufficient in number to affect the results of the election. The Union filed timely objections to the election, numbered 1 through 3, alleging respectively that the Company (1) granted substantial wage and benefit increases on March 1, and improperly influenced employees to change their views regarding union representation, (2) engaged in coercive interrogation on April 1, and (3) restored wage rates and benefits to certain employees prior to the election. On August 10 the Regional Director issued his order directing hearing on objections, order consolidating cases, and notice of hearing. The Regional Director found that the objections, which in part were coextensive with allegations of the complaint, raised substantial and material factual issues that warranted a hearing, and that his investigation disclosed other matters, covered by the complaint, which also warranted a hearing. The Regional Director ordered that the unfair labor practice and representation cases be consolidated for the purposes of hearing, ruling, and decision by an administrative law judge.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to participate, to present relevant evidence, to argue orally, and to file briefs. On the entire record in this case,[2] and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and having considered the briefs submitted by the General Counsel and the Company, I make the following

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

The Company, an Ohio corporation with an office and place of business in Mount Vernon, Ohio, is engaged in the manufacture of cabinets. In the operation of its business the Company annually receives at its Mount Vernon facility goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside Ohio. I find, as the Company admits, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

[1] All dates are in 1987 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] Certain errors in the transcript have been noted and corrected.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES AND THE OBJECTIONS TO THE ELECTION

In January the Union commenced an organizational campaign among the Company's employees. Then maintenance employee Phillip McElroy testified in sum as follows: About January 30 Mill Machine Area Supervisor Michael Oswald approached him at work. Oswald asked him how he felt about the Union, whether he attended union meetings, whether he signed a union card, and what the union adherents wanted. To all questions, McElroy answered that he did not know. Oswald proceeded to demonstrate his knowledge by naming five employees who attended union meetings, and the dates, times, and locations of union meetings. He did not indicate the source of his information. Oswald testified that he did not talk to any of the employees about the Union prior to February 2, and he specifically denied having the alleged conversation with McElroy. According to Oswald, Company President Bela Lenkei called the supervisors together at work on February 1, and told them that a union was trying to organize the shop. Because February 1 was a Sunday, his testimony must be viewed with some skepticism. In fact, as indicated by the testimony of Production Manager Charles Sesser, the Company knew of the organizational campaign by Friday, January 30. As will be discussed, Oswald's testimony concerning a meeting conducted by Lenkei was demonstrably incredible and inconsistent with Lenkei's testimony. However, McElroy was not a wholly reliable witness. As will be discussed, his testimony was in error concerning the number of meetings for employees conducted by Lenkei, and the dates and locations of those meetings. On balance, as between McElroy and Oswald, I find McElroy to be the more credible witness, and I credit his testimony concerning his conversation with Oswald.

McElroy further testified in sum as follows: During February and March he had some three to five conversations with Production Manager Sesser concerning the Union. Sesser was not his supervisor, but McElroy frequently had to use his office to order parts. Sesser asked him the same questions as Oswald, and also asked who signed union cards. He indicated that he knew when and where union meetings were conducted. He discussed the disadvantages of unions. Sesser said that if the Union was voted in the Company would shut down because they would never stand for the Union. Sesser testified in sum as follows: McElroy came into his office nearby every day to talk, and freely expressed his opinions. McElroy volunteered information about the Union, and indicated that he was opposed to unionization. Sesser did not ask McElroy whether he signed a card or attended union meetings, and did not tell him who signed cards or attended meetings. Sesser testified that he did not know such information, but admitted that he picked up some "hearsay." Sesser testified that he did not talk with McElroy about the plant shutting down if a union came in. He testified that an employee told him that the Union said that Bela could not shut down the plant. The employees asked if this was true. Sesser responded by asking how the plant could function if all the employees went on strike. In contrast to Oswald, I have no reason to question Sesser's overall credibility. Neither version (McElroy's or Sesser's) is inherently improbable. I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove by a preponderance of the credible evidence that Sesser made statements and asked questions as testified to by McElroy. Therefore, I am recommending that paragraph 10 of the complaint be dismissed.

The complaint alleges that at employee meetings about February 13 and March 12, the exact dates being unknown, President Lenkei respectively (1) solicited employee grievances, promised to remedy grievances, and blamed the withholding of a wage increase on the Union's organizing campaign, and (2) told the employees that he wished to make beneficial changes in the shop, such as posting jobs for bid, but could not do so because of the Union. Mill machine operator Andy Lennington testified that about March 21 (the date being suggested by the General Counsel), he attended a meeting of night-shift employees at which Lenkei spoke. Supervisor Oswald was present. Lennington testified as follows: Lenkei answered employees' questions. Employees asked why some jobs were not posted. Lenkei answered that job posting (as provided in the Company's employee handbook) had been disregarded, but jobs would be posted from then on. (According to Lennington, Lenkei explained the matter of job posting at another meeting.) Lenkei did not always give full answers to the employees' questions. Oswald said that there were things that Lenkei wanted to say, but could not because of the union activity. Lenkei said that when he and his brother were partners, they disagreed on many things, and consequently Bela was unable to make changes that he wanted (Bela and Lazlo Lenkei were partners in the business until late January 1987, when Lazlo left the firm about the time the union campaign began. Until then, Lazlo was in charge of plant operations and, consequently, was responsible for personnel matters). On cross-examination by the Company, Lennington testified that he was not sure of the date of the ostensible March 21 meeting, but that it took place before the election.

Phillip McElroy testified as follows: During February and March he attended two meetings of employees in the plant lunchroom, at which Lenkei spoke. About 25 to 30 first-shift employees were present at each meeting. The first meeting took place about 3 weeks before the election, and the second about 1 week before the election. McElroy also attended a dinner meeting at Mazza's Restaurant on Sunday, March 29, at which Lenkei also spoke. Regarding the plant meetings, Lennington testified that Lenkei said basically the same things at both meetings. Lenkei asked the employees for their gripes, and why they did not come to him before going to the Union. Employees asked about new vending machines in the lunchroom. Lenkei said they were looking into the matter, and would be getting new ones. The Company installed new vending machines shortly after the election. The employees asked about wages and fringe benefits. Lenkei said he could not do anything about pay increases or benefits because of the election petition. Oswald said that Lenkei could not take questions about benefits because he was not in a position to promise anything. McElroy did not testify about what was said at the dinner meeting. The General Counsel presented four employee witnesses. However, only Lennington and McElroy testified concerning meetings conducted by Lenkei.

President Lenkei testified that on February 5, shortly after his brother left the firm and Lenkei learned of the union compaign, he addressed the employees in groups at the plant. He conducted three meetings for day-shift employees and one for the night shift. He also invited the employees, but did not require them, to attend a dinner meeting at Mazza's on March 29, at which he spoke. Lenkei testified that these were the only meetings that he addressed in connection with the union campaign, although supervisors conducted informal coffee sessions with employees in late March. Supervisors Roger McDonald, Oswald, and Sesser corroborated his testimony in this regard. Lenkei testified in sum as follows concerning the February 5 meetings: After consulting with his attorney, he prepared and delivered a speech (the text was not offered in evidence). Lenkei explained that there was a new situation with his brother gone from the business, and he also discussed the Union. After delivering his speech he called for "questions." He did not refer to "problems" or "grievances." The employees asked whether the Company discontinued the practice of posting job openings for bidding when it started up a second shift in the fall of 1986. Lenkei answered that to his knowledge the practice was not discontinued. He then referred the question to Supervisor Oswald, who was present at the meeting. Oswald said that they had skipped posting several times because of the large number of hires at that time. Lenkei then told the employees that the practice was not discontinued and would be carried on as in the past. The employees also asked about new vending machines. The existing machines did not provide food service. This resulted in particular problems when the Company started up a second shift because lunchwagons did not serve the plant during evenings. In December a petition was circulated and presented to management, requesting improved vending facilities, and asserting that "the present service is not acceptable." The petition was signed by some 67 employees and supervisors. Lenkei testified that on February 5 he told the employees that "we are working on it." Lenkei told the employees, as part of his prepared speech, that the Company customarily gave general wage increases in February or March, and that having assumed his brother's duties, he would look at wages and do what he could. He did not know what he could or could not do, and would have to consult his attorney. Supervisor Oswald testified that Lenkei spoke to the employees in the plant lunchroom on February 5. Lenkei called for questions. One employee asked what if any changes would be made in view of Lazlo Lenkei's departure. According to Oswald, Lenkei, who was obviously upset, asserted that he could not really do anything for the employees, and repeated the same "do's and don'ts" that he had given his supervisors, i.e., that they could not threaten, promise, or interrogate. Oswald's version of the meeting was thus inconsistent with that of Lenkei, and patently incredible.

I credit Lenkei's testimony that he addressed the employees only on February 5 and at the restaurant meeting on March 29, and I also credit his version of the February 5 meeting. The employee witnesses were at best confused about when Lenkei spoke. The complaint had him speaking on or about February 13 and March 12. Andy Lennington, who was completely uncertain, adopted the General Counsel's suggestion that he spoke on or about March 21, but also referred to an earlier meeting when Lenkei discussed job posting. Phillip McElroy, who was also uncertain, had him speaking on or about March 12 and 26. If Lenkei spoke after the election campaign was underway, the Union probably would have monitored his activities in order to enable it to make an informed reply, and therefore would have known when he spoke. This circumstance tends to corroborate Lenkei's testimony that he spoke before the Union filed its election petition. It is also unlikely that, as testified by McElroy, Lenkei would say that he could not do anything about pay increases because of the election petition. It is undisputed that in early March Lenkei summoned the employees individually into his office and informed them of their respective wage increases. As indicated, the Union asserted that the Company interfered with the election by granting the wage increases. The complaint does not allege that the wage increases were unlawful. The Union did not appear at this hearing, and consequently presented no evidence in support of this objection. The Company presented uncontroverted evidence that for 8 or 9 years it has regularly followed a practice of granting employee wage increases in late February or early March. I find that the Union's objection insofar as it pertains to the wage increases is without merit. As indicated, I also find that the fact of the wage increases tends to corroborate Lenkei's version of the February 5 meeting.

Having so found, I further find, in light of the credited evidence, that the Company, by Lenkei, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by soliciting and promising redress of employee grievances in order to discourage support for the Union. Lenkei wanted to know why the employees went to the Union. As found, Supervisor Oswald questioned Phillip McElroy about what the union adherents wanted. Lenkei addressed the employees on February 5 at least in part as a response to the union organizational campaign. Whether he called for "questions" or "gripes," the employees could reasonably infer that they were free to ask about what was in store for them in the future. They asked, and Lenkei did not discourage, such questions. In December 1986 the employees demonstrated their strong concern about food vending machines by petitioning the Company for better service. Nevertheless the Company did nothing about the matter, and said nothing about the matter, until the employees renewed their request at the February 5 meeting. Lenkei then told the employees that the Company was working on it. The Company presented evidence that new vending machines were installed in May 1987. However, the Company did not present evidence about when the machines were ordered. The inference is warranted, and I so find, that the machines were ordered after the February 5 meeting. I find that by telling the employees that the Company was "working on it," Lenkei impliedly promised the employees that they would get improved vending machine service. Regarding job posting, Lenkei told the employees that the practice was not discontinued and would be carried on as in the past. In fact, as Supervisor Oswald admitted to the employees, and the employees already knew, the Company since the fall of 1986 had not consistently posted job openings. Therefore in fact, albeit not in form, Lenkei promised the employees that from then on the Company would post job openings for bidding.

> . . . the solicitation of grievances at preelection meetings carries with it an inference that an employer is implicitly promising to correct those inequities it discovers as a result of its inquiries. Thus, the Board has found unlawful interference with employee rights by an employer's solicitation of grievances during an organizational campaign although the employer merely stated it would look into or review the problem but did not commit itself to specific corrective action; the Board reasoned that employees would tend to anticipate improved conditions of employment which might make union representation unnecessary. However, it is not the solicitation of grievances itself that is coercive and violative of Section 8(a)(1), but the promise to correct grievances or a concurrent interrogation or polling about Union sympathies that is unlawful; the solicitation of grievances merely raises an inference that the employer is making such a promise, which inference is rebuttable by the employer.

See also Ace Hardware Corp., 271 NLRB 1174 (1984). It is of course unlawful for an employer to expressly or impliedly promise or grant benefits to its employees in order to discourage support for a union, regardless of whether such conduct occurs in the context of a solicitation of benefits. NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405, 409–410 (1964). Applying the foregoing principles to the facts of the present case, I find for the reasons discussed that the Company promised its employees improved vending machine service and regular job posting and bidding in order to discourage support for the Union, and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. To this extent I find that the General Counsel has proven the allegations of paragraph 7(a) of the complaint. I am recommending that the balance of paragraph 7(a) (blame for withholding wage increase) and paragraph 7(f) of the complaint be dismissed.

Employee Michael Lang testified in sum as follows: About March 25 Supervisor Roger McDonald conducted a meeting of night-shift employees. Some 20 to 30 employees, including Lang, were present. McDonald asked the employees if the Union was their bargaining agent, and what the Union promised them. No one answered. He asked the employees to tell him their problems, and again they did not answer. McDonald said they should have gone to Bela with their problems instead of going to the Union. McDonald said that he did not know where the employees got the idea that Bela could not shut the doors if they tried to bring in the Union; that Bela could shut the doors whenever he wanted. McDonald testified that about March 23 and 24 he conducted "coffee sessions" with the employees. Preparatory to these sessions, the Company provided him with a written outline of what he should say. The outline, which was presented in evidence, stated at one point that: "The Company is not allowed to make promises, nor do we want to make promises." McDonald initially testified that he asked the employees if they had any "grievances." McDonald subsequently sought to back away from this admission, testifying that he only asked if they had any questions. McDonald testified that the employees asked about improved fringe benefits, including an additional week's vacation and an additional holiday. Notwithstanding the above quotation from his outline, McDonald testified that he did not say what could be done with respect to the election. Rather, McDonald testified that he told the employees that "Bela had to confirm all this stuff here and that this was the issues that I'd have to bring up with Bela and if Bela wanted to agree to this he would go from there." McDonald admitted telling the employees that he would relay their concerns to Lenkei. McDonald further testified that the employees asked whether Bela could shut down the plant if the Union came in, and he answered that the Union was not the concern, and that Bela could close the plant anytime he wanted.

McDonald testified that Lang was present at the meeting that he described. Therefore it appears that Lang and McDonald were both testifying about the same meeting. Notwithstanding the contradictions in McDonald's testimony, I am not persuaded that Lang accurately described the meeting. Lang's description of what McDonald said about plant closing suggests that the employees, rather than McDonald, raised the question of whether Lenkei could close the plant if the Union came in. In light of McDonald's detailed testimony concerning discussion of employee grievances, it seems unlikely that, as testified to by Lang, the employees remained silent throughout the meeting. I find that McDonald's admissions, rather than his contradictory self-serving assertions, most accurately reflect what was said at the meeting. The Company conducted these coffee sessions for the purpose of discouraging employee support for the Union. To that end McDonald solicited employee grievances. By promising to refer the employees' requests for improved fringe benefits to Lenkei, and suggesting that Lenkei might act favorably on those requests, McDonald impliedly promised benefits in order to discourage employee support for the Union and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Uarco, Inc., supra, Ace Hardware, supra. However, I find that McDonald did not threaten the employees with plant closure if they selected the Union as their representative. Rather, the employees suggested this possibility, and McDonald correctly answered that Lenkei could go out of business as he wished. See Jefferson Ready Mix, 284 NLRB 977, 980 (1987).

Several allegations of the complaint concern alleged statements made by Lenkei in early March, when he individually informed employees of their respective pay raises. Michael Lang testified as follows: About March 5, he was summoned to Lenkei's office. Lenkei informed him of his pay increase. He said that he was aware of the union activity, and that some thought it would be illegal to give raises at that time, but that he saw no problem because the Company always gave raises at that time of year. Lenkei asked Lang if he had any problems. Lang said that he was promised another job opening, but that the job was given to a new employee. Lang also complained that he wanted to get off the night shift. Lang had previously spoken to Lenkei and Supervisor McDonald about this matter, and indicated that he might quit if he was not transferred. Lenkei answered that he did not like a night shift, but it was necessary because of the Company's increased volume of business. Regarding both matters, Lenkei said that he would check into the situation, and that if Lang did not hear anything in a couple of weeks, he should return to see him. Lenkei later told Lang that the job in question did not involve an increase in pay. Lang still wanted the job, but he did not get it. About April 1 Lang was permanently transferred to the day shift.

In the fall of 1986, the Company started up a second shift with about 20, mostly inexperienced, employees. The Company needed a few experienced employees to work with them. Supervisor McDonald asked employees Lang and Jeff Shandyfelt. Shandyfelt was reluctant because of family considerations. The two employees agreed to alternate on the second shift. However, Lang's wife complained to him about the arrangement. McDonald and Lenkei testified in sum that Lang asked both of them if he could return to the day shift. Lenkei referred the request to McDonald for decision. McDonald testified that when he transferred Lang and Shandyfelt on a rotating basis, he told them that the arrangement would continue until the new employees were trained. After the night-shift employees had 3 to 4 months training and experience, McDonald told Lenkei that he could now consider Lang's request. Lang again raised the matter with Lenkei when Lenkei informed him of his wage increase. Lenkei said he spoke to McDonald, who would make some kind of arrangement. About the second week in March McDonald told Lang that the second-shift employees were now sufficiently experienced, and that he and Shandyfelt would continue rotating on the night shift until the end of March, when they would both return to the day shift. Lenkei did not testify about the matter of the job transfer, and he did not dispute Lang's version of their March 5 conversation.

Andy Lennington also testified about conversations with management concerning his grievances. Lennington had been working for the Company for about 10 months. He worked in the mill machine area, but wanted more diversified experience. Lennington testified that about March 1 he met with Lenkei and Supervisor Oswald in the shop office. Lennington told them that he wanted more diversified experience. Lenkei answered that they would move him around eventually. Lennington did not testify that management initiated this meeting, or that Lenkei asked him for his grievances. Oswald testified in sum that from the time Lennington started with the Company he wanted more diversified experience, but that after the union campaign began he pressed his requests more vigorously. Lennington also complained that Phillip McElroy was not properly servicing his machines. At the time Lennington had an assistant who was learning the work. Lenkei testified that he told Lennington, in sum, that the Company wanted its machine operators to be able to operate most of the machines, and Lennington was not yet trained on all machines, but that job opportunities really depended on the kinds of orders that the Company received. Lennington remained at his job (which involved several machines) until August or September 1987, when he was transferred to other machinery.

The General Counsel alleges that the Company solicited grievances from Lang, impliedly promised him a promotion, and granted him the benefit of a shift transfer, and promised Lennington improved working conditions, all in order to discourage their union activity and sympathy. With respect to Lennington, I find that the testimony of Lennington, Lenkei, and Oswald together reflects the substance of what transpired. I do not find any violation of the Act. Lenkei did not solicit Lennington's grievances. Rather Lennington vigorously pressed his own grievance. Lennington did not get anything he did not already have, or would have gotten whether or not the Union was in the picture. In fact, he was not transferred until long after the election. Lenkei simply stated the Company's policy. In so doing he gave Lennington the same answer he would have given if there were no union in the picture. Therefore I am recommending that the pertinent allegation of the complaint (par. 7(b)) be dismissed. The allegations involving Lang present a closer question. As with Lennington, the testimony of Lang, his supervisor, McDonald, and Lenkei reflects the substance of what transpired. I find in the circumstances that Lenkei did not violate the Act. As found, the Company regularly granted pay increases about March 1 of each year. The amount of the raise varied from one employee to another. The evidence does not indicate whether Lazlo Lenkei personally informed the employees of their respective increases. In the absence of such evidence, I cannot assume that Lenkei's interview with Lang was an unusual procedure which was motivated by the union campaign. These interviews were in the nature of an annual review, in which it would be natural for Lenkei to ask the employees if they had any problems. In sum, the evidence indicates that Lenkei acted as he would if there had been no union in the picture. I further find that by transferring Lang and Shandyfelt back to the day shift, the Company did what it would have done even in the absence of a union. The Company knew that both were unhappy on the second shift, and anticipated that their stay would be temporary. Lang was strongly pressing the matter, and threatening to quit. In these circumstances it is not surprising that the Company acceded to Lang's request when the time was appropriate. Lang never got the job transfer that he requested. Therefore, I am recommending that the pertinent allegations of the complaint (pars. 7(e) and (g)) be dismissed.

Employee Daniel Daley began working for the Company in 1979, during an economic strike by the Glassworkers Union, which then represented the Company's employees. The Company continued to operate during the strike, and the Glassworkers Union eventually abandoned or lost its representative status. Daley testified in sum as follows: About March 3, Bela Lenkei summoned Daley to his office and informed him of his pay increase. Lenkei mentioned that his brother had left or was leaving. He said that he knew Daley was involved with the Union, and could not understand why. Lenkei asked whether the Union was the way to go, and then proceeded to answer his own question. He said that he would not recognize or bargain with the Union, that "without bargaining you cannot form a union," and therefore, "the Union would probably ask you to go on strike." Lenkei said that he did not understand why the employees went to the Union instead of coming to him personally about their problems. On cross-examination, Daley admitted that Lenkei said he could not make any promises at that time. Lenkei testified that when he met with Daley and the other employees to inform them of their wage increases, he did not ask for their problems, but did invite questions. He testified that he talked about the Union, and discussed the 1979 strike with Daley. Lenkei testified that he did not discuss what would happen if the Union got in, or say that he would not bargain with the Union or shut down before he would bargain. The General Counsel did not cross-examine Lenkei about this or any other conversation or meeting with the employees. I credit Daley, except that I do not credit his testimony that Lenkei said he would not recognize or bargain with the Union. Daley knew that the Company bargained with the Glassworkers Union in 1979, and that the Glassworkers Union did not file unfair labor practice charges. Therefore it is unlikely that Lenkei would have told Daley that he would not recognize or bargain with the present Union. If he had taken this approach, it is probable that Daley would have questioned Lenkei about why 1987 differed from 1979. However, Daley did not do so. Lenkei's remarks were based on objective facts, namely, the events of 1979, when the Company bargained in good faith to impasse, the Glassworkers Union struck, and the strike was unsuccessful. Therefore by reminding Daley of these events, Lenkei did not unlawfully tell Daley that unionization was a futile act. I further find, on the basis of Daley's own credited testimony, that Lenkei did not unlawfully interrogate Daley or make him promises of benefit. In context, it is evident that Lenkei simply posed a rhetorical question, which he proceeded to answer by reminding Daley of the events of 1979. In light of Daley's testimony that Lenkei said he could not make any promises at that time, I find that Lenkei did not make express or implied promises of benefit. Therefore, I am recommending that the pertinent allegations of the complaint (pars. 7(c) and (d)) be dismissed.

At this point I shall return to the January 30 conversation between Supervisor Oswald and employee McElroy. I find that the Company, by Oswald, unlawfully conveyed the impression of surveillance of employee union activity, when Oswald confronted McElroy with specific information concerning union meetings, after McElroy professed that he did not know about such activity. The employees had not, at that time, gone public with their campaign. I further find that the Company, by Oswald, unlawfully interrogated McElroy about his union attitude and activities and that of his fellow employees. Oswald had no legitimate reason for his persistent questioning of McElroy. In light of subsequent developments, it is evident that the Company had an unlawful purpose. Oswald sought to find out what the union adherents wanted, in order that the Company might solicit and promise redress of grievances in order to discourage employee support for the Union. Oswald did not give McElroy any assurance against reprisal. Rather, Oswald followed up his interrogation by unlawfully conveying the impression of company surveillance of union activity. Oswald thereby demonstrated to McElroy that it would do him no good to avoid answering Oswald's questions. In this context the questioning was coercive and unlawful. Therefore, the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by interrogation and conveying the impression of company surveillance of employee union activity.

At all times material the Company has maintained work rules, which are set forth in a handbook distributed to the employees. The handbook states in pertinent part as follows:

> I. Typical examples of misconduct by an employee which are considered inexcusable, and shall be cause for immediate discharge or temporary layoff:
> . . . .
> 6. Solicitation by employees on working time.
> 7. Distribution of literature on company property which in any way interferes with the work.
> . . . .
> NO SOLICITATION OR DISTRIBUTION
> No employee is permitted to solicit membership in any organization or solicit signatures on any petitions or to carry out any other type of solicitation during working time.
> No employee is permitted to engage in any distribution of any literature or other materials in working areas.

The evidence fails to indicate that the Company invoked the above rules during the union campaign, or that the Company commented on or explained the rules to its employees.

The General Counsel does not contend that the above restrictions on solicitation are unlawful. However, the General Counsel argues (Br. 11) that "These two no distribution rules when read together are ambiguous enough to give employees the impression that they are not allowed to distribute literature anywhere on Respondent's property at any time." In support of this argument, the General Counsel relies on Baddour, Inc., 281 NLRB 546, 547 (1986). I do not agree with the General Counsel's argument. In Baddour, the rule at issue stated as follows:

> To avoid interruption of work and complications and distractions in our operations, employees are not permitted to sell anything, distribute or post literature or other matter, make speeches or collections, or engage in any kind of solicitation during their working time, or in any way to interfere with the work of other employees.

The Board held that the language following "solicitation" could "reasonably be read as modifying only the proscription on solicitation," thereby indicating a blanket ban on distribution and all other enumerated activities. The present case presents no such ambiguity. The Company's rules deal separately with solicitation and distribution. There are two distinct restrictions on distribution. One prohibits distribution "in working areas." The other prohibits distribution "which in any way interferes with the work." The second prohibition is tantamount to a restriction on distribution of literature during working time. Indeed the prohibition is even narrower because distribution during working time does not always interfere with work. In Baddour, the Board indicated that such modifying language is permissible. The rule in Baddour was unlawful because the employer failed to make clear that the modifying language applied to activity other than solicitation. In the present case, the modifying language plainly and expressly applies to distribution. In sum, the present rules restrict distribution of literature only in working areas and on working time. Therefore the rules are presumptively lawful. See Eastex, Inc. v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 556, 570–571 (1978).

The above findings cover all allegations of the complaint. No evidence was presented in support of Union Objections 2 and 3. Therefore I am recommending that these objections be overruled. For the reasons discussed, I find that the Company did not interfere with the election by granting wage increases about March 1. Therefore and to this extent Objection 1 is without merit. The remainder of Objection 1, namely, that the Company improperly influenced employees to change their views regarding union representation, depends on the merits of the complaint allegations.

As found, during the period between the filing of the petition and the election, the Company, by Supervisor McDonald, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by impliedly promising the employees improved fringe benefits, in order to discourage employee support for the Union. I find that this conduct was sufficiently serious and substantial to warrant setting aside the election. McDonald spoke directly to some 20 to 30 employees, i.e., about one-third of the unit. He impliedly promised improved benefits, including more vacation and holiday time. These were matters of interest to the entire unit. Moreover, McDonald's unlawful conduct cannot be viewed in isolation. McDonald's conduct was part of a course of unlawful conduct that commenced prior to the election petition, including President Lenkei's captive-audience speeches to all the employees, in which he established the pattern of the Company's antiunion campaign by promising improved vending machine service and regular job posting and bidding. Lenkei's unlawful conduct "lends meaning and dimension" to McDonald's subsequent unlawful conduct. Blue Bird Body Co., 251 NLRB 1481 fn. 2 (1980), enfd. mem. 677 F.2d 112 (5th Cir. 1982).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. By interfering with, restraining, and coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act, the Company has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.
4. By promising benefits to its employees in order to discourage support for the Union, the Company interfered with the Board election held on April 2, 1987.
5. The aforesaid labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Company has committed violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be required to cease and desist and to post appropriate notices. As the Company unlawfully interfered with the conduct of the election on April 2, 1987, I shall recommend that the election be set aside and that a new election be directed at such time as the Regional Director deems appropriate.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[3]

ORDER

The Respondent, Lenkei Bros. Cabinet Co., Mount Vernon, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Expressly or impliedly promising employees benefits or redress of grievances in order to discourage support for United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO or any other labor organization.

(b) Interrogating employees concerning their union attitude or activities or those of their fellow employees.

(c) Conveying the impression of surveillance of union activity by indicating that it knows the dates, times, and places of union meetings, the names of employees who attended, or other information concerning union activity.

[3] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its place of business in Mount Vernon, Ohio, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 8, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the election previously conducted on April 2, 1987, is set aside and a new election shall be directed at such time as the Regional Director for Region 8 deems appropriate.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT expressly or impliedly promise you benefits or redress of grievances in order to discourage support for United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT interrogate you concerning your union attitude or activities or those of your fellow employees.

WE WILL NOT convey the impression of surveillance of union activity by indicating that we know the dates, times, and places of union meetings, the names of employees who attended, or other information concerning union activity.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of your right to engage in union or concerted activities, or to refrain therefrom.

LENKEI BROS. CABINET CO.

Stroh Brewery Company and Helen L. Cannady. Case 11–CA–12412

August 31, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On March 15, 1988, Administrative Law Judge William N. Cates issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief. The General Counsel and the Respondent also filed answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Stroh Brewery Company, Winston-Salem, North Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

George Carson, II, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Guy F. Driver Jr., Esq. and C. Daniel Barrett (Womble, Carlyle, Sandridge & Rice), of Winston-Salem, North Carolina, for the Company.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM N. CATES, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me in Winston-Salem, North Carolina, on 17 December 1987[1] pursuant to the 6 August complaint issued by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board through the Regional Director for Region 11 of the Board. The complaint is based on a charge filed on 22 June by Helen L. Cannady, an individual (Cannady or Charging Party), against Stroh Brewery Company (Company or Stroh).

In the complaint the General Counsel alleges the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act on 12 March when Donald L. Steele, the manager of industrial relations at its Winston-Salem, North Carolina plant, instructed employees to cease cooperating with the investigation by Teamsters Local 391 (Union) of a grievance unless Steele was present. The General Counsel alleges the Company violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging Helen L. Cannady and Tammy T. Ware on 1 April because Cannady assisted the Union and because the Company suspected Ware had also assisted the Union.

By its answer the Company admits certain factual matters but denies violating the Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Company, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

The Company is an Arizona corporation with a brewery located in Winston-Salem, North Carolina, where it brews beer commercially. During the past 12 months the Company received at its Winston-Salem plant goods and raw materials valued in excess of $50,000 direct from points located outside North Carolina. The Company admits, and I find, it is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Company admits, and I find, that Chauffeurs, Teamsters and Helpers Local Union No. 391, a/w the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. On 1 November, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Keystone Bakery, 287 NLRB 17 (1987).

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Setting

Teamsters Local 391 represents the production and maintenance employees at the Company's Winston-Salem brewery. For some 20 years Local 391 has been a party to collective-bargaining agreements (CBA) covering the bargaining unit. Initially the CBAs were with Schlitz Brewing Company, the Company's predecessor and, in the last several years, the CBAs have been with the Company herein.

Helen L. Cannady and Tammy T. Ware were regular part-time employees who worked for Stroh as tour guides at the Winston-Salem brewery. The duties of tour guides include conducting visitors on tours of Stroh's brewery, entertaining guests in the Company's hospitality room (the Strohaus), and working in the Company's gift shop. Tour guides work under the supervision of Hospitality Manager Kay J. Purcell. Purcell reports to Donald L. Steele, manager of industrial relations at Winston-Salem. The tour guides are not included in the bargaining unit represented by Teamsters 391, and they are not represented by any union. As of the hearing, the Company employed nine tour guides. That appears to be one more than the number named on the mid-March shift schedule for the tour guides (G.C. Exh. 7).

During the time relevant here, the Company contracted with Globe Security to provide security guards to control the ingress and egress at the brewery from a guardhouse at the plant entrance. Tourists or other visitors seeking a tour of the brewery are admitted to the facility through a gate controlled by the security guards. Before November 1986, the Company conducted tours beginning at 9 a.m. and concluding with the 4 p.m. tour. Starting in November 1986, and during the relevant time in 1987, hours for the tours, which were 30 minutes each, began at 11 a.m. and concluded with the tour departing at 4:30 p.m. At the conclusion of a tour, the tour guides escort the visitors to the Strohaus and serve them a maximum of three beers each. The tourists also may visit the gift shop at that time.

Stroh publicizes the tours and the tour hours. Its efforts in this respect range from a prominent display on a large billboard by major highways in the area, to tourist brochures, to a posting of the hours on the door of the Strohaus. The Company spends a substantial amount of money in this respect, with the cost of the billboards alone being some $1200 a month. The Company's purpose in having the tours, and in publicizing the hours of the tours, is to foster goodwill and promote its product.

B. Contentions

The General Counsel contends the Company fired Cannady because she was cooperating with the Union as a potential witness concerning a grievance over the discharge of Aubrey Martin, a member of the production and maintenance bargaining unit. Cannady was terminated, the General Counsel argues, because the Company "would not tolerate involvement by non-unit employees in its bargaining relationship." Ware was terminated because she was linked to Cannady in the facts the Company supposedly relied on, and for the additional reason that the Company, by Industrial Relations Manager Steele, observed Ware conversing with union representatives in a hallway at the plant. The union representatives, Business Agent Douglas D. Norris Jr. and chief steward Mike Jones, along with Aubrey Martin, were holding a caucus outside a conference room where the Company and the Union had been discussing the grievance regarding Martin's discharge. Steele emerged from the conference room on his way to another office and, according to Ware, observed her talking to the union group. As expressed in the complaint, the General Counsel alleges that the Company discharged Ware because it suspected Ware had assisted the Union. There is no direct evidence of such a suspicion, and Steele, who testified he does not recall seeing Ware in the hallway, denies giving any weight to her alleged presence in his recommendation that she be discharged. For its part, the Company contends it discharged Cannady and Ware because they, in an apparent effort to assure they would not have to work beyond 4:30 p.m., told security guards to cancel the 4:30 p.m. tour. Purcell gathered the facts and reported them to Steele who recommended to his superior at the corporate office in Detroit that the two be discharged. Steele's recommendation was approved, and on Monday, 30 March, Steele gave Cannady and Ware until Wednesday, 1 April, to resign or be terminated. When neither resigned, the Company discharged both.

C. Material Facts

1. The allegation of interference, restraint, and coercion

Complaint paragraph 8, in conjunction with the conclusionary paragraphs, alleges that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act on 12 March when Industrial Relations Manager Steele "Instructed its employees to cease cooperating in the Union's investigation of a grievance unless a representative of the Company were present during said investigation." The General Counsel's supporting evidence is based on the testimony of Helen Cannady.

The Company's policy is to give eligible employees who desire it a free case of beer each week. Eligible employees obtain the free beer at the Strohaus. As part of their duties, the tour guides, after determining from the eligibility list that the employee is certified to receive the free beer, dispense the free beer to the eligible employees. On 12 March Aubrey Martin entered the Strohaus, told Cannady his clock number, and asked whether he was eligible to receive his free case of beer. Cannady checked the eligibility list, saw that Martin was listed as eligible, and tendered a free case of beer to him.

The Company apparently had recently terminated Martin. Not long after Martin left the Strohaus with the free case of beer Cannady had given to him, Supervisor Don Johnson entered and spoke with Cannady about Martin not being eligible to receive a free case of beer. Cannady advised Johnson she already had given Martin the beer because his name had not been deleted from the eligibility list. Johnson left. The Company terminated Martin a second time over the beer incident and a grievance was filed over this termination. (Presumably a grievance also had been filed over the first termination.)

A grievance meeting (the initial one, apparently) was held about 19 March concerning Martin's free beer discharge.[2] Martin described Cannady's procedure in giving him the free beer. Following the meeting, Business Agent Norris called Cannady and asked whether she was willing to give a statement concerning her dispensing the free beer to Martin. Cannady said yes. Moments later, Manager of Industrial Relations Steele telephoned Cannady and instructed her not to speak with anyone concerning Martin's case unless Steele was present. Cannady explained she already had spoken to someone about the case. Steele said that was fine but in the future not to do so unless he was present. Cannady said okay.

A week later, on 26 March, Norris and Chief Steward Mike Jones came and spoke to Cannady while she was dispensing free beer to employees. Cannady told Norris and Jones of Steele's instructions. Norris said he would arrange this with Steele. Norris then contacted Steele who offered to stipulate to Cannady's testimony at Aubrey Martin's grievance meeting. Norris testified that at the grievance meeting Steele did so stipulate. Moreover, Steele conceded at the meeting that Cannady had done nothing improper in dispensing the free beer to Martin.

[2] It was on this occasion that the union group stepped into the hallway for a caucus. As Ware was walking by, one of those in the group stopped her for a conversation. While Ware was standing with the union group, Steele emerged from the conference room and walked to the main office. I credit Ware that as Steele emerged he saw her and smiled.

Cannady agreed to assist the Union regarding its processing of the free beer discharge of Aubrey Martin. Assistance offered by nonunit employees to unit employees on a grievance matter is protected activity. Heritage Manor Center, 269 NLRB 408 fn. 2, 414 (1984). Steele's unrestricted instruction to Cannady necessarily imposed a limitation on her statutory right to confer with and assist Martin and the Union independent of the presence of a management representative. By Steele's instruction to Cannady, the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, as alleged. Heritage Manor Center, supra.

2. The discharge of Cannady and Ware

a. Contentions and background evidence

Stroh contends Cannady and Ware began telling the security guards to turn away tourists arriving after 4 p.m. The record is not clear on the point, but the evidence suggests the practice began possibly as early as February before Michael E. McSwain, in early March, left his security guard position with Globe Security and joined the Winston-Salem Police Department. Although there is no direct evidence establishing the purpose behind the purported conduct of Cannady and Ware, the Company argues they initiated the practice so they could leave work at 4:30 p.m. rather than having to work until 5 p.m. or later.

Generally there were about three tour guides on duty in the afternoons, with more present if there were special group tours or parties. Cannady testified that when there was no tour at 4:30 p.m. the tour guides left at 4:30 p.m. When she escorted a 4:30 p.m. tour she generally would sign out between 5 p.m. and 5:15 p.m. The Company's records reflect that as late as 16 March Cannady escorted a 4:30 p.m. tour (G.C. Exh. 4). The guides rotated their tours. Because tours would not be taken at the normal times if no tourist was there to escort, the tour guides would not know until around 4 p.m. who would take any 4:30 p.m. tour. When the tour guides worked to 5 p.m. or later, they were paid for whatever time they worked.

So far as the record reflects, the Company's first knowledge that security guards were turning away tourists after 4 p.m., and that Cannady and Ware were responsible for the practice, came on 20 March based on a conversation with security guard Shari L. Taylor. Stroh investigated and terminated Cannady and Ware. Stroh contends that Cannady's proper performance of her job in dispensing the free case of beer to Aubrey Martin on 12 March, and Ware's purported presence with the union representatives in the hallway on 19 March, had nothing to do with their subsequent termination.

As mentioned earlier, the General Counsel contends Stroh seized on security guard Taylor's report as a pretext to demonstrate to its nonunion employees they were not to cooperate with the Union or become involved in the bargaining relationship between Stroh and the Union.

Chronologically, the first background event is described by Margaret W. Wiggins, one of the tour guides. Wiggins could not specify the date, but testified it was after January 1987, and during cold weather. Because the incident occurred while Ware was employed, it apparently took place in either February or March. Wiggins testified that on this occasion she and Ware were in the Strohaus gift shop. Ware answered a telephone call and Wiggins heard her tell the caller "Eleven to four." When Ware hung up, Wiggins told her, "Tammy, it's 4:30. You know better than that." In a kidding fashion, Wiggins added, "Are you trying to get into trouble or something?" Ware's response, if any, is not reported. Ware testified she does not recall the incident, but she does not affirmatively deny it. There is no evidence Wiggins reported the incident to Stroh's management or, specifically, to her immediate superior, Hospitality Manager Purcell.

Wiggins also testified she began to suspect the security guards were canceling some 4:30 p.m. tours when "earlier this year" (again, apparently in either February or March) some tourists informed her that the week before a security guard had informed them, at 4 p.m., that there would be no more tours that day. Again, there is no evidence Wiggins reported this information to Purcell or to anyone else in management.

One guard testified he did turn away tours during this timeframe. Security Sergeant Danny R. Holt testified he turned away tourists between 4 p.m. and 4:30 p.m. on more than three occasions. According to Holt, he began turning away all such tourists after he returned to work following a 1-day illness and security guard Michael E. McSwain told him they were to stop the tours at 4 p.m.[3] Holt worked Monday through Friday from 3 p.m. to 11 p.m. Holt generally testified he treated McSwain's instruction as a standing order which he thereafter followed. Nevertheless, Holt could not recall when McSwain told him this, he admits that as a sergeant he outranked McSwain, a guard, and he could not explain how the Company's tour records reflected the 4:30 p.m. tour was conducted on 16 and 17 March and earlier on 19 and 26 February. Asked whether he took McSwain's instruction as applying only to a single day, Holt initially testified he did not remember, but additionally testified he carried out the instruction more than three times and until Steele came to the guardhouse (presumably after the discharge of Cannady and Ware) and told the security guards the 4:30 p.m. tour remained in effect as advertised. Holt also testified that on an unspecified number of occasions, after McSwain told him, in essence, there were to be no more 4:30 p.m. tours, female voices he could not identify called him and told him to turn away tours after 4 p.m.

Called by the General Counsel as a rebuttal witness, McSwain (who had resigned from the police department at some point before the hearing) testified he could not recall telling Holt anything about a tour being discontinued, or discontinued even for 1 day. McSwain's hours were 4 p.m. to midnight.

[3] Notwithstanding Holt's reference to "at" 4 p.m., the balance of the evidence indicates that the question here revolves around tourists arriving too late to take the 4 p.m. tour but in time for the last tour at 4:30 p.m. Holt was called as a witness by Stroh.

b. The material events

Tour guide Wiggins testified that on Friday, 20 March, she received a call from a male security guard at 3:56 p.m. asking whether Stroh would have a 4 p.m. tour. Wiggins replied not only a 4 o'clock tour but also a 4:30 tour. She additionally informed him, "We always have them Monday through Friday from 11 o'clock and the last one is 4:30." "Okay," the guard said, and hung up. In the Strohaus after the tour, Wiggins reported the matter to Hospitality Manager Purcell. Wiggins also reported that tourists were being turned away from tours. Purcell asked Wiggins to call the guardhouse and ascertain whether there was a new security guard on duty. Purcell's version, essentially the same, is that she overheard a tourist complaining to Wiggins that tourists behind them were turned away by the guard and told there was no 4:30 p.m. tour. Wiggins then came and repeated the remarks to Purcell. Assuming there must be a new security guard, Purcell instructed Wiggins to call the guardhouse and make sure the guards were aware that the tour hours were 11 a.m. to 4:30 p.m.

Wiggins called and spoke with guard Shari Taylor who said there was no new security guard. Wiggins explained that tourists were complaining of being turned away, and asked if Taylor knew anything about the matter. Taylor said someone had told the security guards not to admit any tourists after 4 p.m. Wiggins asked who, and Taylor replied she had rather not say because she did not want to get anyone into trouble. Wiggins said, "Shari, you are in trouble. I am in trouble. We all will be if you don't tell me who it is." "Helen and Tammy," answered Taylor. Wiggins immediately reported this information to Purcell.

By this time of the day the office was closed, so it was early Monday morning, 23 March, before Purcell was able to inform Industrial Relations Manager Steele. He directed Purcell to question Cannady and Ware about the matter. Purcell did so the following day, 24 March, and each denied the charge. Purcell reported the denials to Steele.

On Thursday, 26 March, Steele interviewed security guards Taylor and Holt who confirmed that Cannady and Ware had told them to turn away tourists after 4 p.m. Although Holt could not identify the tour guides by name, Taylor could do so, Steele testified, and Taylor told him she recognized their voices. Steele asked the guards to write statements in their own hand, and each did. The statements are in evidence. Taylor's reads:

> On 2 to 3 occasions I was told to cut tours off at 4:00 p.m. by Helen Kennedy [Cannady] or Tammy. (I don't know her last name.) This message I feel was only given to me because another guard, Michael McSwain, had not arrived at work yet otherwise the[y] would [have] told him to cut off the tours. Each time they called they would always ask for him. Michael has since quit this job. I did not know that we were not supposed to cut the tours at 4:00 p.m. I assumed as did everyone else this came from Kay Purcell although I was never actually told by Kay.

The statement Holt submitted to Steele reads:

> I was out one day, and when I came back to work I was told that visiting tours would stop at 4 o'clock p.m. I ask[ed] Mike about it and he said it took 30 mins to make a tour. And that if they took a tour at 4:30 it would be after 5 o'clock before the employees could leave the Brown Bottle Room [Strohaus]. Mike told me that the women in the Brown Bottle Room told him. Then around 2 or 3 times they called at guard house and said not to seen [send] any more tours up after 4 o'clock p.m. I have also called up there to fine [find] out and they said no more after 4 o'clock.

Steele testified that during his interview of Taylor and Holt it was mentioned that tourists had been turned away, although no estimate of the number of such tourists was given. According to Steele, Holt said he had continued to turn away tourists after he was first told. Steele concedes he specifically asked about Friday, 20 March.[4] Holt testified he did not think Steele asked if he had turned anyone away. And, according to Holt, he did not tell Steele he had turned away tourists on more than three occasions. As mentioned, Steele testified Holt said he kept turning away tourists after 4 p.m. In contrast, Steele understood that Taylor did not view the calls as a standing order to cut all tours after 4 p.m., and Taylor confirms in her testimony that such was her understanding.

Taylor testified she told Steele essentially what is in her statement before she wrote it. At the hearing, Taylor testified she recognized the voices of Cannady and Ware from previous business conversations with them, although she only knew Ware by her given name, and that Cannady called once and Ware once telling her to send no more tours after 4 p.m. When Cannady called, Taylor testified, she identified herself as "Helen," but Ware did not identify herself. The tour guide roster for the week of 16 March reveals only one Helen and one Tammy among the eight names (first names only) listed. Taylor testified she never turned a tourist away. On receiving the two calls from Cannady and Ware, and perhaps others relayed to her by Holt, Taylor would report the instruction to the guard who relieved her. Taylor normally worked until 4 p.m. and generally was relieved by McSwain who worked the 4 p.m. to midnight shift. McSwain (who left in early March) testified he could not recall any such instruction from Taylor or anyone else. Nevertheless, McSwain admits Taylor once informed him either Cannady or Ware had called for him but left no message. McSwain also concedes he knew Cannady and Ware socially, that he "grew up" with Cannady, and that he had dated one of them. The record does not reflect whether it was Cannady or Ware whom he dated.

As I described earlier, on Thursday, 26 March, Cannady was dispensing beer to employees in the Strohaus when Union Representative Norris and Chief Steward Jones came by. That is when Cannady informed Norris she could not discuss the Aubrey Martin grievance with the Union unless Steele was present. Norris said that would be no problem and that he would contact Steele. The following day, 27 March, Steele came to the Strohaus and asked Cannady, "Who did you talk with yesterday?" Thinking Steele meant had she talked with someone about the facts relating to the Aubrey Martin grievance, Cannady answered, "No one." "You didn't talk with anyone yesterday?" Steele asked. "No," replied Cannady. "Okay," Steele said, "have a very good weekend," and he left. Steele had no further conversation with Cannady until Monday, 30 March.

At some point following his interview of the two security guards, Steele contacted his superior at Respondent's Detroit headquarters, reported the details of the investigation, and recommended discharge. Steele's recommendation was approved, apparently by Joseph Franzem, vice president, corporate services.

On 30 March Cannady and Ware were summoned to Steele's office. Present were Steele, Purcell, Cannady, and Ware. Steele said he had information the two had turned tourists away, and he specifically mentioned Friday, 20 March. Cannady and Ware not only denied the allegation, but Ware observed she had not worked at all on 20 March and Cannady pointed out that she had left before noon that Friday. Steele admits their protest was his first awareness that Cannady and Ware were not at work at the relevant time the afternoon of Friday, 20 March. When Cannady and Ware called their absence to his attention, Steele, Cannady testified, said, "That's beside the point. You still called the guards and you told them to cut off the tours from coming in." At the hearing, Steele reinforced this position by describing the absence of Cannady and Ware on 20 March as "immaterial" because, in his view, they, by the practice they had set in motion, were responsible for the action of the security guard in turning away visitors the afternoon of Friday, 20 March.

At the interview on 30 March, as Steele testified, Cannady and Ware denied they had ever called the guardhouse to turn away tourists. At the hearing, Cannady and Ware each testified she had never directed the guards to turn away tourists from taking the 4:30 p.m. tour.

Continuing at the 30 March meeting, Steele told Cannady and Ware he had no reason to disbelieve the security guards because they had nothing to gain. In contrast, Cannady and Ware did have something to gain in that they would be leaving work earlier. Based on these facts, Steele said, and to avoid any stigma of discharge, Cannady and Ware could have to 1 April to resign or be discharged. About an hour after the meeting, Cannady called Purcell and said she would take neither option. Ware reported for work on 1 April, but Purcell told her she had been terminated. Ware was given a written termination notice and escorted off the premises. A termination notice was mailed to Cannady. The notices state that each was "Terminated for cause" on 1 April 1987.

Steele testified Cannady and Ware were discharged solely "for instructing the guards to turn tours away and the guards honored those instructions," and that he fired them for this based on the statements of the two security guards plus the earlier report Purcell had made to him. Steele concedes that Wiggins and other tour guides were not interviewed until after the discharge of Cannady and Ware. In short, as he testified, Steele chose to believe the security guards, Taylor and Holt, over Cannady and Ware.

c. Discussion

As I have summarized, Industrial Relations Manager Steele testified the relationship of Cannady and Ware to the Aubrey Martin grievance had nothing to do with their discharge, and that the sole reason Cannady and Ware were discharged was "for instructing the guards to turn tours away and the guards honored those instructions." Steele testified with an unfavorable demeanor and I do not credit him. I find that Steele learned Cannady had spoken to Union Representative Norris and Chief Steward Jones on 26 March. Concerned that Cannady discussed the facts of the Aubrey Martin grievance with them, Steele confronted Cannady the following day with a question almost accusatory in nature. When Cannady replied she had talked with no one, Steele, I find, concluded she was lying and that her lying was for the purpose of avoiding having to disclose that she had discussed the facts of the Aubrey Martin grievance with Norris and Jones. At that point, I find, Steele made the decision to recommend Cannady be discharged. As argued by the General Counsel, moreover, I find Steele was determined to prevent the nonunion employees from becoming involved in the bargaining relationship with unit employees, especially if the involvement appeared to be as supporters for the Union's position.

I find that a motivating reason for Cannady's discharge was her protected activities. I further find that Steele discharged Ware because he suspected, from observing her conferring in the hallway with the union representatives and Aubrey Martin, that she also was supporting the Union. I further find that a motivating reason for Ware's discharge was Steele's suspicion that Ware was engaging in protected conduct. Thus, the General Counsel has established prima facie that the discharge of Cannady and Ware was unlawful.

Once the General Counsel has established a prima facie violation of the Act in motivation cases, the burden shifts to the Respondent to demonstrate it would have imposed the discipline even absent the disciplined employee's protected conduct. Did Stroh carry that burden here? The Company points to the information furnished by the security guards and the importance of the promotional and goodwill purpose of the tours. The General Counsel's counterargument is rather ambiguous.

The General Counsel argues that security guard Taylor placed responsibility on Cannady and Ware in "an attempt to divert responsibility from herself and other guards." Thus, the argument runs, Taylor accused Cannady and Ware because, as Wiggins told her, someone was going to be "in trouble." The General Counsel contends there is a discrepancy between the versions of Wiggins and Purcell concerning whether someone was in fact turned away on 20 March, and counsel for the General Counsel points to the ambiguous nature of Taylor's written statement of receiving two to three calls from Cannady "or" Ware as opposed to her version at the hearing that each called her once. The General Counsel also argues that as Taylor disclaimed any standing order to turn away tourists after 4 p.m., her credibility suffers in light of the fact neither Cannady nor Ware was at work the afternoon of 20 March to give a current instruction. However, it was a male security guard (Holt, possibly) who spoke with Wiggins shortly before 4 p.m. on 20 March.

Steele locked on the important point early. There is no evidence the security guards had any motive to turn away tourists. The hours of the guards would be unaffected by a tour from 4:30 to 5 p.m. Whatever additional work would be involved in granting access to the tourists is not shown to be anything more than negligible. The General Counsel stops short of arguing that the guards, on their own, initiated the practice of turning away tourists after 4 p.m. There just is no plausible reason in the record to explain why the guards would be interested in doing that.

By contrast, and as Steele noted, Cannady and Ware did have a possible incentive—leaving work at 4:30 p.m. rather than 5 p.m. or later. The tour guides were paid for any time they worked after 4:30 p.m., and there is no clearcut evidence Cannady and Ware preferred to leave at 4:30 p.m. even though they would lose an extra 30 minutes or so of pay. On the other hand, Cannady and Ware did not testify they needed the extra money and preferred to work until 5 p.m. or later if possible. On the state of the record, it must be said that, considering the possible incentives of the tour guides as compared to that of the security guards, Steele's choice of accepting the guard's version is a reasonable one. It seems clear that someone told the guards to stop at least some of the 4:30 p.m. tours, and the evidence Steele had pointed to Cannady and Ware. As they initiated the practice, it is immaterial that they made no call on Friday, 20 March. Indeed, whether any tourists were in fact turned away on 20 March is immaterial. The important point to consider is the Company learned about the practice on 20 March.

As I find, Steele reasonably believed the guards. Even so, would the Company still have fired Cannady and Ware absent their protected conduct? There is no evidence of past examples of discipline of nonunit employees on this conduct or any other misconduct. The evidence establishes the Company spends a sizable amount of money advertising the tours as part of its effort to create goodwill and promote the sales of its product. And conducting visitor tours is the reason Stroh hires tour guides. These facts support a finding that Stroh would have fired Cannady and Ware over their unauthorized instructions to the guards regardless of their protected conduct.

On the other hand, Ware testified without contradiction that Steele told them had they admitted their misconduct the discipline would have been less severe than discharge. Does that statement of Steele indicate he would not have fired them had they not engaged in protected activities? No. If anything, the statement detracts from an unlawful motivation finding. Under all these circumstances, I find the Company carried its burden of demonstrating it would have fired Cannady and Ware even absent their protected conduct. I therefore shall dismiss the complaint as to Helen L. Cannady and Tammy T. Ware.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Stroh Brewery Company is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Teamsters Local Union No. 391 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act on 12 March 1987 when Industrial Relations Manager Donald L. Steele directed tour guide Helen L. Cannady, an unrepresented employee, not to cooperate in the Union's investigation of a grievance of bargaining unit employee Aubrey Martin unless Steele was present.

4. The Company did not violate Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging Helen L. Cannady and Tammy T. Ware effective 1 April 1987.

5. The unfair labor practices found affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found the Company has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

The Respondent, Stroh Brewery Company, Winston-Salem, North Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Directing its unrepresented employees not to cooperate in the Union's investigation of a grievance of bargaining unit personnel unless a representative of management is present.

(b) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

[5] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(a) Post at its Winston-Salem, North Carolina brewery copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 11, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Company has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

ORDER DENYING MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On September 30, 1987, the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order in the above-captioned case,[1] in which the Board ordered the Respondent, inter alia, to make whole Sandra LePoidevin for her losses resulting from the Respondent's unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. A controversy having arisen over the amount of backpay due under the terms of the Board's Order, the Regional Director for Region 22 issued and duly served on the Respondent a backpay specification and notice of hearing alleging the amount of backpay due.

On April 13, 1988, the General Counsel filed with the Board in Washington, D.C., a Motion for Summary Judgment and Memorandum in Support, with exhibits attached. The General Counsel submits that although granted an extension of time within which to file an answer, the Respondent has failed to file an answer to the backpay specification as required by Section 102.54(a) of the Board's Rules and Regulations. The General Counsel, therefore, requests that the Board find the allegations of the backpay specification deemed to be admitted true without the taking of evidence in support of the allegations and enter summary judgment in favor of the backpay specification.

On April 22, 1988, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the General Counsel's motion should not be granted. On May 5, 1988, the Respondent, by its attorney, filed a response to the Notice to Show Cause, asserting that on February 3, 1988, it executed and sent to the Regional Director a stipulation in the underlying unfair labor practice case, agreeing not to contest the Board's decision in court but reserving its right to a hearing on the backpay owed the discriminatee. The Respondent's attorney admits that the backpay specification and notice of hearing was received on March 1, 1988, but contends that the "documents' title did not indicate a Demand for an Answer to the specification was requested." Thus, the attorney, unfamiliar with Board proceedings, simply "calendared" the matter. The Respondent's attorney further admits receiving the General Counsel's letter extending the filing time to April 11, 1988, but asserts it was impossible to comply with that deadline because the letter was not received until April 12, 1988. The Respondent was not successful in its attempts to contact the Board agent handling the case until just after the Motion for Summary Judgment was filed, and the Board agent's supervisor denied the Respondent's request to withdraw the motion and allow the Respondent to file an answer.

The Board having duly considered the matter,

IT IS ORDERED that the Respondent be given 14 days from the date of this Order to file a proper answer to the backpay specification in conformance with the requirements of Section 102.54(b) of the Board's Rules and Regulations.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment is denied without prejudice to its renewal should the Respondent fail to file a timely, proper answer.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the above-entitled proceeding be remanded to the Regional Director for Region 22 for further appropriate action.[2]

MEMBER JOHANSEN, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I would not give the Respondent an additional 14 days to file a proper answer, but rather I would grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment on the backpay specification. There is no reason in this case to make an exception to our standard policy of granting summary judgment when a respondent has failed to file an answer within the reasonable time limits prescribed by the Board's Rules.

The backpay specification and notice of hearing was served on the Respondent by certified mail on February 29, 1988. As is customary, the specification advised the Respondent that it was required to file an answer within 21 days. No answer was filed by the March 21 due date, even though the Respondent concedes that it received the specification on March 1. By letter dated April 5, the General Counsel extended the filing deadline to April 11, and informed the Respondent that if no answer were received by that date, the General Counsel would move for summary judgment. Having received no answer or response from the Respondent by April 13, the General Counsel filed the instant motion.

[2] We believe this is the appropriate resolution under all the circumstances here, including the fact that the Respondent had previously agreed to waive its right to contest the underlying unfair labor practice findings in the court of appeals on the understanding that it would be able to contest the amount of backpay owing the discriminatee.

The Respondent advances no valid justification for its failure to file an answer to the backpay specification. It claims that because of its attorney's unfamiliarity with Board law and because the title of the specification and notice of hearing "did not indicate" that an answer was requested, it simply noted the hearing date and filed the document. The Respondent's attorney, however, was obligated to read more than just the specification's title and the hearing date. As mentioned above, the specification expressly states that an answer is to be filed within 21 days, pursuant to Section 102.54 of the Board's Rules and Regulations. Those rules provide that failure to file an answer may result in the Board finding, without the taking of evidence, all allegations of the backpay specification to be true.

In addition, the Respondent asserts that it did not receive the General Counsel's April 5 letter extending the filing time and warning of a Motion for Summay Judgment until April 12, at which time it was too late to comply with the April 11 deadline. Accepting this assertion as fact, the failure to receive this letter in a timely manner does not excuse the Respondent's failure to file an answer nor warrant denial of the General Counsel's motion. The Board's Rules and Regulations do not require the General Counsel to send such a letter, and the fact that the General Counsel routinely may extend the filing deadline when an answer has not been filed within the 21-day period does not relieve a respondent of its obligation to file an answer within the prescribed time.

Further, even faced with the instant motion, the Respondent has failed to file an answer or advise that it will do so. Instead, the Respondent has stated that it "look[s] forward to our day in court in which to challenge the Board Agent's calculations." In these circumstances, I see no purpose to be served by granting an additional extension of time, and I would grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On July 13, 1987, the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order in the above-entitled proceeding[1] in which it ordered, inter alia, the Respondent to make whole certain of its employees for any loss of pay and other benefits resulting from the Respondent's unlawful discharge of these employees. On December 22, 1987, the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit entered its judgment enforcing the Board's Order. A controversy having arisen over the amount of backpay due under the Board's Order, as enforced by the court, the Regional Director for Region 27, on April 29, 1988, issued a backpay specification and notice of hearing alleging the amount of backpay due the discriminatees and notifying the Respondent that it should file a timely answer complying with the Board's Rules and Regulations. The Respondent has failed to file such an answer.

Thereafter, on July 18, 1988, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment. Subsequently, on July 20, 1988, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and Notice to Show Cause why the General Counsel's motion should not be granted. The Respondent failed to file a response to the Notice to Show Cause.

On the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.54 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides in pertinent part:

> (c) . . . If the respondent fails to file any answer to the specification within the time prescribed by this section, the Board may, either with or without taking evidence in support of the allegations of the specification and without notice to the respondent, find the specification to be true and enter such order as may be appropriate.

The backpay specification issued and served by certified mail on the Respondent and its representative about April 29, 1988, specifically states that the Respondent shall, within 14 days[2] from the date of the specification, file an answer with the Regional Director for Region 27, and that if the answer fails to deny the allegations of the specification in the manner required under the Board's Rules and Regulations and the failure to do so is not adequately explained, such allegations shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and the Respondent shall be precluded from introducing any evidence controverting them. According to the allegations of the General Counsel's motion, on May 18, 1988, the Compliance Officer for Region 27 discussed, by telephone, with Peter Shelley, attorney for the Respondent, the need for filing an answer to the backpay specification.

The Respondent has not filed an answer to the backpay specification. As the Respondent has not filed an answer to the specification and has not offered any explanation for its failure to do so, in accordance with the rules set forth above, the allegations of the specification are deemed to be admitted as true and are so found by the Board without the taking of evidence in support of the allegations.

Accordingly, the Board grants the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment and concludes that the net backpay due the discriminatees, Mary Merritt, Ken Merritt, Roland Perkins, Yvette Marquez, Danny Marquez, Mary Montoya, and Muhammed Safi, is as stated in the computations of the specification, and orders the payment of these amounts by the Respondent to the discriminatees.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Frontier Building Services, Longmont, Colorado, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall make whole the discriminatees named below by paying to them the amount following their names, plus interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded,[3] less tax withholdings required by Federal and state laws:

[1] 284 NLRB No. 100 (July 13, 1987) (unpublished).

[2] The backpay specification erroneously states that the Respondent shall file an answer within 14 days, although it correctly cites Sec. 102.54 which, as amended on September 29, 1986, provides that the respondent shall answer within 21 days from service. As the Respondent has failed to respond in any manner to the backpay specification, we find that it was not prejudiced by this inadvertent error.

[3] 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

DECISION, ORDER, AND CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On June 12, 1984, Administrative Law Judge Phil W. Saunders issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions as modified[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

1. The judge dismissed paragraphs 8(f), (j), (p), and (q) of the complaint, finding that the unfair labor practices alleged were not attributable to the Respondent. We disagree. Each paragraph alleges misconduct by one or the other of the Respondent's two group leaders, Peter Walden and Sis Paradise. For the reasons stated by the judge, we agree that Walden and Paradise were not statutory supervisors. Contrary to the judge, however, we find that they acted as the Respondent's agents in its antiunion campaign. Both played an integral role in that campaign. They regularly attended management meetings at which campaign strategy was discussed. Further, they were authorized to answer employees' questions about various campaign issues on behalf of the Respondent, and were instructed by the Respondent concerning the legal restrictions upon what they could say. Finally, they served as "couriers" for the Respondent, distributing the Respondent's antiunion literature to the employees. Under these circumstances, we find that the Respondent placed Walden and Paradise in a position so that the employees would reasonably understand that they spoke for management in connection with its antiunion campaign. The Respondent was therefore responsible for their actions within the area of such apparent authority.[3]

Nevertheless, we agree with the judge that paragraphs 8(f), (j), (p), and (q) of the complaint should be dismissed. As set forth below, we find that the General Counsel presented insufficient evidence to carry the burden of proving these allegations.

Paragraph 8(f) of the complaint alleges that sometime in May and June 1983 Walden threatened employees with a plant shutdown and layoffs if the Union won the election. The General Counsel presented no evidence whatsoever to support this allegation. The General Counsel now contends that the failure to do so was the judge's fault, i.e., that the judge erroneously refused on request to enforce Walden's subpoena or, alternatively, to accept Walden's affidavit into evidence.

Both contentions are without merit. The issuance of a subpoena carries with it prima facie authority to enforce it in the appropriate Federal court; no prior approval is necessary in normal circumstances.[4] The judge, in fact, so advised counsel for the General Counsel at the hearing. The fault therefore, lies solely with counsel for the General Counsel.[5] As for Walden's affidavit, inasmuch as Walden was not available for cross-examination by the Respondent and, as the judge found, the affidavit was given under circumstances casting doubt on

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

We agree with the result reached by the judge in finding that Schneider's conversation with union activist Headley did not amount to interrogation in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. However, in affirming the judge's finding in this regard we do not rely on the judge's discussion of Headley's testimony that Headley was not threatened or intimidated by Schneider's question. Such evidence of an employee's subjective reaction to an employer's questions regarding employees' union activities is irrelevant in an analysis of "whether under all of the circumstances the interrogation reasonably tends to restrain, coerce, or interfere with rights guaranteed by the Act." Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176, 1177 (1984).

In adopting the judge's finding that the Respondent's temporary transfer and ultimate discharge of Supervisor Rickard did not violate the Act, we note that his citation to Bennington Iron Works, 267 NLRB 1285 (1983), is inapposite because it dealt with an agency question not relevant here. Also, in adopting this dismissal we find it unnecessary to rely on the judge's discussion of Parker-Robb Chevrolet, 262 NLRB 402 (1982). Even assuming that the discharge of a supervisor in order to remedy employees' preelection grievances could fall within those limited "circumstances" in which "the discharge of a supervisor may violate Section 8(a)(1)" (id. at 402), we agree with the judge that the General Counsel did not prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the Respondent's treatment of Rickard constituted the remedying of an employee preelection grievance; and thus the discharge would not be a violation even under that theory.

[2] The Respondent filed a motion to strike certain alleged misstatements of fact in the General Counsel's brief. We deny the Respondent's motion. The General Counsel's statements are arguably supported by the record and, in any event, we have independently examined the evidence.

[3] See, e.g., EMR Photoelectric, 251 NLRB 1597, 1601 (1980), citing Hanover Concrete Co., 241 NLRB 936, 939 (1979).

[4] See Sec. 11 of the Act and Sec. 102.31 of the Board's Rules and Regulations. The General Counsel identifies no authority supporting the argument that the judge's approval was required before seeking enforcement of the subpoena.

[5] As the General Counsel concedes, the judge never expressly ruled against enforcement of the Walden subpoena. The judge ruled only that he would not discontinue the hearing pending court enforcement.

its trustworthiness, we find it was properly excluded.[6]

Paragraph 8(j) of the complaint alleges that on May 16 Paradise threatened employees with the possible loss of their jobs if the Union won the election. In support of this allegation the General Counsel offered the testimony of employees Headley and Bezio. Both testified that during a lunchtime conversation in which employees were discussing whether they would lose their benefits if the Union won the election, Paradise stated that they should not worry about it because "we probably won't have a job anyway."

The General Counsel contends that Paradise's statement was clearly an unlawful threat. The testimony of employee Brown, however, casts considerable doubt on the General Counsel's contention. Brown testified that earlier in the conversation the employees had discussed the possibility that there might be a layoff due to a business slowdown. As the judge found, there had been such a layoff just 6 months earlier. Contrary to the General Counsel, therefore, we are unable to conclude that Paradise's statement about losing their jobs referred to the consequences of a successful union campaign. Rather, we conclude that at its worst it was vague and ambiguous.

Paragraph 8(p) of the complaint alleges that on June 17 Paradise threatened employees with a plant shutdown and layoffs if the Union won the election. Here again, the General Counsel failed to present any credible evidence of such threats. The only evidence the General Counsel offered was Bezio's testimony that employee Parker had told her that Paradise had told her that President Saunders had told her that he would close the plant if the Union got in. We find that the judge in his discretion properly rejected this uncorroborated testimony as unreliable hearsay.[7]

Paragraph 8(q) of the complaint alleges that on June 20 Paradise again threatened employees with a plant shutdown and layoffs if the Union won the election. Here, the General Counsel's evidence consisted of Headley's testimony that Brown stated to her and Bezio that a machine was recently removed from the plant "because they were going to start to move the work out," and that Paradise was also present and did not deny Brown's statement. Thus, the General Counsel contends, Paradise ratified Brown's statement by her silence.

According to Brown, however, Paradise responded that she was not aware that the machine had been moved out. Moreover, Brown testified that thereafter Moriarty, the Respondent's purchasing agent, told her that the machine was merely being sent out for repairs, and that she immediately relayed this to Headley and Bezio. Accordingly, even accepting Headley's testimony that Paradise remained silent, we find that any alleged adverse impact that silence may have had was subsequently cured.

2. The judge also dismissed the allegation that the Respondent through Plant Manager Rickard violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employee Massey with an unexcused absence if she left work to attend the May 23 Board representation hearing. The judge found that receiving an unexcused absence was "relatively unimportant" insofar as it would take at least three unexcused absences in a month before an employee would receive even a written warning. Accordingly, the judge concluded that Massey "was not threatened with any meaningful disciplinary action if she chose to attend, but would merely be accorded an unexcused absence based on the Respondent's normal procedures."

We agree with the judge that this allegation should be dismissed, but do so for the following reasons. At the outset, contrary to the judge we do not deem it significant that it would take three unexcused absences before a written warning would be given, and many more before discharge. The fact is that an unexcused absence could lead to discipline. An unexcused absence was therefore "meaningful."[8]

The issue, then, is not whether Rickard effectively threatened Massey with meaningful disciplinary action. We conclude that he did. The issue is whether the threat violated the Act. As discussed below, we conclude that it did not.

Since Standard Packaging Corp.,[9] the law has been clear that employees have no absolute right under Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act to leave work to attend a Board hearing. What has not remained clear, however, are the circumstances in which an employer may lawfully refuse to permit

[6] See NLRB v. McClure Associates, 556 F.2d 725 (4th Cir. 1977), enfg. 223 NLRB 580 (1976); Head Ski Division, AMF Inc., 222 NLRB 161, 162 fn. 3 (1976). Although the judge inadvertently states in fn. 8 of his decision that he is granting the Respondent's motion to quash the "subpoena," it is clear that he meant "affidavit" since it was Walden's affidavit and not the subpoena that the Respondent formally asked to have excluded from the record—a request the judge referred to as a "motion to quash."

[7] We note that the General Counsel apparently made no effort to call Parker, whose credibility determines the probative value of Bezio's testimony, to testify about Paradise's alleged statement.

[8] Moreover, we note that discipline was not in fact all that unlikely to result from the Respondent's refusal to allow Massey an excused absence. The Union's letter to the Respondent requested Massey's attendance not only on May 23 but "if necessary, on consecutive days thereafter, until completed." Thus, Massey might have accumulated several unexcused absences if she had attended the hearing as planned.

employees to do so. In Standard Packaging the Board held that where the General Counsel failed to prove that the employer's refusal was improperly motivated, or that the employees' attendance at the hearing was necessary (i.e., that they were subpoenaed or that they otherwise had real need to attend), the employer's refusal did not violate the Act. This, however, was not the last word on the subject.

Some 15 years later in Earringhouse Imports,[10] the Board all but eviscerated Standard Packaging. The Board in Earringhouse held that an employer violated Section 8(a)(1) and (4) by discharging 13 employees who defied its denial of their request for leave to attend the representation hearing. The Board so held notwithstanding that the judge had found no evidence that the employer had an unlawful motive or that the 13 employees had a need to attend the hearing.[11] The Board held that the burden was on the employer to establish that the employees' absence from work would have caused a significant economic loss, and that the employer failed to do so. In effect, therefore, the Board established a presumption of illegality, shifting the burden of proof from the General Counsel to the employer.

The Board's holding in Earringhouse was thus plainly contrary to Standard Packaging. However, as noted by the D.C. Circuit in denying enforcement in Earringhouse,[12] the Board did not even mention that case much less distinguish or expressly overrule it. Nor did the Board cite any other Board precedent for its presumption under Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act.[13]

In view of the foregoing, and after carefully considering the merits of each, we agree with the D.C. Circuit in Earringhouse that the better approach is that originally followed in Standard Packaging. As the D.C. Circuit noted in denying enforcement in Earringhouse, "working time is for work."[14] There is nothing inherently improper, therefore, in an employer's wanting to keep its employees at work.[15] A presumption that such a decision is unlawful is thus clearly unwarranted.

Accordingly, we overrule Earringhouse and hold that the burden of proof lies where it customarily is in an unfair labor practice proceeding: with the General Counsel. Consistent with the Board's decision in Standard Packaging, that burden will be to prove that the employer's refusal was improperly motivated or that the employees demonstrated to the employer at the time of their request that they had a real need to attend the hearing. Only when the General Counsel has presented prima facie evidence of either or both of the above will the burden shift to the employer to either discredit the General Counsel's evidence or, as to the latter, show an overriding business reason for its refusal to allow the employees to leave work.

Applying our holding to the facts of this case, we find that the General Counsel failed to meet this burden. First, there is no evidence that the Respondent's refusal to grant Massey an excused absence was improperly motivated. Although Massey testified that employees had been granted excused absences for personal business in the past, it was never explained what the nature of that personal business was or whether such leave had been granted liberally. Further, the judge credited Rickard's testimony that his decision was based solely on his understanding of the Company's attendance policy.[16]

Second, there is no evidence that there was any real need for Massey to attend the hearing. Like the employees in Standard Packaging, Massey was not subpoenaed to appear and was not called to testify. Although the Union requested her presence as its "observer," neither the Union nor Massey offered the Respondent any explanation whatsoever at the time of the request why an "observer" was needed.[17] As one of the most active union support-

[11] As in Standard Packaging, none of the employees were subpoenaed to appear at the representation hearing, and none testified.

[12] 600 F.2d at 936.

[13] The only authority cited by the Board in Earringhouse allegedly supporting its presumption was NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26 (1967). However, as the D.C. Circuit noted in denying enforcement in Earringhouse, the Supreme Court's discussion in Great Dane was in the context of Sec. 8(a)(3) and involved employer actions that appeared discriminatory on their face. 600 F.2d at 939 and fn. 22. The D.C. Circuit further noted that in NLRB v. Brown, 380 U.S. 278 (1965), a case cited in Great Dane, the Court stated, "When the resulting harm to employee rights is thus comparatively slight, and a substantial and legitimate business end is served, the employer's conduct is prima facie lawful." The D.C. Circuit concluded that under the circumstances (no improper motive or necessity for attendance) denying the employees leave to attend the representation hearing had no more than a de minimis impact on employee rights, and thus that the employer's conduct was prima facie lawful. Id.

[14] See 600 F.2d at 932 and cases cited therein at fn. 1.

[15] As the Board in Earringhouse conceded, an employer has a "legitimate interest in operating [its] business without disruption." 227 NLRB at 1108.

[16] Moreover, the record reveals that the Respondent subsequently granted Massey paid time off to be the Union's observer during the July 1 election. Significantly, this was before the filing of the unfair labor practice charges on July 15.

[17] Unlike our dissenting colleague, we are unwilling to speculate, post hoc, as to the advisory functions Massey might have served at the hearing as the Union's "observer." Nor would we require the Employer to have done so at the time of the leave request. Rather, in the absence of any contrary evidence, we assume that the term "observer" meant, and was understood to mean, precisely what it normally means: one who simply watches or observes.

ers Massey undoubtedly had a genuine personal interest in the hearing. Such an interest, however, does not rise to the level of a "real need."

Accordingly, we affirm the judge's finding that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) when it refused to grant Massey an excused absence to attend the representation hearing.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

Furthermore, it is certified that a majority of the valid ballots have not been cast for United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America, AFL–CIO and that it is not the exclusive representative of the bargaining unit employees.

CHAIRMAN STEPHENS, dissenting in part.

I join my colleagues in the majority in all but their conclusion that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when its plant manager, William Rickard, responded to employee Doris Massey's request for an unpaid absence to attend the May 23 representation hearing by stating that such an absence would be marked as "unexcused." I agree with them that we should overrule Earringhouse Imports, 227 NLRB 1107 (1977), enf. denied sub nom. Service Employees Local 250 v. NLRB, 600 F.2d 930 (D.C. Cir. 1979), to the extent that it recognizes an absolute right for employees to take unpaid leave to attend Board proceedings in the absence of a showing of business necessity for denying them permission. Like the majority, I would return to the rule of Standard Packaging Corp., 140 NLRB 628 (1963), but in my view, finding a violation of Section 8(a)(1) on the facts here is entirely consistent with Standard Packaging.

In Standard Packaging, the employer's plant manager was presented with an employee request that at least four, and possibly seven, employees be released from work to attend a hearing on a decertification petition, although apparently none was scheduled to give testimony. The manager did not reject the request out of hand but stated that he wished to check production schedules to see if this would be possible. After checking, he informed the requesting employee (who was a chief sponsor of the decertification petition) that he could only allow that employee to attend. Upon further pleas by the employee, the manager agreed that one other employee could also go and that any others who turned out to be needed at the hearing could be released on telephone notification of the need for their presence. Two employees, Storms and Murray, who were not among those allowed to attend, went to the hearing notwithstanding their lack of permission to leave work and were subsequently discharged for insubordination. In dismissing the complaint allegation that the discharges violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act, the Board explained (id. at 630):

> In the circumstances, we cannot find that Respondent's refusal to release Storms and Murray was motivated by any desire to interfere with the Board's processes or with such rights as the complainants may have had to attend the Board proceeding as prospective witnesses. Nor can we say that the position taken by Respondent would, had Storms and Murray accepted it, have occasioned an interference with the proceeding or precluded the complainants from attending the hearing upon a reasonable showing that their attendance was necessary. It is our belief that this record adequately supports the Respondent's asserted reliance upon its work schedule as the reason for its unwillingness, in advance of the hearing, to release more than two employees to attend the hearing.

I agree with the majority that the Board in Standard Packaging, implicitly applied a dual test. An employer that penalizes or threatens to penalize an employee for taking unpaid leave to attend a Board proceeding thereby commits a violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act only if either (1) it does so with unlawful intent, i.e., out of hostility toward union or other protected activity, or (2) the employee's showing of need to attend the Board proceeding outweighs the employer's production-related ground for denying in whole or in part the employee request.[1] I also agree that, in the absence of any indication of an employee's need to attend the Board proceeding, the employer is under no obligation to show any business reason for denying the employee permission to do so by taking unpaid leave from work.

[1] This appears to be the test that the Sixth Circuit applied in Vokas Provision Co. v. NLRB, 796 F.2d 864, 876 & fn. 15 (1986), denying enf. 271 NLRB 1010 (1984). In Vokas, 6 employees out of a work force of 12 had demanded to attend a Board hearing en masse, on the representation that as-yet-unserved subpoenas awaited them there. The demand was made to the employer the day before the hearing. The judge credited the employer's evidence that its reason for allowing only one, rather than all six, to go was that the simultaneous departure of half of its work force would cause "serious business disruption." The court of appeals agreed with the judge both that there was no showing of unlawful motive and that the employer's business reasons for preventing all six from attending the hearing outweighed the employees' interest in attending. 796 F.2d at 878–879.

The court recognized, as established law, that there was probably an absolute right to obtain an unpaid leave of absence in order to testify under subpoena. In the absence of a subpoena, the balancing test was to be applied. 796 F.2d at 896.

I would not, however, hold that the demonstration of the employee's need to attend the hearing must be exceptionally strong before the employer has at least some burden of explanation. If the circumstances indicate that the employee may serve a useful function at the proceeding, I would impose on the employer, at the least, a burden of inquiry into the interest to be served by the employee's presence and consideration whether that interest can be accommodated without disruption to production. Indeed, the employers in Standard Packaging, Earringhouse, and Vokas all made at least some attempt to determine the need for employees' presence at the Board proceedings and then gave permission for at least one employee to attend.[2]

In the present case, one employee, Doris Massey, requested leave to attend a Board representation proceeding as the Union's observer. Massey was known to the Respondent as the principal union organizer among the employees. It was clearly possible for Plant Manager Rickard to ascertain whether the Respondent had received any other requests from the Union for employee attendance at the hearing or whether—as seems to be the case—Massey was the only employee whose presence the Union sought. Moreover, if Rickard had any questions about what function Massey might serve as an "observer," he could have called the Union's field representative who signed the letter requesting Massey's attendance in that capacity, since the Union's telephone number was included in the letterhead. It is not difficult to discern why a union might need the presence of at least one employee at a representation proceeding. Issues are often not well defined prior to a scheduled hearing in a representation case, and unforeseen questions about the workplace and eligibility for inclusion in the bargaining unit often arise during the prehearing conference, when the parties attempt to reach an election agreement, and during the hearing itself, if one is held.[3] A unit employee, such as Massey, is often a valuable source of information on such issues. The usefulness of such advice is no less great if the union asks the employee to attend as an observer but does not subpoena the employee's attendance. Thus, while the issuance of a subpoena may strengthen the showing of need, it should not be treated as an indispensable requirement.

Balanced against the circumstances indicating that Massey had an interest going beyond mere curiosity in attending the representation proceeding was Rickard's bare assertion of his understanding that it was appropriate under plant practice to mark her absence as unexcused. He made no claim at all that her absence on unpaid leave would cause aay disruption of production. Indeed, he testified that the Respondent was concerned with employee absenteeism only if it were excessive.[4] Since the letter requested Massey's attendance at a Board hearing "on May 23, 1983, and consecutive days thereafter, until completed," Rickard might understandably have been troubled by the prospect of her possibly being absent for a number of days; but he could have allayed such fears by calling the field representative who wrote the letter to reach some agreement on limits to her absence. Compare Vokas Provision Co. v. NLRB, supra, 796 F.2d at 875 (when employees are subpoenaed, an employer may call the Board to schedule appearances "in an orderly fashion" to "minimize disruption" to business).

In sum, where employee attendance at Board proceedings is concerned, I think our test should encourage all parties to act reasonably and in a manner that will serve the interests of employees, employers, unions, and the public. An indication that an employee's presence at a hearing might be useful should trigger at least a burden of inquiry on the part of the employer to see if some reasonable accommodation may be made. As to whether and to what extent a request for unpaid leave must be granted, each case should turn on its own facts. The stronger the showing of need, the greater the showing the employer must make to overcome it. Where, as here, the circumstances suggest a legitimate reason for the employee's attendance and the employer simplyrejects the request without explanation, I would find that the balance weighs against the employer and that a violation of Section 8(a)(1) is established.[5]

[2] In Earringhouse, supra, the employer had been advised by its attorney that the attendance of all its warehouse employees at a representation hearing was unnecessary, and it offered to allow the employees to select one employee to attend as their representative. The employees had sought to attend en masse on the ground that the proceeding "concerned them." 227 NLRB at 1107–1108.

[3] No hearing was actually held on the scheduled date for the hearing on the underlying representation petition in this case. Instead, the parties, on that date, entered into an election agreement that included a "side agreement" that, inter alia, permitted one named individual to vote subject to challenge as a "confidential employee/supervisor."

[4] To the extent that the Respondent contended that there was no disciplinary significance to the classification of an absence as unexcused, however, I agree with my colleagues, for the reasons stated in the majority opinion, that telling Massey that the absence would be unexcused threatened her with a "meaningful" sanction.

[5] In the absence of a showing of unlawful motive, I would find this to be an independent violation of Sec. 8(a)(1)—coercing, restraining, and interfering with the protected activity of participating in a proceeding related to a union representation petition—but I would not find violations of Sec. 8(a)(3) or (4). See NLRB v. Burnup & Sims, 379 U.S. 21, 23 (1964) (independent violation of sec. 8(a)(1) may be found without proof of discriminatory motive); Textile Workers v. Darlington Mfg. Co., 380 U.S. 263, 269 (1965) (same).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

PHIL W. SAUNDERS, Administrative Judge. Based on charges filed on July 15, 1983, and amended charges filed on August 15, 1983,[1] by United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America, AFL–CIO (the Union or the Charging Party) a consolidated complaint was issued August 23 and an amended complaint on October 13, against Ohmite Manufacturing Company (the Company or Respondent) alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act. Respondent filed an answer to the complaints denying it had engaged in the alleged matter. Subsequent to the hearing, both the General Counsel and Respondent filed briefs in this matter. Respondent also filed a reply brief, but I have only considered those briefs initially filed.

On the entire record in the case, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

Respondent is a division of North American Philips Company, a Delaware corporation, and at all times mentioned, has maintained an office and place of business in Hudson, New Hampshire, and is now and continuously has been engaged at this location in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of power-type resistance products, electromechanical components, and related products.

Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business, causes and continuously has caused at all times mentioned large quantities of materials used by it in the manufacture of components, resistance products, and other products, to be purchased and transported in interstate commerce from and through various States of the United States other than the State of New Hampshire and causes, and continuously has caused at all times mentioned, substantial quantities of finished products to be sold and transported from the plant in interstate commerce to the States of the United States other than the State of New Hampshire.

Annually, Respondent sells and ships goods valued in excess of $50,000 from its Hudson, New Hampshire plant directly to points located outside of the State of New Hampshire.

Respondent is and has been engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[1] All dates are 1983 unless stated otherwise.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Respondent is a manufacturer of resistors and related materials used in the electronics industry, as aforestated, and in addition to its New Hampshire plant, the Company also has production facilities located in Princeton and Skokie, Illinois, its principal office. The Hudson, New Hampshire operation involved in the case, has been owned by Ohmite for over 10 years, and it employs approximately 89 persons.

During April, the Union initiated an effort to organize the employees at the Hudson plant. Union supporters within the plant used time available before and after work, breaks and lunch, and in some cases actual working time in the production area, to solicit employee authorization cards.

On or about April 28, Respondent received a demand for recognition, which stated that the Union had achieved a card majority. By letter dated May 16, the Union notified and disclosed to the Company the names of nine employees who made up a partial list composing the members of the union organizing committee. See Respondent Exhibit 3.

The Union and Respondent executed an election agreement on May 23, and pursuant to this agreement an election was conducted on July 1. The Union lost the election by a vote of 43 to 37 with 3 challenged ballots. The Union subsequently filed objections to the election, but later several of the objections were withdrawn. However, the remaining objections were consolidated with the instant unfair labor practice matter for hearing.[2]

The main issues in this proceeding are as follows:

Are Walden and Paradise supervisors or agents of the Respondent?

Did Respondent unlawfully enforce its rules regarding solicitation and personal phone calls?

Did Respondent threaten to discipline an employee if she attended an NLRB hearing.

Did the Respondent threaten to close its Hudson facility in retaliation for its employees' union activity?

Did Respondent threaten its employees with loss of benefits because of their union activity?

Did Respondent threaten to deny a wage increase to its employees because of their union activity?

Was Respondent's withholding of a pay increase prior to the election and granting of same subsequent to the election unlawful?

[2] Respondent contends that par. 8 of the amended complaint should not be allowed as it violated its right to due process; that the amendment contains many allegations that were previously dismissed or withdrawn by the Union in lieu of dismissal by the Regional Director. However, it is clear, as pointed out, under Sec. 102.17 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, that a complaint may be amended by the Regional Director prior to hearing, and I am in agreement that the amended complaint meets the requirements of Sec. 102.15 and, accordingly, it is sufficient to form the basis for litigation. It is further noted that all the pending allegations come within the scope of the amended charges and that none of them were either specifically withdrawn or dismissed. I am also aware and note that several additional unfair labor practice charges were not included as a part of the amended complaint even though they were brought against the Company during or subsequent to the election campaign, but after investigation by the Board all of these charges were withdrawn in lieu of dismissal. Moreover, at the instant hearing before me the General Counsel withdrew pars. 9, 10, and 11 of the consolidated complaint.

Did Respondent unlawfully interrogate and solicit grievances from its employees?

Did Respondent remove Plant Manager Rickard from the plant prior to the election and discharge him subsequent to the election in order to dissuade employees from supporting the Union?

Does Respondent's unlawful conduct warrant the setting aside of the election?

Did the union represent a majority of the unit as of April 28?

Are the unfair labor practices committed by the Respondent sufficient to warrant a bargaining order remedy.

Before addressing and discussing the specific allegations and issues, it should be noted at the outset that the election campaign here in question, and which lasted through May and June, was obviously quite open and "freewheeling" to all employees. In fact, this record shows that the plant's lunchroom and hallways were covered with both pro and antiunion propaganda and, as indicated, vocal employees on both sides of the issue aggressively asserted themselves and solicited support.[3] From time to time the Company's role also included clarifying misstatements of fact and law contained in the prounion materials, and policing both employee groups to help minimize the campaign's interference with plant operations and production. There were also numerous occasions when both pro and antiunion forces passed out and distributed leaflets, notices, and other literature.[4]

It is equally clear by this record, and most of the witnesses on both sides readily admitted, that the Company had a recognized "open door" policy in place both before and during the campaign period. Witnesses testified that they had numerous conversations and discussions with members of the corporate and plant management team in the months and years prior to the July 1 election, and in which employee grievances were openly discussed, investigated, and in some cases remedied. Moreover, it is also clear that a companywide grievance procedure, grievance committees, "birthday meetings," and other less formal channels of communication were continuously available to and used by the employees, and that the Company made efforts not to disrupt this system. A threshold question in this case is the supervisory status of Peter Walden and Sis Paradise.[5]

The General Counsel produced testimony through union committee members Jean Headley and Dot Bezio to the effect that Sis Paradise gave them instructions as to their work; that if they forgot to punch in for work, Paradise had the authority to sign for them; that on occasions Headley had received oral complaints about her work from Paradise; that if they were going to be absent from work or wished to leave early, they would contact Paradise; that there were approximately 10 to 15 employees in the finishing department supervised by Paradise; that at times Paradise authorized employees to work overtime; and that Paradise functioned as a conduit for messages from Plant Manager Rickard.

The General Counsel points out that in the election agreement, the Respondent consented that group leaders (including Walden and Paradise) were supervisors as defined in the Act; that it held them out to the employees as supervisors both by posting the Board election notice and distributing its own literature specifically stating their supervisory status.[6]

As above, the Company denies that group leaders Sis Paradise and Peter Walden are supervisors within the meaning of the Act, and while the Company did agree with the Union to exclude the group leaders from the bargaining unit, it did not stipulate to their supervisory status, and even so such a stipulation would not constitute a final determination of their supervisory status.

Section 2(11) of the Act provides:

> The term "supervisor" means any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

It is well-recognized Board law that the status of a supervisor under the Act is determined by an individual's duties, not by his title or job classification. It is also well settled that an employee cannot be transformed into a supervisor merely by the vesting of a title and theoretical power to perform one or more of the enumerated functions in Section 2(11) of the Act. To qualify as a supervisor, it is not necessary that an individual possess all of these powers. Rather, possession of any one of them is sufficient to confer supervisory status, and while these enumerated functions in Section 2(11) of the Act are to be read in the disjunctive, that section also "states the re-

[3] All charges and objections regarding the contents of the company letters and memos to employees were withdrawn or dismissed.

[4] See R. Exhs. 13–39 separate pro and antiunion samples of campaign material posted during the campaign in the off-work areas of the plant.

[5] During the time here in question, William Rickard was the plant manager; William Hogan was the plant foreman; Paul Moriarty was the manager of manufacturing services; and Hilda DeGrenier, Paul Walden, and Sis Paradise were classified as group leaders. Rickard was in charge of the entire plant; Moriarty reported to Rickard and was in charge of five quality control inspectors; Hogan reported to Rickard and through DeGrenier, Walden, and Paradise was in charge of the production employees. Max Sanders is the president of Respondent; Charles Dillon is the director of industrial relations; William Schneider is manager of manufacturing; and James Berg is the materials manager at the Skokie plant and served as acting plant manager for 2 weeks at Hudson. All the above individuals are admitted supervisors, except Walden and Paradise.

[6] The Stipulation for Consent Election, G.C. Exh. 3, and the Notice of Election, R. Exh. 22, excluded group leaders and other supervisors from the unit, but otherwise there are no admissions in these exhibits that Paradise or Walden was a supervisor or, for that matter, even the group leader. Moreover, under the Act, the status of an employee, and whether he or she is or is not a supervisor, is always determined by the individual's duties, and not by his title or job classification. It is also true that a finding or agreement to supervisory status in a representation case is not binding in an unfair labor practice case, Serv-u-Stores, 234 NLRB 1143 (1978).

quirement of independence of judgment in the conjunctive with what goes before." Thus, the individual must consistently display true independent judgment in performing one of the functions in Section 2(11) of the Act. The exercise of some supervisory tasks in a merely "routine," "clerical," "perfunctory," or "sporadic" manner does not elevate an employee into the supervisory ranks. Further, the existence of independent judgment alone will not suffice; "the decisive question is whether [the individual involved has] been found to possess authority to use [his or her] independent judgment with respect to the exercise . . . of some one or more of the specific authorities listed in Section 2(11) of the Act." In short "some kinship to management, some empathetic relationship between employer and employee must exist before the latter becomes a supervisor for the former."

This record clearly establishes that Paradise had none of the responsibilities and work-related duties associated with supervisory status. Unlike senior group leader Hilda DeGrenier who reported directly to the plant manager, Paradise was under the direct supervision of Plant Foreman Bill Hogan, and Hogan credibly testified that he had full responsibility for the hiring, firing, discipline, training, and instruction of the 50–60 employees under his supervision, and that all other employees were supervised by either Materials Manager Paul Moriarity or Hilda DeGrenier. Unlike Hogan and DeGrenier, it is clear that Paradise had no authority to interview or hire new employees; that only Hogan had the authority to issue warnings, discipline, or terminate employees under his supervision. Hogan further testified that Paradise, who had no office and who was not on salary, could not schedule work hours, assign overtime, or evaluate other employees' work. Moreover, Paradise did not have the authority to determine if an employee's absence would be excused or unexcused, could not grant an employee time off from work, and could not make adjustments on employee timecards.

This record also shows, contrary to the testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses, that it was not necessary for employees to seek permission from Paradise to be late or absent from work or to leave the plant early. Bill Hogan and others testified that employees were instructed to call the plant before their shift if they would be absent or delayed and that prior to 7:30 a.m. the office phone would ring only on the plant floor and in so doing it might be answered by any nearby employee. In fact, employees Doris Massey and Dot Bezio admitted that they regularly answered calls during the early morning hours and then communicated the call-in messages accordingly. In fact, on cross-examination the testimony of Jean Headley and Dot Bezio confirms in several respects the Company's position that Paradise served only as a work expediter and a conduit of information to and from the employees. Both Headley and Bezio agreed that Paradise had no authority to hire, fire or discipline employees, and that the written warnings came directly from Bill Hogan. They further admitted that Paradise reported directly to Hogan, and that they actually had no idea how decisions regarding overtime work were made. Finally, Headley agreed that Paradise functioned as a team leader, and only occasionally would act or give instructions unless told to do so by Hogan.

I do not attach any special significance to the argument by the General Counsel that the Company used Paradise at times to distribute their literature, and/or authorized her to answer employee questions concerning their upcoming election. As noted, the organizing campaign here in question was openly and vigorously conducted by both sides and continuously sprinkled with numerous questions and answers on related subjects, distributions of notices, posters, buttons, T-shirts, rumors, and various literature constantly displayed or circulated by all parties, and all coupled with frequent discussions among everyone concerned. Therefore, it is highly unlikely that any one person would or could be singled out with any special significance as to these endeavors, and certainly there are no such indications in this record.

I now turn to the question of whether Peter Walden was an agent and supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, as alleged. The General Counsel introduced testimony through Toni McNamara to the effect that Walden gave her instructions regarding her work; that if she called in sick or had to go home early she would speak to Walden or Hogan; and that "most of the time" Walden would authorize overtime.

Doris Massey testified that Walden was in charge of the coding area of about 15 to 20 employees; that he directed her work; that she contacted Walden when she was unable to come into work or wanted to leave early; that if she forgot to punch in Walden would sign in for her; and that on occasions Walden would relay instructions or directions from management people. However, on cross-examination, both Massey and McNamara admitted that Walden did not have the authority to interview or hire employees, nor did he have authority to issue written warnings, discipline, or terminate employees.

It was also established by the credited testimony of Foreman William Hogan that Walden was paid hourly, could not independently assign overtime, but would only communicate Hogan's request that particular machines work extra hours and Walden would then convey such instructions to the machine operators. It is also clear that Walden was not responsible for evaluating other employees' work, could not excuse an employee's absence, and could not even make final adjustments of errors on employee timecards without the approval of Hogan. In the final analysis, both the union and company witnesses generally agreed that Walden was a "work expediter" whose main function was to make sure that the work was processed quickly and in an orderly fashion, but under the direction of the foreman and plant manager.[7]

In light of the fact that Walden and Paradise exhibited none of the characteristics traditionally recognized by the Board as indicative of supervisory status, I have found that there is lacking an adequate basis in this record to find that either one was an agent of Respond-

[7] Like the circumstances involving Paradise, I also do not place any special significance on the fact that from time to time Walden may have passed out literature for the Company or answered questions—he was only one of many for both sides so engaged, as previously detailed.

ent and a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and, therefore, Respondent is not chargeable with their statements or conduct, as alleged. In accordance with the above, I dismiss the allegations contained in paragraphs 8(f), (j), (p), and (q) of the amended complaint.[8]

Paragraphs 8(a), (b), and (c) of the amended complaint alleges that:

> (a) Since on or about January 18, 1983, by issuing an employee rule book, Respondent promulgated, and since that date has maintained, the following rule:
> SOLICITING AND DISTRIBUTION OF LITERATURE
> Vending, soliciting or collection of any type for any reason during working time in any plant area is prohibited. However, any employee may engage in solicitation during non-working time in any plant area. Employees may not distribute pamphlets, notices of meetings, political material or any other type of literature at any time in work areas. Employees may distribute literature during non-working time only in non-working areas.
> (b) Since on or about May 1, 1983, Respondent maintained the rule described above in subparagraph (a) in order to discourage its employees from joining, supporting or assisting the union.
> (c) On or about May 1, 1983, Respondent acting through Walden and Hogan maintained and enforced the rule described above in subparagraph (a) selectively and disparately by applying it only against employees who joined, supported or assisted the Union.

Respondent's solicitation and distribution rule is presumptively valid. Our Way, Inc., 268 NLRB 394 (1983), in which the Board held that "rules barring solicitation during working time state with sufficient clarity that employees may solicit on their own time." As a result of the Our Way holding, the burden is on the General Counsel to establish that some violation of Section 7 rights occurred through enforcement of an otherwise valid rule.

The General Counsel produced testimony through Doris Massey, a leading union adherent, to the effect that prior to May 1 she was allowed to walk around the plant and talk to employees while she was at work, but testified that after May 1 she was reprimanded by Walden and Hogan for talking to employees while she was at work. Massey further testified that during the campaign she observed other workers talking to employees while they were at work, but these employees wore buttons that said "Vote No."[9]

In making my conclusions and findings concerning this allegation, it is first noted, and as duly acknowledged by Massey, that the Company also has a well-recognized rule stating that employees are supposed to be at their machine or in their work areas, unless they are on breaks or have been sent some place by someone in management. Moreover, the General Counsel's witnesses testified that they understood the distinction between break and worktime, and members of the union organizing committee—including Bezio, McNamara, Massey, Headley, and Ayers—admitted that they were not restricted from distributing prounion literature during nonworktime, including periods before and after their shift, during breaks, and lunch, and several of these same individuals testified that they were not even prevented from soliciting authorization cards during worktime in the plant production area.

As indicated, this record establishes that the Company took a uniform approach to the enforcement of its solicitation policy. Witnesses testified that the walls of the lunchroom and adjoining hallway were covered with both prounion and antiunion literature throughout the election campaign, but steps were taken to prevent the spread of campaign literature to the work area and members of both the prounion and antiunion groups were told to restrict their activities to areas other than the plant floor. In fact, both Massey and Bezio testified that they met with Plant Manager Rickard on or about May 13 to discuss alleged violations of the solicitation policy by the antiunion group. It appears that on this occasion Rickard repeated the Company's position that solicitation was restricted to the periods before and after work, and during breaks and lunch. Moreover, as Rickard testified, he then also took the precaution of warning both groups that solicitation was prohibited on the plant floor, and on cross-examination Massey conceded that Rickard informed the antiunion group to stay at their machines and that they were not to be posting and handing out items during working time.

Massey acknowledged that as a leader of the organizing committee it was her practice to initiate conversations with other employees to gather support for the Union, but at the same time, recognized it was part of Hogan's responsibility to maintain productivity by enforcing rules that required employees to remain in their work area except during breaks. On cross-examination, Massey testified:

> Q. So the rule that we're talking about is a rule that except during breaks you're supposed to be at [8] The General Counsel subpoenaed Peter Walden to testify, but Walden did not respond to the subpoena, and at the hearing the General Counsel initially offered the affidavit of Walden as an aid in the decision of whether to enforce the subpoena. However, after due considerations of all the factors involved, the General Counsel then decided to make an offer of proof consisting of Walden's affidavit. However, from the credited testimony of Foreman Hogan it appears that Walden was terminated by the Company for poor attendance and performance and, therefore, a consideration of this affidavit by me would deny to the Company the required opportunity for the cross-examination of a discharged former employee, and under such circumstances the strong possibility of a biased statement against Respondent. I have rejected the offer of proof, and due to the circumstances and events noted above, Respondent's motion to quash the subpoena is granted.

[9] She also testified that on one occasion Peter Walden told her not to leave her work area—to stay near her machine because she was being watched. However, because Walden is not a supervisor, as stated above, this statement cannot be chargeable to the Respondent.

your machine or in your work area, unless you've been sent somplace else by management?

A. Right.

Q. And that's so that we can produce resistors, which is what the company's business is? Correct?

A. Right.

Q. And if everybody is wandering around the plant it's not very good for production, is it?

A. No.

Q. And you say that you were told after May 1st to stay in your work area and not to be passing out literature or posting things when you were supposed to be at your machine?

A. Right.

Q. Now the company never tried to stop you from posting things in the lunch room or the ladies room before and after work or during breaks, did they?

A. No.

Q. You were allowed to do that?

A. Yes.

Q. And nobody ever said you couldn't?

A. Right.

In the final analysis, the reprimand Massey received from Hogan, above, was clearly only a part of the Company's lawful general practice of confining the election campaign to nonwork areas of the plant and maintaining productivity and was not improper discipline or interference. As testified to by Massey, this policy was applied evenly to both the prounion and antiunion groups. In accordance with the above, this allegation of the amended complaint is dismissed.

It is alleged that since on or about May 1, 1983, Respondent imposed more onerous terms and conditions of employment on its employees by more rigorous enforcement of its rule against receiving personal phone calls at work and selectively and disparately applying it only against employees who joined or assisted the Union.

Union committee member Jean Headley testified that on one occasion during the election campaign she had difficulty receiving a personal call from her husband concerning her sick child, but that after "arguing for a few minutes," she was then allowed to leave her work area to answer the call. Headley testified that antiunion employees, those wearing "Vote No" buttons during the campaign, were permitted calls and such were announced over the loudspeaker.

Union committee member Doris Massey testified that prior to May 1 she was allowed to receive personal phone calls at work, but that this policy changed and after this date employees with "Vote No" insignia on them were allowed to receive personal phone calls. Massey also testified that during the campaign she received an oral reprimand from Foreman Hogan for spending excessive time on the telephone.

The General Counsel argues that at the onset of the union organizing drive, Respondent, for the first time in over a year, began to enforce its rule relative to its employees receiving personal phone calls, and that the timing of this event, together with the lack of justification for it, other than vague and conclusionary testimony to the effect that a large number of calls were being made, is sufficient to establish a violation of the Act. Moreover, the example of Headley's call not being forwarded the day after she appeared with the Union at the National Labor Relations Board RC hearing on May 23, contrasted with Massey's testimony regarding a trivial phone call being put through to another employee, also establishes the disparate enforcement of the policy.

This record shows that throughout the years at their Hudson operations, management has periodically reminded employees of the handbook rule concerning personal telephone calls. As stated in the employee handbook—the Company's policy is to screen incoming messages and then call employees from their work areas only in emergency situations[10] and, as pointed out, both employees and supervisors agree that such periodic reminders are necessary to avoid unnecessary disruptions in the plant. In fact, Jean Headley even admitted policy reminders on phone calls were given in the year preceding the election campaign. Moreover, this record reveals that the Company had posted a reminder notice on the employee bulletin board approximately 1 year prior to the union campaign here in question,[11] and Doris Massey's testimony, after reviewing Respondent's Exhibit 6, even confirms that the Company had a regular practice of enforcing its personal phone policy:

> Q. And this was long before the Rubber Workers were ever organizing at Ohmite? Correct?
> A. Right.
> Q. So periodically it's fair to say that the Company has had to crack down on the number of personal phone calls because they were interfering with work.
> A. Right.
> Q. And the same thing happened in the Spring of 1983? Correct?
> A. Yes.

As set forth more fully by Respondent—the testimony in this case makes clear that despite the Company's acknowledged effort to enforce a reasonable work rule on phone calls, employee access to calls and phone messages was relatively unimpeded during the campaign, and aside from the short delay in the processing of Headley's call, stated above, no other witnesses testified that they were denied incoming telephone calls. Further, several witnesses for the General Counsel admitted that calls were received by union committee members including Gauthier, Ayer, Bezio, G. Hagen, Marks, McNamara, Arsenault, and Headley. In fact, on cross-examination Ayer admitted that employees were receiving personal phone calls whether or not they were on the union organizing committee.

In regard to Massey's reprimand from Foreman Hogan, as previously noted Hogan admitted that he did speak to her on one occasion regarding her constant use of the telephone. Hogan testified that he responded to

[11] R. Exh. 6.

Massey's request to leave her work station to make a personal call by stating:

> A. I said, okay, there's no problem, but you know, you have been using the phone an awful lot lately and you know, I want to keep it to a minimum.
> Q. Now why did you say that?
> A. Because she had been the using the phone an awful lot.
> Q. During working hours?
> A. Yes.

In her testimony, Massey agreed that Hogan's comment to her was a product of the Company's general enforcement of their phone policy. It is also noted that Massey, who was recalled in rebuttal as a witness after Hogan's testimony, did not dispute his claim that she was frequently seen out of her work area making and receiving personal calls. Moreover, as further indicated, at no time did Massey receive a written warning or other discipline on these grounds, nor were her telephone privileges discontinued.

I am in agreement that the General Counsel has introduced insufficient evidence to meet his burden that the isolated incidents described by Headley and Massey were discriminatory in nature or related to the organizing campaign and, accordingly, this allegation is also dismissed.

It is alleged that on several occasions in May, Respondent, by William Schneider, interrogated employees concerning their support for the Union, solicited grievances from them, and remedied the grievances.

Before turning specifically to the allegation, I think it best to set forth some of the background evidence in this record relating to the overall situation and circumstances pertaining to the Company's recognized policy of maintaining an "open door" for employees with complaints and grievances, as briefly indicated previously.

Charles Dillon, the Company's director of industrial relations, testified that he has maintained an open door policy since he joined the Company in 1966, and stated that this policy:

> . . . is one where employees have a right and privilege to come in to management and discuss their problems . . . employees have a right to use the complaint procedure or come directly to a manager or into personnel with their problems.

Thus, as further indicated, employees are regularly encouraged to discuss problems with supervisors and with the corporate headquarters people from the Skokie home office during their frequent visits to the Hudson plant. Dillon stated that he averaged fine to seven annual visits to Hudson, while William Schneider, in his capacity as manager of manufacturing, visited the plant on a monthly basis, and it is clear in this record that during such visits Dillon, Schneider, and a few other corporate staff members. regularly made it a practice to meet with employees at the work stations and to discuss their problems.[12] In fact, Jean Headley, and several other employees who testified, agreed that it was quite common for Dillon, Schneider, and others to regularly visit the Hudson plant and to discuss employee problems during these visits. Moreover, Doris Massey, a leader of the prounion group, confirmed that the Company encouraged employee-management communication:

> Q. And the Company maintained an open-door policy?
> A. Yes, they did.
> Q. When Mr. Dillon came out from Skokie did you see him walking around on the plant floor?
> A. Yes.
> Q. Did he ask you if you had any complaints, any problems?
> A. Yes, I suppose he did.
> Q. And this all, of course, took place long before the election campaign ever stated?
> A. Yes.

The General Counsel produced testimony through Jean Headley to the effect that sometime around mid-May, Manager Schneider approached her at work, said he noticed she was wearing a union button, and then asked her why she felt the employees needed a union. She explained to him what she felt was the overall problem, i.e., people not being treated fairly, and he then inquired if she had any specific problems. Headley told him that she had not received her efficiency ratings (on which her bonus was based) for a considerable period of time. Schneider then left, but returned shortly, and gave Headley her ratings. Headley further stated that while she had seen both Schneider and Dillon at the Hudson plant prior to the time period here involved—that in May and June they were at the plant more than ever before. She also testified that Schneider was not the person who normally gave out efficiencies and that he had not spoken to her since he had originally set up her machine in February 1982.

On cross-examination, Headley admitted that her talk in May was not her first or only conversation with Schneider regarding production problems, and further conceded that Schneider, who had set the piece rate on her machine in 1982, regularly attempted to solve employee problems. Headley also stated that the change in the method of efficiency rating reporting was again explained to her after the discussion with Schneider—that she was then informed that in order to see efficiency ratings, she would have to go to the plant office and ask for them.

Schneider testified that he talks to the employees on the production floor every time he comes to the Hudson plant, and that it is common for the employees to contact him regarding their efficiencies or piece rates, or problems with their machines. Schneider stated that he first [12] In Brookfield Dairy, 266 NLRB 698 (1983), the Board held that an 8(a)(1) violation occurred when, because of union activities, an employer discontinued its open door policy under which employees were free to discuss all job-related matters with their employer. Similarly, in Gould, Inc., 260 NLRB 54 (1982), the Board held that even the threat of eliminating an open door is unlawful.

ərned from Headley that the past company practice of roviding written efficiency rating slips had been hanged by management in the Hudson plant—that he hen investigated the matter and learned that under the ew system the efficiency ratings were available to em-loyees in the plant office, and were also given to em-loyees on their payroll checkstub, and as a result Head-ey was then given her rating by him and told how she ould obtain this information in the future under the new rocedure.

Headley's testimony confirms that the Company had, n fact, maintained an open-door policy, and for many ears had encouraged employees to discuss problems vith management, and Schneider's conversation with Headley demonstrated a consistent application of such ractice.

Turning now to Headley's testimony which she stated hat on this occasion Schneider also asked her why the mployees needed a union. In Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984), the Board held that it would no onger apply the PPG standard[13] to the effect that ques-ions of interrogations concerning union sympathies were nherently or per se coercive, but rather the standard for valuating whether interrogation of employees violates he National Labor Relations Act, is: "whether under all f the circumstances the interrogation reasonably tends o restrain, coerce, or interfere with rights guaranteed by he Act."

The Company does not deny that Schneider may have sked Headley why she felt the employees needed a nion at the Hudson plant, but there is no evidence that his conversation was accompanied by any coercive con-luct or had any adverse effect on Headley or on the out-ome of the election. Headley, along with the other nembers of the organizing committee, was known to the Company to be a supporter because of the Union's letters o the Company, but, nevertheless, Headley did not hesi-ate in responding to the question and listing her several rievances as to why they needed the Union. As indicat-d, she further testified that she was not threatened or in-midated in any way by Schneider's question, and also tated that it had no effect on her vote. Moreover, her estimony on cross-examination clearly establishes that nion activities were a small part of a larger dialogue, iscussed above, concerning the distribution of employee iecework efficiency ratings.

As stated above, this was one of many conversations etween Headley and Schneider, but the particular con-ersation here in question was obviously innocuous and pparently without effect in that no other employees ere present, and there is no evidence of it having any ffect on the election outcome or on Headley's active articipation in the union campaign. Examined in con-xt, and in consideration of all the circumstances, chneider's question was neither intended nor had the ffect of denying employee Section 7 rights.

Organizing committee member Kathy Gauthier testi-ed that on May 19, and with employee Abby Williams resent, she was approached by William Schneider and ked: "What I thought about the union, and I told him I would rather not talk about it, that I'd rather talk about the weather."

Schneider testified that what occurred on May 19 was just one of numerous conversations he has had with Gauthier and other employees during his regular visits to the Hudson plant. He stated that he made a point of talking to Gauthier every time he came to the Hudson plant as he has known her for a long time. He described Gauthier as a talkative person who often asked for and received advice from him on personal problems.

Schneider testified that the May 19 conversation was another of his normal discussions with Gauthier as he could not recall her raising any specific grievance or complaint, and denies introducing the topic of the Union and recalled: " . . maybe she said something like, you know, I asked how are things, and she said, well, everybody is talking about the union, but I'd rather talk about the weather." Schneider testified that employee Williams was not present during this discussion, and further indicated that if he spoke to Williams, it was after talking to Gauthier, as her work area was nearby.

I have credited the testimony of Schneider in which he denies introducing any union conversation, but even, assuming arguendo, accepting Gauthier's testimony and version of this incident, there is still no violation of the Act as no other unlawful conduct occurred with respect to either employee, and the nature of this inquiry, in the total context of all the circumstances, as stated above, is not sufficient to establish the kind of interference, restraint, or coercion that would constitute "a violation of Section 8(a)(1)." Rossmore House, supra. Similarly, in Stumpf Motor Co., 208 NLRB 431 (1941), the Board held that management asking "a self-proclaimed and known union adherent" what he thought of the union, did not violate Section 8(a)(1), but was merely a conversation opener.

In accordance with the above, this allegation relating to Schneider is dismissed.

It is alleged that on or about June 22, and on two occasions on or about June 23, Materials Manager James Berg, from the Respondent's Skokie plant and headquarters, interrogated an employee concerning the employees' union sentiments and solicited grievances and impliedly promised to remedy the grievances.

Kathleen Gauthier testified that on June 22 James Berg spoke to her at her work station and asked why she wanted a union, and that she replied "for more benefits and more respect." She also testified that Berg then asked her if the discharge of William Rickard, the plant manager, "would stop the thing with the union," and she replied that she didn't think—"We've gone too far."

Manager Berg testified that because of his unfamiliarity with the Hudson plant, he made a point of touring the plant floor and meeting the employees immediately after his arrival:

> Well, basically since I did not know the operation that well, I wanted to go out on the floor and just see how the floor flowed through and how we followed up on our orders in case I did get a call from Skokie on a preorder I would know where to go or who to see.

Berg also confirmed that he did initiate a conversation with Gauthier during his tour of the plant, he stated:

> I did walk out to the floor. I had a purpose of going to that work area. She was assembling what we call a DA assembly, it's an assembly for winders. And we've been having problems with parts situations and I was walking out to that area at the plant to find out just what type of DA's the ladies were making. As I walked in that area she was the very first girl I happened to see walking through there and I happened to say Good morning, how are you? What DA's are your working on? And she told me and I said how are you working, are the machines running properly. And she began to say that her machine had not been running as well as it could have, or as it had in the past, that she had been having minor problems with mechanical problems and that she wasn't satisfied where she wasn't getting service. When she did have problems no one responded to her problems and she wasn't making as many parts as she thought she should have.

Berg also testified that he was interested in Gauthier's complaint because it related to his work in the Skokie plant as both plants made several assemblies for each other.

Berg testified that through her minor complaints about not getting respect, not being advanced fast enough, and having some mechanical problems with her machine, he then began to realize that Gauthier was a union sympathizer, and he replied:

> I kind of said that I really don't understand why you need outside help. These problems seem minor and they should be able to be taken care of right here within the plant and that's all I said.

Berg further testified that he then told Gauthier he would look into her problems:

> Q. And that was your, that was company policy, isn't it?
> A. Yes.
> Q. If an employee has a problem the manager looks into it.
> A. Yes.
> Q. And that had been the case long before this organizing drive ever started.
> A. Definitely.

Dot Bezio testified that during the third week of June she had two discussions with Berg, and that both of these conversations occurred at her workplace. She stated that in the first conversation Berg asked her why she felt that she needed "outside help" to negotiate, and if some changes were made would it make a difference. Bezio said that the second conversation occurred the following day when Berg again asked her why she needed outside help, and after she complained that the internal grievance process was not working and in particular complained about the way she had been treated by Rickard—Berg then told her "that doesn't sound good—I'll look into it."

Berg testified that on the occasions in question he and Bezio had talked for quite a while about different things—that Bezio was a gregarious person—and the more they talked the more she began to tell him about her problems. Berg stated that he was "shocked" at some of her complaints "because some of the problems were so minor. Some of the things were very solvable right there, immediate."

> Q. Was this problems with the machines or what?
> A. Machines, personalities, small grievances not being attended to. More or less the same type of thing the other girl was saying the previous day.

Berg confirmed that he told Bezio that he did not believe she needed outside help with these type of grievances, but that he would look into a few of her complaints:

> But I couldn't promise her I could fix it. I was only going to be there for two weeks.
> Q. Was it your understanding, was that company policy when an employee said they had a problem you would also look into it?
> A. Yes.

The General Counsel argues that Gauthier's testimony should be credited over that of Berg—that Berg's testimony was inconsistent regarding what Gauthier said to him and incredible in his claims that he did not know Gauthier was a union adherent when others in management were obviously aware of her activities. Moreover, that any determination of Berg's credibility must include a determination of why Berg was at the Hudson plant at the time in question because Berg admitted that his position at Skokie is not comparable with that of a plant manager, and that none of the functions of his position are performed by a plant manager, and that other than an earlier 2-day visit he had never even been at the Hudson plant, but despite these factors he was put in charge while Rickard was absent during the last 2 weeks in June. The General Counsel further points out and argues that in the past Berg had been sent to the Respondent's plant in Princeton when a union campaign was taking place, and it is the contention of the General Counsel that the real reason for Berg's assignment to Hudson was to be the "nice guy," and find out exactly what it would take to dissuade the employees from supporting the activities there, and that his total lack of credentials to serve as the Hudson plant manager, together with his admitted assignment to another plant during a union organizing campaign, cannot be dismissed as a mere coincidence.

Turning to the testimony of Bezio—the General Counsel maintains that there is not a great deal of difference between Bezio's and Berg's version of their conversations, and to the extent they differ it is the General Counsel's contention, for the reasons set forth above regarding Berg's credibility, that Bezio's version be credited. If credited, this testimony clearly establishes that Bezio was unlawfully interrogated and solicited, and neither the fact that she was wearing a union button or the Company's preexisting open door policy is a defense to Berg's action.

First of all, in making my determinations concerning the testimony here in question, I am unable to attach any significant weight to the argument by the General Counsel that Materials Manager Berg lacked credentials to serve as the temporary manager at the Hudson plant in the absence of Rickard.

The credited evidence in this record reveals that Plant Manager William Rickard was away from the Hudson plant for the last 2 weeks in June, while attending a computer training course and consulting with company engineers regarding machine modifications (more on this later), and that the Company assigned James Berg, Skokie plant materials manager, to cover for Rickard during his 2 weeks' absence. Moreover, whatever other functions the General Counsel assigns to Berg while at the Hudson or Princeton plant, must be deemed as pure speculation, and his inferences therefrom are completely lacking in any evidentiary status so far as this record is concerned. Berg struck me as a highly capable executive with considerable experience, and as a straightforward and a very candid witness in all respects.[14]

As indicated, it is also noted that both Gauthier and Bezio admitted that their conversations with members of management were a result of the Company's ongoing open-door policy and, as previously pointed out, the Board has held that it can be a violation of 8(a)(1) to discontinue an existing open-door policy during an organizing campaign—Brookfield Dairy, supra. The testimony in this record clearly establishes that the Company has consistently applied and maintained its longstanding practice of soliciting and remedying employee grievances. In fact, Dot Bezio, in this regard, testified on cross-examination as follows:

> Q. Mr. Dillon has been coming out for years, hasn't he?
> A. Yes.
> Q. And when he came out he went around and talked to employees about what problems they had?
> A. We talked about panel meetings.
> Q. Birthday meetings or grievance panel meetings?
> A. Grievance panel meetings.
> Q. And all that was before the union?
>
> A. That's right.
> Q. So this conversation with Mr. Berg wasn't really much different from those earlier conversations, was it?
> Mr. Fitzsimmons: Objection.
> Judge Saunders: Well, if you know.
> A. That conversations with Mr. Berg were different? Yes.
> Q. But he was asking what the problems were, wasn't he?
>
> A. Right.
> Q. And earlier Mr. Dillon and other people from Skokie had asked similar questions, hadn't they?
> A. More or less.

Regarding the interrogation of these two employees by Berg, it is equally clear that no violation of the Act occurred. Berg's comments, which he freely admitted to, and under all the circumstances noted above, were neither coercive in intent or intimidating in result. Rossmore House, supra.[15]

In the final analysis, the General Counsel has not sustained his burden of establishing that Bezio and Gauthier were in any way inhibited from exercising their Section 7 rights. Berg's casual inquiries must be deemed as only a pattern or part of a larger dialogue in which corporate management officials have used for many years in their contacts and visits with employees while in Hudson, and in so doing seeking out their individual problems and then in some instances followed with their endeavors to help correct such difficulties.

The allegations as to James Berg are dismissed.

It is alleged that on or about June 23, 1983, Respondent, by Charles Dillon, solicited an employee's grievances and impliedly promised a remedy to the grievances.

Kathleen Gauthier testified that she had a conversation at her work station with the Respondent's director or industrial relations, Charles Dillon, on June 23, and Dillon asked what did she want out of a union, and she replied, "respect." No evidence was introduced of any promise by Dillon to remedy this request.

As to this incident here in question, Dillon testified as follows:

> Q. Did you, in fact, have a conversation with her?
> A. Yes, I did.
> Q. And by that time you received Mr. Morbidello's letter informing you that she was on the organizing committee, had you?
> A. That's right.
> Q. So, you knew where Cathy stood, didn't you?
> A. Oh, yes.

[14] Berg denied any talk with any employee about the possibility of firing Rickard. Berg stated that he was in no position to obtain Rickard's termination—that Rickard did not report to him, that, in fact, both of them were managers but in different chains of command.

[15] In Graham Architectural Products v. NLRB, 697 F.2d 534, 541, (3d Cir. 1983), the Third Circuit has also made the same approach:

> In deciding whether questioning in individual cases amounts to the type of coercive interrogation that section 8(a)(1) proscribes, one must remember two general points. Because production supervisors and employees often work closely together, one can expect that during the course of the workday they will discuss a range of subjects of mutual interest, including ongoing unionization efforts. To hold that any instance of casual questioning concerning union sympathies violates the Act ignores the realities of the workplace. Moreover, as the United States Supreme Court recognized in NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), the First Amendment permits employees to communicate with their employees concerning an ongoing union organizing campaign "so long as the communications do not contain a threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit." Id. at 618, 89 S.Ct. at 1942. This right is recognized in section 8(c) of the Act. Section 8(a)(1) of the Act deprived the employers of any right to ask non-coercive questions of their employees during such a campaign, the Act would directly collide with the Constitution. What the Act proscribes is only those instances of true "interrogation" which tend to interfere with the employee's right to organize.

Q. And was Cathy's version of that conversation entirely accurate.

A. No.

Q. Would you tell the Judge in your own words based on your own memory how that conversation went.

A. I was walking over to where Cathy was working in the capping area and she had one of these big union buttons on. That was the first time I had seen her wear one, although she may have worn it before that, but it was the first time for myself. And I, in a way kiddingly, said I'm surprised to see you wearing one of those buttons and she responded that she felt that maybe we need some changes around here and that was the reason she was for the union.

She also indicated that there were some problems with the equipment and the people could not communicate to their plant manager. And she said also that if a union could not do anything for them they could always, she used the term, fire them, after a year.

Q. What, if anything did you say?

A. My response to her was the fact that, that it may be much more difficult to get rid of them than you think.

Q. She said that you said it was a long process. Do you think you may have said that?

A. I said it was a long process.

Q. Did you in any way say that it was impossible to get rid of the union?

A. No.

Q. In fact, you know that it isn't.

A. That's right.

Q. Did you say that you would—Did you say anything threatening to her about her wearing the button?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you say anything bad was going to happen to her because she was wearing the button?

A. No, I did not.

Q. Did you promise her that anything good would/happen if she took it off?

A. No.

Q. How long do employees have to wait after an election before they can ask for a decertification of election? Do you know, Chuck?

A. It's a year.

Q. Is that what you were referring to was a long time?

A. That's right.

In making my conclusions as to this allegation, it is first noted the admitted testimony of Gauthier to the effect that the conversation here in question was just one of many she had with Dillon during his frequent visits to the Hudson plant, and that she "always got along" with Dillon, and agreed that it had been his regular practice for quite some time to discuss plant related and personal matters with her.

Since both the testimony of Gauthier and Dillon establishes that this conversation was not coercive or intimidating and was not communicated to other employees, and based on decisions previously noted Rossmore, supra, no violation of the Act should be found, and I have so concluded.

It is alleged that on May 19 and 20 Dillon conditioned a wage increase on the defeat of the Union; that on or before July 1, 1983, Respondent failed to give a pay increase to its employees because they joined, supported, or assisted the Union and in order to discourage them from engaging in such activities; and that on or about July 14, 1983, Respondent gave its employees a pay increase retroactive to July 4, 1983, in order to discourage its employees from joining, supporting, or assisting the Union.

The General Counsel produced testimony through Jean Headley to the effect that at a "birthday meeting" in May,[16] in which about 14 employees were in attendance, and one of them asked Industrial Relations Director Dillon about the pay raise they had been getting each year, and that Dillon replied:

> . . . that as we knew the raise was usually effective on July 1st, and that this year the fly in the ointment was the union activities. And that the election was coming up on July 1st, and that if you voted no for the union the raises would go through as per usual. And if we voted yes, that we would have to wait and see, that they couldn't give us a raise right away because the union could use it against them as an unfair labor charge.

It appears that Lillian Ayer was also at the "birthday party" in May, and she testified that on this occasion someone inquired about the pay raise, and Dillon replied:

> Dillon said something about a worm in the ointment—a fly in the ointment. And then I turned and spoke to the person next to me, and I didn't hear the rest of the statement.[17]

Jeanine Gagne testified that in late June, she asked Dillon if employees were going to get a raise, and he answered: "It all depends on the union. If it comes in we wouldn't, and if it didn't we would get the raise." Gagne stated that each year the Company had given a wage increase and usually during the first week in July.

Counsel for the General Counsel argues that the testimony by his witnesses establishes that Respondent placed the onus for its failure to continue its prior pay raise policy on the Union, and thereby violated the Act. Moreover, maintains counsel for the General Counsel, [16] It appears that "birthday meetings" were started by Rickard some time ago, and each employee whose birthday falls within that particular month was invited to the conference room for a general meeting with management and a discussion on production and other related matters. Headley agreed that Dillon had been attending such meeting for several years during his visits to the Hudson plant.

[17] Ayer agreed that even prior to the advent of organizational activities Dillon would visit the Hudson plant from time to time and would walk around the production floor talking to the employees and trying to find out if they had any complaints or problems, and then tell them he would endeavor to do something about it. Ayer also agreed that "for years" this had been Dillon's practice.

even if his witnesses are not credited, Respondent's statements and propaganda establish a violation—that an employer who wishes to lawfully withhold a pay raise during a campaign may do so only if it postpones the increase for the duration of the campaign and informs its employees of such, and then states that its reason for doing so is to avoid the appearance of interfering with the election—that in Uarco Inc., 169 NLRB 1153 (1968), the employer made it clear in its campaign statements that whether or not its employees were represented by a union, it planned to continue its established practice of adjusting wage rates, but Respondent, in the instant case, has made no such announcement, and never assured its employees that they would get their annual raise even if they selected the Union, and this lack of a positive statement by Respondent was particularly harmful in the instant case as the plant was full of rumors that the pay raise would not be granted if the Union was selected. The General Counsel maintains that these rumors were the most talked about subject in the campaign, and not a surprising fact in light of the propaganda being turned out by the antiunion employees. Moreover, contends the General Counsel, because Respondent was aware of this propaganda, by means of it being posted, it had almost a mandatory obligation to make a positive statement that the employees would get the pay raise even if the Union won the election. The General Counsel further maintains that none of Respondent's propaganda specifically ensures the pay raise if the employees selected the Union—rather, it informed them that the wage increase would be granted if the Union lost but would be subject to negotiation if the Union won, and that this is shown by the text of President Max Sanders' June 29, 1983 speech to the employees (G.C. Exh. 5) in which Sanders (above) informs the employees that if they select the Union to represent them there is no guarantee that they will receive any wage increase at all, and that even if they do, it will be subject to what could prove to be many months of bargaining, and then proceeds to contrast that with the treatment the employees would receive if they reject the Union, specifically making reference to the annual wage increase and the fact that Dillon has completed the annual wage survey for the increase.

This record clearly establishes that it was Dillon's responsibility, as director of industrial relations for all three plants, to recommend the amount of the annual wage increase, and that his recommendation in this respect is reviewed by the company president and division directors who often make adjustments before approving the proposed increase. To prepare his recommendation, Dillon conducts an annual area wage survey for each plant, and in the Hudson area this involves collecting information from local employers and the Southern New Hampshire Industrial Association, and determining a competitive wage rate based on this data.

Dillon credibly testified that unlike prior years, he was unable to complete the 1983 wage survey until the mid-June, and cited a variety of factors as responsible for this delay, including his other obligations as director of industrial relations and the time consumed by several NLRB proceedings involving the Hudson plant.[18]

As further indicated, on May 23, Dillon and counsel for Respondent attended the unit hearing at the Regional offices, and at this time the Company and the Union agreed that the election should be held on a payday (Friday) after both sides had an opportunity to share their views. Dillon testified that he then discussed several dates with his counsel, and in so doing learned that his counsel would be unavailable on two Fridays, June 17 and 24, because of other commitments. However, the parties then agreed to Friday, July 1, as the date for the election. Dillon also testified that soon after the unit hearing, he then informed his counsel of the potential problem with the election date and the annual increase:

> I discussed with our attorney the fact that there was this [election] on July 1st, and we normally gave out our wage increases at that time and felt that this could be a difficult situation for us because by granting an increase before the election might influence the employees and thereby invoke an unfair labor practice charge against us.

Dillon testified that after discussing the above matters with members of management it was then decided to withhold judgment and simply go ahead with the survey, and it appears that the Hudson plant wage survey was completed in mid-June, and then sent to the directors, but final approval of the wage increase was not received until the second week of July:

> Q. And why was it delayed?
> A. Well, [we] couldn't get all the division directors together at one time, some were out of town, the president also, our attorney was unavailable.

Dillon also testified that the wage increase for Hudson was then announced on July 12, and that the decision to make the raise retroactive was made by the company president who agreed that the employees should not be penalized because of Respondent's own delay.

In making my determinations regarding these allegations, it is initially noted that the Board has held in numerous wage increase cases that there is no violation of the Act if the employer acts consistently with his own past practice even if that practice is not entirely regular.[19] As indicated, in Sugardale Foods, 221 NLRB 1228

[18] It appears that as a result of former employee Pat Tabor's unfair labor practice charge filed May 2, Dillon was also obligated to spend considerable time preparing the Company's response. Tabor's charge was subsequently withdrawn. Moreover, the receipt of the Union's recognition letter on April 28, 1983, placed additional demands on his time, and required him to meet with the Company's directors, plant supervisors, and counsel on numerous occasions.

[19] It should also be noted that an employer is under no absolute prohibition in the matter of granting benefits to employees, even during the course of a union organizing campaign, but it is true that benefits announced and granted during such a sensitive period will be closely scrutinized. Indeed, the Board has held, in the matter of granting wage increases, that there arises a strong presumption of illegality in the granting thereof during a union campaign. However, an employer is free to grant benefits as if the union were not in the picture, i.e., as it would in its normal business operations, absent any union organizing effort. Winiex Knitting Mills, 216 NLRB 1058 (1975).

(1975), the Board held that no violation occurs where the employer's reason for delaying the wage increase was to avoid election interference. The Board noted that when there is no evidence that the employer sought to undermine the Union by delaying the increase, and the employees understood the reason for the delay, no violation can be found, and the Board further found that, as in the instant case, there is no violation if the pay raise is subsequently applied retroactively.

In the instant case, Dillon had explained to several employees that the timing of the wage increase could result in an unfair labor practice charge, and numerous employee witnesses testified that they understood management's concern that a pay raise on or before election day could be viewed as a "bribe," or an unfair labor practice.[20] Therefore, even if the Company had completed the wage survey in time for July 1, a delay until after the election could have been appropriate.

In the final analysis, the Company acted consistently with its past practices (granted annual wage increases sometime during the first part of July); avoided their apprehensions of possible election interferences by delaying the increase until after the election; and explained to employees on several occasions why the delay in their opinion was necessary.[21]

Under the facts and circumstances of this case, I am unable to conclude or find that Respondent's deferral of the pay raise was coercive in nature or created an atmosphere that interfered with the employees' exercise of a free choice in the election. On the contrary, I find no evidence that the Company sought to undermine the position of the Union or to influence the votes of employees in the impending election by deferring the increases, or that the employees believed such to have been the case. Indeed, as the Company made it clear to the employees that the sole purpose of deferring the expected pay increases was to avoid the appearance of interference with the election, and therefore within the guidelines of Uarco Inc., 169 NLRB 1153 supra.

It is alleged that on or about May 20, 1983, Manager Rickard told an employee that attending an NLRB hearing would be an unexcused absence.

Doris Massey testified that on the date indicated below she gave a letter addressed to William Rickard from Union Agent Morbidello, which requested that she act as a observer for the Union at the RC hearing on May 23 and, if necessary, on consecutive days thereafter.[22] Massey stated that later in the day she asked the plant manager if she could be excused to attend the hearing as indicated in the letter, but that Rickard then replied that if she took the day off it would be an unexcused absence and would go against her record. Massey testified that prior to the date in question she had been allowed absences for personal business and she was also aware of other employees who were permitted excused absences for personal business. Massey said that as a result of her conversation with Rickard she did not attend the hearing even though Rickard did not tell her that she could not go.

The General Counsel points out and argues that Rickard threatened Massey by stating that her attendance at the RC hearing would result in an unexcused absence because it is clear that such an absence, while not a per se basis for discipline, can together with other absences, result in discipline up to and including discharge, and that the best evidence of the reality of the threat is that Massey did not go to the hearing. Moreover, Massey's testimony that both she and others have received excused absences for personal business was not refuted. The General Counsel also points out that although Respondent made much at hearing that Massey's requested attendance was only as an observer, it is clear that by the date of her request Respondent was aware of Massey's status as the foremost union adherent, and that her request was not one made out of mere curiosity and, accordingly, Rickard's statement to her violated Section 8(a)(1).

The Company does not dispute that union adherent Doris Massey was told that her absence from work to observe the May 23 unit hearing would be considered "unexcused," but the Company maintains that this action was proper and consistent with past practice and does not constitute a violation of the Act.

Plant Manager Bill Rickard testified that whether an absence is considered excused or unexcused is relatively unimportant unless an employee has a noticeable attendance problem, and that it would take at least three unexcused absences in a month before an employee would receive even a written warning.

Plant Foreman Bill Hogan testified that excessive absenteeism was rarely regarded as a termination offense except under extreme circumstances or where it became "habitual—for example group leader Peter Walden was [20] Dillon credibly refuted the statements attributed to him by Jean Headley. Dillon testified that at this May meeting, when a question was asked if a pay increase would be given, he replied by stating that at this time it was very difficult to answer this question and pointed out that by announcing the wage increase the Company could have an unfair labor practice charge filed against them. Employee Kim Adams testified that no one from management ever told them that they were not going to get a pay raise, but there were rumors to the effect that if the Union came in there would/be no pay raise or that he raise might be delayed—that Dillon had stated that he did not want the union people to think that the Company was "bribing" them. Employee Mary Brown testified that she had two conversations with Dillon regarding the pay raise, and on the first occasion in March he told her that they were "pretty sure" the raise would be given, and on the second occasion in June, Dillon told her that the raise may have to be held off because the Union could say the employees were being bribed. Employee Terry Cote also gave similar testimony. It should also be noted that not one of the participants, other than Headley, testified that they came away believing that the wage increase was conditioned on the election results, and employees Terri Cote, Diane Arseneault, Kim Adams, and committee member Lillian Ayer each testified that they had no doubt that they would receive a raise in 1983. Moreover, Dillon's May 10 letter to employees spoke of "continued wage increases" (R. Exh. 24), and his June 24 preelection letter referred to wage increases "every year" for our "past ten years" (G.C. Exh. 6). Finally, on the eve of the election, Respondent's President Max Sanders spoke to all employees and in so doing mentioned that Dillon had "just recently completed his annual wage survey," and also mentioned that employees were aware of the company policy in which wage adjustments were made each year.

[21] In posted notices to employees relative to the election, there are no references to any wage increase delays or nonpayment that I am aware of. In fact, in R. Exh. 26, dated May 23, 1983, Dillon states that the Company expects to continue its policy of wage increases.

In her testimony, Massey admitted that she was not under a subpoena to attend the RC hearing,[23] and further admitted she was not told that she could not attend the hearing, and was not threatened with any form of discipline. It appears that Rickard simply informed her that her absence would be considered unexcused, based on his understanding of the Company's attendance procedures, and Massey was not given a written warning on this or any other occasion during the campaign.

As further indicated, the decision not to attend the unit hearing was made by Massey, and not by the Company, and whether an absence was unexcused or excused has no effect on an employee's earnings or wages. Further, Massey had no grounds for concern unless she made a habit of her absenteeism, and there is no evidence of this. I am in agreement that the Company treated Massey's request no differently than it would an employee's request to visit a lawyer, a doctor, or attend any other need of a personal interest. In the final analysis, Massey was not prevented from attending the hearing, and was not threatened with any meaningful disciplinary action if she chose to attend, but would merely be accorded an unexcused absence based on the Respondent's normal procedures. In accordance with the above, this allegation is dismissed.

It is alleged that on or about June 1983, Respondent, by Hilda DeGrenier, threatened employees that they would not receive their annual pay increase, that they would lose all their benefits, that the Company would shut down the plant, and they would be laid off if they selected the Union to represent them.

Kathleen Gauthier testified that in the third week in June she and two other employees, Carol Marks and Carol Maginguy,[24] had a conversation with supervisor and senior group leader Hilda DeGrenier, and in which DeGrenier told them:

> She didn't have much to say too much about a union because she was in one and she didn't think they did much for the people. And then if we did we'd lose our benefits if we did go for a yes vote. We'd lose our vacation and a lot of other things. It could get down to 10 to 15 people, if there were to be like a layoff.

Gauthier also remembered DeGrenier telling them that "they could get to close the shop, and the union people could be out of a job."

DeGrenier testified credibly and at quite some length regarding her several conversations with Gauthier and other employees during the campaign. DeGrenier, who has worked for Ohmite and its predecessor for many years, testified that she had numerous friends in both the pro and antiunion group, and for this reason took no active part in the campaign, but prior to her employment at the Company she had worked in several factories where she became an active union member and at one time even served as a steward. DeGrenier testified that through this background, and her husband's current membership in a union, she had a good understanding of negotiations and contract ratification process, and that some of the employees were aware of her knowledge in these matters, and as a result asked her questions about the Union's campaign promises. DeGrenier testified that during such conversations she expressed her own opinion on a variety of employee questions and on matters regarding the contents of the posted pro and antiunion campaign literature in the plant.

DeGrenier testified that during this conversation Gauthier and the two other employees approached her with questions regarding a particular prounion wall poster that promised increased wages, benefits, and job security if the Union was elected. DeGrenier testified that when asked if the Union could make such guarantees by Gauthier and Marks, she stated:

> And so I had explained to her that it wasn't necessarily so. That company nor union could guarantee you a job because if things got slack, we would have a layoff and that the least senior person would get laid off first (the layoff procedures at Hudson).[25]

DeGrenier stated to employees that whether layoff occurred at the plant depended on the economy, and not on whether there was a union in the plant. DeGrenier testified that she told the employees that the Union could not guarantee increased wages, that this was not necessarily so, but denied saying anything about losing wages or benefits:

> Q. Did you say that they would lose their vacations if they voted for the union?
> A. No, sir.
> Q. Did you think that was the case?
> A. No, sir. I knew better.
> Q. How did you know better?
> A. Because that is not—even with the other unions I belonged to, it was never worked that way.
> Q. You never lost your vacation.
> A. No, sir.
> Q. Did you tell them they would lose their insurance and their benefits if they voted for the union?
> A. No, sir.
> Q. Did you tell them the plant was going to close down if they voted for the union?
>
> A. No, sir.
> Q. Did you tell them that they had killed the wage increase for this year?
> A. No, sir.

[23] See R. Exh. 31—a company notice to employees stating that any employee subpoenaed to testify at the instant hearing, would be paid their normal wages minus witness fee received.

[24] Marks and Maginguy were not subpoenaed or called as witnesses by the General Counsel.

[25] There had been a general layoff at the Hudson plant in December 1982, over 6 months before the election. This record also shows that an unfair labor practice charge filed by the Union alleging that the Company had unlawfully tampered with Gauthier's seniority because of her union involvement was later withdrawn or dropped by the Union.

Q. Did you think there would be a wage increase this year?

A. Yes, sir.

Supervisor DeGrenier further testified that Gauthier was concerned about her seniority, stated above, and the possibility of another layoff and raised the issue during subsequent conversations, but she repeatedly told Gauthier that she had no knowledge of any plant shutdown. However, as also indicated, DeGrenier did state that a union could not guarantee job security and that the negotiation process carried no guarantees of improved wages or benefits—that the parties would get together and would then "dicker" over insurance, vacation, and holidays.

I am in agreement that the General Counsel has introduced no credible evidence that DeGrenier threatened employees during her conversations with them; but on the contrary, the evidence adduced clearly establishes that DeGrenier presented an accurate, fair, and balanced approach in employee-initiated discussions of union matters and bargaining realities. See, e.g., White Stag Mfg. Co., 219 NLRB 1246 (1975).[26] Moreover, several employees testified that their conversations with DeGrenier left them with no impression whether unions were good or bad, and even Gauthier admitted that DeGrenier told employees to vote their conscience: "I told them that it was very important that they all vote. It was their right to vote irregardless of whichever way they voted. But please vote."

In the final analysis, the union statements or replies admitted by DeGrenier did not constitute threats that the Company would not bargain in good faith; that employees would not receive the annual pay increases or would lose all benefits; or that the plant would be shut down; or that employees would be laid off if they selected the Union. Further, there is no evidence that any of the employees involved in the alleged incident, all of whom were committee members, were inhibited, restricted, or dissuaded in their support for the Union. DeGrenier's comments were merely the expression of personal opinion of a low-level supervisor and, under the circumstances here, no violative conduct can be attributed to her as she merely informed interested employees in some of the basic realities in the collective-bargaining process.

This allegation is dismissed in accordance with the above.

It is alleged that on or about June 17, 1983, Respondent removed William Rickard from the plant as a benefit to employees to induce them not to select the union to represent them, and that on or about July 7, 1983, Respondent discharged Rickard in order to discourage its employees from joining, suppporting, or assisting the Union.

It appears that some 9 or 10 months ago from the date of the hearing, the Hudson plant installed a data processing computer system of Texas Instruments in order to process invoices and to improve the transmission of payroll data, and Dillon testified that during early 1983, when this related matter came up for discussion, Rickard expressed interest in attending a training school on the use of this equipment so as to be familiar with it, and then, in turn, he would be in a position to train employees at the Hudson plant. Dillon stated that about the same time period, it was also necessary for Rickard to work with and acquire experience in processing new coating methods on certain machines, and during the latter part of June, Rickard was sent to Skokie for this purpose and then went to the Anchor Brush headquarters in Tennessee for training on the data processing equipment. Dillon testified that Anchor Brush set the time for the training and Rickard's trip during the last 2 weeks in June had nothing to do with the Union.

Bill Rickard testified regarding his whereabouts 2 weeks prior to the election and corroborates the testimony of Dillon:

Q. Just a couple other questions, Bill. Where were you during the two weeks prior to the election?

A. I was in Skokie and in Tennessee.

Q. Would you briefly tell the Judge what you were doing in Skokie.

A. In Skokie we were working on a problem we had with the 44 processing, that was type of resistor that we made, and I was working with the engineers on that out in Skokie. We also were working on another process which is called a 22 coating machine, which Skokie was putting together and because of Hudson being the only location that had that process, I was helping them develop the equipment. And I also went down to Tennessee to deveop a program, computer program, that we had been working on for months, the T.I. system.

Q. For a Texas Instruments system?

A. Right.

Q. And when did the Hudson plant acquire that Texas Instruments system?

A. On, at least eight to ten months prior to me going out there.

Q. Prior to late June.

A. Right.

Q. And what were you learning in Tennessee about the Texas Instruments system, just briefly?

A. Well, what we were doing was, we had several manual reports that were being done in the office and because of the expense of the Texas Instruments system, we were trying to convert those over to a computer entry.

Q. And somebody from Hudson had to go to this seminar?

A. Yes.

Q. And how did you come to be the one?

A. Well, I actually volunteered because of my background in computer programming.

Q. You like working with computers?

A. Yes, I do.

[26] Sec. 8(c) of the Act provides:

(c) The expressing of any views, argument, or opinion, or the dissemination thereof, whether in written, printed, graphic, or visual form, shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice under any of the provisions of this Act, if such expression contains no threat or reprisal or force or promise of benefit.

Rickard testified that he was informed a week or two prior to June 17 that he was going to Skokie and Tennessee by Dave Kluxdahl, the Respondent's general manager and director of operations.

This record reveals that in March, prior to any union activity, Rickard received an unfavorable performance evaluation as plant manager, and Dillon testified that he was then aware that Rickard's continued employment was in jeopardy and later learned that management intended to terminate him. Rickard testified that, in late June, he was informed by Respondent's president, Max Sanders, that he was going to be discharged for poor performance, and thereafter received 2 weeks' severance pay.

It is undisputed that Rickard was absent from the plant the last 2 weeks prior to the election, and that his discharge was announced to the employees after the election.[37] As aforestated, Respondent claims that this was merely the result of good-faith business decisions. However, it is the General Counsel's position that these acts were done to undermine the employees' support for the Union.

The General Counsel points out and argues that supposedly Rickard was sent to Tennessee to learn how to operate a computer despite the fact that the Company had the equipment for 10 months prior to this, and that he was sent to Skokie to assist in the conversion of a piece of machinery despite the fact that the manufacturing manager, Paul Moriarty, was in charge of this machine. Moreover, maintains the General Counsel, these trips were ordered on 2 weeks' notice irrespective of the fact that Respondent was seriously considering Rickard's discharge, and that the man who replaced Rickard was totally without credentials, and that these facts, together with what Respondent had to view as Rickard's responsibility for the union campaign, lead to the inevitable conclusion that his removal from the plant was a deliberate attempt to undermine support for the Union.

Turning to Rickard's discharge—the General Counsel contends that a review of his final evaluation (R. Exh. 30) shows that Rickard was a "union organizing drive waiting to happen," and in particular it should be noted on his evaluation that he was rated as aggressive, not aware of the feelings of others, and someone who disregards personnel policies to accomplish short-term goals. It is also pointed out Rickard's testimony to the effect that he was not told about his discharge when he received his evaluation in March although Dillon described Rickard's position as then being in jeopardy, but it is clear that Respondent did not intend to discharge him at that time, and, argues the General Counsel, Respondent did not adduce a single event that occurred between March and July to support its discharge of Rickard. Therefore, in light of this, and the events discussed below, there can be no other conclusion but that Rickard was discharged in order to remove a prime incentive for the employees supporting the Union. Moreover, in late June, Respondent began an intense effort by means of unlawful solicitation of grievances to determine what was necessary for it to prevail against the Union, and it had already recognized Rickard as a major reason behind the employees' desire to have a union and had temporarily removed him from the facility, and now, through Berg and Dillon's unlawful solicitation, it discovered that the depth of feelings against Rickard ran even deeper. Further, on June 22, Berg solicited Gauthier whether Rickard's discharge would induce the employees not to support the Union, and on the following day Dillon solicited from Gauthier that one of the major reasons the employees wanted the Union was because they could not communicate with Rickard. Additionally, contends the General Counsel, during the same week Dillon also found out from Jeannine Gagne that Rickard's actions and attitudes were "why we needed something," and James Berg also solicited from Dot Bezio that her major complaint was that Plant Manager Rickard was unfair.

In concluding his argument, counsel for the General Counsel maintains that by this time Respondent had now ascertained from three members of the union organizing committee that Rickard was the major source of employee dissatisfaction, and his demise shortly followed. Moreover, the fact that the benefit (Rickard's discharge) was not conveyed until after the election, does not minimize its unlawful effect.

In making my conclusions regarding these allegations, it is first pointed out that in my evaluations there is insufficient evidence in this record to show that Rickard's absence from the plant was related to the organizing campaign and the election. As indicated previously, Rickard left the Hudson plant approximately 2 weeks before the election, and spent this time consulting with company engineers at the headquarters in Skokie and attending a computer training course in Tennessee. It appears that both trips had been planned in advance but were delayed somewhat because of difficulty in finding a computer training facility that used the Company's new computer system. It was also established that while in Skokie, Rickard assisted company engineers in converting the Hudson plant's "44 Process" coating machine.

The General Counsel states that this allegation is supported by the testimony of Kathy Gauthier regarding her conversation of June 22, with Respondent's materials manager, James Berg. However, as previously indicated, Berg credibly testified that he is not Rickard's supervisor, had no involvement in his absence form the plant, and specifically denied any talk with any employee about the possible discharge of Rickard. In this regard, Berg testified as follows:

> Q. Did anytime during that conversation, did you ask her if it would help if Rickard was fired?
> A. No, never, sir.
> Q. Did you ever talk with any employee about firing Rickard?
> A. No, Sir.
> Q. Would it be your position to obtain Mr. Rickard's termination?
> A. No.
> Q. Organizationally, were you two more or less on the same level?
> A. We're all managers.
> Q. Did he report to you or you report to him?

[37] See R. Exh. 5.

A. He did not report to me. He reported to Bill Schneider.

Q. And who do you report to?

A. I report to Dave Kluxdahl.

Q. So you're in different chains of command.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you mention anything about Mr. Rickard's continued employment during that conversation?

A. Never mentioned his name once.

In the final analysis, the theory advanced by the General Counsel is that Rickard was terminated so as to remove an unpopular condition of employment (Rickard), and which complaints about him had been voiced by the employees to management.[28]

In the first instance, the record in the instant case clearly shows that the Company had adequate business justifications to send Rickard to Skokie and Tennessee, and there is no testimony in this record otherwise. There is some confusion in this record concerning the exact date when the actual decision was made by President Max Sanders to discharge Rickard and, therefore, it is somewhat difficult for the General Counsel to successfully maintain that Rickard made the above trips when the Company was about to discharge him. The final evaluation sheet, also relied on by the General Counsel, merely shows that the Company had adequate reasons and justifications to fire Rickard whenever they decided to do so, but any other deductions or inferences therefrom must be deemed as pure speculation. There is also the argument that in June management made unlawful solicitations of grievances to find out what was necessary for the Company to prevail over the Union. However, in earlier sections of this decision, I have fully considered and detailed such allegations and have recommended dismissal of the same. Finally, the argument is made that management had now ascertained from three members of the organizing committee (Gauthier, Bezio, and Gagne) that Rickard was the major source of employee dissatisfaction. In this regard Berg testified that Gauthier complained to him about minor mechanical problems and that she "wasn't getting service." Under the totality of circumstances in this case, this statement by Gauthier can hardly be deemed a serious complaint about the plant manager. Dot Bezio testified that prior to the election she told Berg that Rickard "was unfair" because she had "bid off a job" but nevertheless Rickard had told her to take it. However, Berg only recalls several minor complaints mentioned by Bezio, as previously detailed herein, but there were no specific complaints about the plant manager. The General Counsel apparently maintains that the complaint Jeannine Gagne had as to Richard was registered in a conversation she had with Dillon:

Q. You remember the election day on July 1st.

A. Yes.

Q. Prior to that election did you ever have any conversation with Mr. Dillon about the union?

A. Yes.

Q. When did that conversation take place?

A. The 25th of June. Around there.

Q. Where did it take place?

A. At my work area.

Q. Was anyone else present?

A. Not at my table, but surrounding me. Yes.

Q. Could you tell me what was said in that conversation? Tell me what Mr. Dillon said to you and what you said to Mr. Dillon.

A. Well, he was going by and I glanced at him, and I said: "I suppose you're not coming to see me," and he said: "Good morning." I said: "It's too bad about the mess we're in. It didn't have to happen. That's why we need something." For instance, Mr. Rickard, our plant manager, I asked him about my machines. They were down, and they had been down seven weeks. I had loads of work, a lot of red tags, and some of the other supervisors were coming to look for their work and I couldn't do a thing.

Again, it appears to me that while Rickard may have been unable on certain occasions to meet all the demands and needs of his employees, nevertheless, there is no substantial showing that his presence and performance as plant manager was in any way injurious to the extent or

> . . . a supervisor's discharge is found to be unlawful if it is motivated by a desire to thwart organizational activity among employees. However,the justification for finding a violation and reinstating a supervisor who would otherwise be excluded from coverage under the Act is grounded upon the view that the discharge itself severely impinged on the employees' Section 7 rights. As noted above, the Board has found that, when a supervisor is discharged for testifying at a Board hearing or a contractual grievance proceeding, for refusing to commit unfair labor practices, or for failing to prevent unionization, the impact of the discharge itself on employees' Section 7 rights, coupled with the need to ensure that even statutorily excluded individuals may not be coerced into violating the law or discouraged from participating in Board processes or grievance procedures, compels that they be protected despite the general statutory exclusion. In contrast, although we recognize that the discharge of a supervisor for engaging in union or concerted activity almost invariably has a secondary or incidental effect on employees, we believe that, when a supervisor is discharged either because he or she engaged in union or concerted activity or because the discharge is contemporaneous with the unlawful discharge of statutory employees, or both, this incidental or secondary effect on the employees is insufficient to warrant an exception to the general statutory provision excluding supervisors from the protection of the Act. Thus, it is irrelevant that an employer may have hoped or even expected, that its decision to terminate a supervisor for his union or concerted activity would cause employees to reconsider, and perhaps abandon, their own concerted or union activity. No matter what the employer's subjective hope or expectation, that circumstance cannot change the character of its otherwise lawful conduct.
> In the final analysis, the instant case, and indeed all supervisory discharge cases, may be resolved by this analysis: The discharge of supervisors is unlawful when it interferes with the right of employees to exercise their rights under Sec. 7 of the Act, as when they give testimony adverse to their employers' interest or when they refuse to commit unfair labor practices. The discharge of supervisors as a result of their participation in union or concerted activity—either by themselves or when allied with rank-and-file employees—is not unlawful for the simple reason that employees, but not supervisors, have rights protected by the Act.

When this test is applied in the instant case, I am unable to conclude that the discharge of Plant Manager Rickard interfered with the right of employees to exercise their Section 7 rights or that his reinstatement is necessary to convey to employees the extent to which the Act protects these rights.

scope as contemplated and suggested by the General Counsel. Moreover, it is again noted that the Board has generally refused to hold an employer responsible for the antiunion conduct of such a supervisor absent evidence that the employer encouraged, authorized, or ratified the supervisor's activities or acted in such a manner as to lead the employees to reasonably believe that the supervisor was acting on behalf of management. Bennington Iron Works, 267 NLRB 1285 (1983). By this record, I am not persuaded that Respondent encouraged, authorized, or ratified Rickard's activities or led the employees to believe he was acting on behalf of management even if there was a link to union activity.

The General Counsel has introduced no evidence in support of these allegations that were not fully rebutted by Respondent. In fact, Doris Massey, head of the organizing committee, agreed that Rickard was "all right." Rickard was absent from the plant on legitimate business trips (there are only inferences to the contrary), and was terminated on or about July 5 because of concerns about his job performance dating back to his last formal evaluation in February, and the employees were not even aware of his discharge until after the election, and under such circumstances, it is highly unlikely that employees were thereby induced not to select the Union. In accordance with the above, I also dismiss these allegations.

It is alleged that on or about May 12, 1983, Respondent, by Rickard, implied to an employee that the Union had killed a raise, and told the employee that if the Union gets in all benefits are up for grabs, and that on or about May 13, 1983, Rickard told employees that if the Union got in all benefits were up for grabs.

The General Counsel introduced testimony through Dot Bezio to the effect that on May 12, she showed Rickard a small sheet of paper that was being distributed by antiunion employees, and which stated, inter alia, that the Union had killed the annual pay increase,[29] and asked him if something had happened that she was not aware of. According to Bezio, Rickard then replied by telling her that "everything is up for grabs" and that everything has to be "renegotiated." The next day Bezio had a another conversation with Rickard in which she attributed the same statements to him. Massey was present for this conversation and also testified to Rickard's statement—she stated that Rickard told them that all benefits "were up for grabs," and if the Union got in "everything we did would have to be renegotiated," that employees would not get any more benefits than what they did have, and that the Company would have the last say.

Rickard testified that in the conversation here in question, the subject matter of the Union was brought up and what would happen if the Union got in, and his response was "that all the benefits would have to be negotiated." Rickard then testified that this question was asked quite often during the campaign and he probably could have said either negotiate or renegotiate. Rickard denied saying anything about the Union killing the wage increase, nor did he say employees would lose their vacations or benefits, or that they would have to renegotiate to get what they had already.

The General Counsel argues to the extent the testimony between the parties differ, Bezio's and Massey's testimony should be credited as Rickard's testimony was evasive throughout his cross-examination, and that this is particularly shown by his testimony regarding Respondent's policy on absences. The General Counsel also notes that as both Bezio and Massey are still employed by the Respondent they would have much to lose by testifying falsely.[30]

In closely examining the testimony pertaining to this allegation, it appears to me that on cross-examination Bezio was less certain of the substance of the conversation here in question. In contrast to her earlier testimony, Bezio stated that she did not remember Rickard saying anything about whether employees would get a pay raise in 1983, but could only recall the phrase "up for grabs" and that employee benefits would have to be "renegotiated" if the Union won the election. As indicated, Rickard confirmed that he was never asked to read or comment on the leaflet here in question. He credibly stated that Bezio initiated the conversations to "talk about the fact that nonunion people were distributing the leaflet on Company time," and not to discuss the contents of the leaflet. Moreover, that he did not even see the leaflet mentioned by Bezio, that he was not asked to read it, nor did he affirm or disclaim any of the contents.

Rickard also credibly denied ever using the phrase "up for grabs" in regard to employee benefits, but does recall telling Bezio that solicitation by both pro and antiunion groups was limited to periods before and after work, during breaks, and lunch, and it appears that both groups were subsequently monitored to assure that the distribution of literature was confined to the lunchroom and hallways, as previously indicated.

On May 13, union organizing committee members Bezio and Massey initiated a second conversation with Rickard to again discuss solicitation matters, and in which both claimed that Rickard repeated that if the Union got in, "everything we did have would have to be renegotiated" and all the benefits "were up for grabs," but Rickard's recollection of this conversation differs significantly from that of Bezio and Massey. Rickard stated that after discussing solicitation and other issues:

> Well, to the best of my recollection, I believe we got to the point of saying, well, what would happen if the union got in. And my response to that was that all the benefits would have to be negotiated.
> Q. Can you remember, there was a lot of discussion yesterday about negotiate or renegotiate, can you remember if you said negotiate or renegotiate?
> A. Probably, it came up in several conversations, I probably could have said both.

[29] G.C. Exh. 47.

[30] The General Counsel stipulated that the antiunion group of employees were not agents of the Company. No charges have been pressed against the Company regarding the content of any campaign materials, and Rickard is no longer employed, having been terminated in earlier July 1983, as stated above, so any possible repercussions against Massey and Bezio because of their testimony has been considerably reduced or eliminated altogether.

I am in agreement that whether Rickard said "negotiate" or "renegotiate" in either conversation is quite unimportant and immaterial within the context of this organizing campaign. The record and exhibits in this case show that employees initiated countless number of conversations and other communications about the Union prior to the election. Rickard testified:

> It was very hectic, in fact, from a productivity standpoint, it was atrocious. It seemed like nothing was getting accomplished other than union and nonunion activity. It was very hard to stay productive during that period.

The admitted remark by Rickard that if the Union got in all benefits would have to be negotiated or renegotiated appears to be quite innocuous considering the extensive and overall activities during the campaign. Moreover, there were only two employees involved in this instance, both of whom were leaders of the union organizing committee who presumably, and by reasonable inference, were strong supporters of the Union and not easily persuaded otherwise, and there is no evidence on the record that they repeated Rickard's comments to any other employees. Further, it is clear from the testimony that neither Massey, Bezio nor Rickard understood any real distinction between negotiate and renegotiate in the collective-bargaining context. When asked to articulate the distinction between the two, Massey stated:

> When you negotiate for something you originally ask for it. All right? I think. When you negotiate you talk about it. Okay? And it's either given to you or not. When you renegotiate for something you bring it back in and rediscuss it.

Rickard offered a similar definition:

> Q. What does the word negotiate mean to you?
> A. Negotiate to me would mean to sit down and collectively agree on something.
> Q. What does the word "renegotiate" mean?
> A. Just about the same thing except that you're reagreeing on something that was already agreed on.

Based on the above-credited testimony of Rickard, it is clear that he did nothing more than convey to Bezio and Masey the basic requirements of Sections 8(d) and 8(a)(5) of the Act. In the final analysis, there is no evidence that the admitted comments by Rickard were improper or had any coercive effect under the prevailing circumstances here.[31] It is also recommended that the allegations be dismissed.

It should be specifically pointed out and noted that all facts found are based on the record as a whole and on my observation of the witnesses. The credibility resolutions have been derived from a review of the entire testimonial record and exhibits with due regard for the logic and probability, the demeanor of the witneses, the weight of the evidence, admitted facts, reasonable inferences, and the teaching of NLRB v. Walton Mfg Co., 369 U.S. 404 (1962). As to those testifying in contradiction of the findings their testimony has been discredited, either as having been in conflict with the testimony of reliable witnesses or because it was in and of itself incredible and unworthy of belief. All testimony has been reviewed and weighed in the light of the entire record. As I have indicated Respondent's supervisors, managers, and other witnesses impressed me as candid, frank, straightforward, and believable witnesses who recalled with considerable clarity, consistency, and specificity what they said and heard during the discussions and events here in question, and in my evaluations made no attempt to fabricate their descriptions of what occurred as indicated in several instances by their open and frank admissions.

On the other hand, I have found several of the witnesses for the General Counsel to be hesitant, evasive, and unconvincing witnesses, and in answers given on cross-examination this becomes quite obvious, as I have already indicated in various instances. Therefore, on the basis of the above, on my observations of the demenaor of the witnesses, the inherent probability of the testimony and events in all the relevant circumstances, and on the basis of the record as a whole, I have credited the testimony of the witnesses for the Company where it is in conflict with that of the witnesses for the General Counsel.

In view of my findings that there was no violative conduct by Respondent within the allegations of the complaints, I will not consider the 8(a)(5) majority card issue as there is no basis whatsoever for setting aside the election and/or for a Gissel bargaining Order, as requested by the General Counsel in his proposed remedy.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. The General Counsel has failed to sustain its burden of proof for any allegation in the complaints.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[32]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

[31] There is no allegation or testimony that Rickard told Bezio and Massey that negotiations would "start from scratch," and the General Counsel was unsuccessful in his attempt to attribute such remark to Rickard, and it is quite obvious that Bezio and Massey drew no such inference.

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

The National Labor Relations Board has considered objections to an election held July 23, 1987, and the hearing officer's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Decision and Direction of Election. The tally of ballots shows 33 for and 46 against the Petitioner, with 4 challenged ballots, an insufficient number to affect the results.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and brief, has adopted the hearing officer's findings and recommendations only to the extent consistent herewith,[1] and finds that a certification of results of election should be issued.

The hearing officer recommended that the Petitioner's first objection be sustained and the election set aside because the Employer circulated an altered ballot that tended to mislead employees into believing that the Board wanted them to vote "No" in the election. We disagree.

In support of its objections, the Petitioner presented a two-page document that the Employer admittedly distributed to the great majority—perhaps all—of the employees within 2 days before the election.[2] The first page of the document is a memorandum on the Employer's stationery and signed by Jerry Moss, administrator of the Employer's facility. The memorandum, in question and answer format, explains certain mechanics of the election, and concludes by stating "I urge you to exercise your right to vote and to protect your own best interest and What [sic] you now have by Voting No!! on Thursday." The second page, stapled to the memorandum, appears to be a photocopy of the Board's sample ballot for the election. There is an "X" in the "No" box on the ballot.

The hearing officer credited the testimony of James Turnipseed, vice president of Northport Health Services, the firm that has the management contract on the Employer's facility, that copies of the two-page document were distributed to employees at group meetings held 2 days before the election, and that he explained to those in attendance that he had marked the sample ballot "No," and that he encouraged them to do the same. Jerry Moss testified that, at group meetings that he held with employees on the night shift, he also explained that "we" had marked the sample ballot "no," in the hope that the employees would support the Employer in the election. Four employees who attended such meetings testified that the Employer's representatives explained the source of the marked ballots. Because not all employees attended the group meetings, management personnel attempted to contact individually the employees who had not attended the meetings, and to explain to them the information contained in the Employer's memorandum as well as the source of the marked sampled ballots. However, the hearing officer credited the testimony of two employees, Pauline Rice and Solonia Jordan, that they had received copies of the two-page document without any explanation that management personnel had marked the sample ballot "No."

Moreover, employees Rice and Renner Hill testified that they had seen copies of the marked sample ballot, not attached to the covering memorandum, lying on the table in one of the employees' breakrooms shortly before the election. The record does not establish who placed the unattached ballots on the breakroom table.[3] Rice also testified that she saw a stack of the marked ballots, not attached to the memorandum, lying on Administrator Moss' desk in his office the day before the election.

In SDC Investment, 274 NLRB 556 (1985), the Board adopted a two-part analysis to determine if an altered ballot is objectionable. First, the Board will examine the ballot in order to determine if the source of the altered document is clearly identified on its face. If the source can be clearly identified on examination of the document itself, then the Board will find that the document is not misleading, because employees will understand that it emanated from a party rather than from the Board. If, however, the source cannot be clearly identified,

[1] In the absence of exceptions, we adopt pro forma the hearing officer's recommendation that the Petitioner's objection relating to the Employer's alleged solicitation of employees to demand the return of their union authorization cards be overruled.

The Employer has excepted to some of the hearing officer's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule a hearing officer's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Stretch-Tex Co., 118 NLRB 1359, 1361 (1957). We find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The record does not establish conclusively whether every employee received a copy of the document.

[3] There is some indication that the marked sample ballots had been detached from the covering memorandum by persons unknown. Thus, Hill testified that "most of them was attached, you know, both of these sheets. And some of them were tore [sic] apart." Rice testified "that there might have been two of these [apparently referring to the memoranda] on the table over against the wall, but these [apparently referring to the marked sample ballots] were lying on the table by theirselves [sic]."

In any event, both Turnipseed and Jerry Moss testified that they had not left "stacks" of campaign literature lying around for employees to pick up.

the Board will examine the nature and contents of the material in order to determine whether the document has a tendency to mislead employees into believing that the Board favors one party over the other. Id. at 557.

The hearing officer applied the test set forth in SDC, and found that neither the altered ballot nor the attached memorandum identifies which party marked the ballot. He also found that the Employer's supervisors had not explained to every employee that the sample ballot had been marked by the Employer, and that some of the unattached ballots were seen in the breakroom. Applying the second part of the SDC analysis, he found that the "X" in the "No" box on the sample ballot was clearly not discernible as an addition made by the Employer, and was not sufficiently distinct from the ballot to preclude the suggestion that the Board was endorsing a "No" vote. Even if all employees who had seen the marked ballot had seen it with the covering memorandum attached, the hearing officer went on, he would still have found it objectionable because, in his view, the ballot appeared to be a specific endorsement by the Board of the Employer's point of view, expressed in the memorandum, that the employees should vote "No." Accordingly, the hearing officer concluded that the employees who were exposed to the altered ballot may have perceived that the Board wanted them to vote "No," and recommended that the Petitioner's objection be sustained.

We agree with the hearing officer that the altered ballot does not identify the Employer as its source, but we reject his conclusion that exposure to the ballot would suggest to the employees that the Board favored a "No" vote in the election. Although the "X" in the "No" box on the ballot suggests that employees should vote against the Petitioner, we find that the context in which the ballot was distributed negates any inference that it set forth the views of the Board.[4] The ballot, as distributed by the Employer to employees, was stapled to a memorandum on the Employer's letterhead. The memorandum was signed by the administrator of the facility, and urged the employees to vote "No." Because the memorandum thus unmistakably emanated from the Employer, we conclude that the altered ballot stapled to the memorandum would have appeared to employees to be part of the Employer's partisan election campaign material and not an official communication from the Board.[5]

The fact that two employees testified that they saw copies of the marked sample ballot lying unattached on the table in the employees' breakroom does not render the Employer's conduct objectionable. There is no evidence that any employee who saw the unattached ballots did not also receive, or at least see, a copy of the ballot stapled to the Employer's memorandum. Indeed, most employees received, along with the two-page document, an explanation from the Employer's supervisors that it was the Employer who had altered the ballot. Moreover, as we have noted, the record does not reflect who was responsible for placing the unattached ballots in the breakroom. Employee Hill's testimony that the document had been "tore [sic] apart" indicates that the ballots originally may have been brought to the breakroom stapled to the memorandum (i.e., in the condition in which the Employer distributed them), and later may have become separated. The record, in short, does not indicate that the Employer ever distributed or made available to employees any copy of the altered sample ballot that was not stapled to the Employer's partisan memorandum. Because we find that the Employer's distribution of the two-page document was not objectionable, we find no sufficient basis for setting aside the election solely on the evidence that some unknown person or persons (quite possibly the employees themselves) later may have detached the marked ballot from the memorandum.[6]

Accordingly, we shall overrule the Petitioner's objection and certify the results of the election.

Krehbiel Co.*, 279 NLRB 855 (1986), indicating the appropriateness of considering extrinsic evidence in examining the nature and contents of a document to determine if it is misleading.

[5] In this respect this case is strikingly similar to the Board's recent decision in BIW Employees Federal Credit Union, supra, in which the employer distributed a two-page document to all employees the day before the election. The first page of the document was a memorandum on the employer's stationery, from its manager, urging employees to vote "No" and referring to an attached sample ballot as demonstrating a "No" vote. The second page, stapled to the first, appeared to be a copy of an official Board sample ballot with additions giving the time and place of the balloting and the counting of ballots. An "X" appeared in the "No" box; a handdrawn arrow directed attention to the "No" box, and a statement appeared explaining that a mark in the "No" box meant that employees did not desire union representation. The phrase "Distributed for Information" was adjacent to the explanatory statement. The Board overruled the petitioner's objection, holding that, in context, the altered sample ballot would not give employees the misleading impression that the Board favored a vote against the union.

[6] Nor do we find significant Rice's testimony that she saw a stack of marked ballots, not attached to the memorandum, on the desk in Administrator Moss' office. The record indicates that Moss' office was not readily accessible to employees, and there is no indication that the Employer left the unattached ballots in that office intending that employees should observe them in that condition.

CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have not been cast for United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC and that it is not the exclusive representative of these bargaining unit employees.

MEMBER JOHANSON, dissenting.

I agree with the hearing officer that the election should be set aside. The sample ballot neither indicates on its face, nor is it obvious, that it was altered, what the alterations were, and who made them. This could mislead the employees into believing that the ballot was prepared by the Board. See my dissent in Professional Care Centers, 279 NLRB 814 (1986).

August 31, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On March 2, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Boyce issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Wykle Research, Inc., Carson City, Nevada, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The Respondent has also excepted to the judge's decision asserting that it evidences bias and prejudice. On our full consideration of the entire record in these proceedings, we find no evidence that the judge prejudged the case, made prejudicial rulings, or demonstrated bias against the Respondent in his analysis and discussion of the evidence.

[2] Although the judge did not discuss the testimony of several of the Respondent's witnesses, who characterized discriminatee Tammy Holt as a disruptive and uncooperative employee, we have considered such evidence and each the same result as did the judge. We conclude that the General Counsel has made out a prima facie case of unlawful discharge by showing that the Respondent had knowledge of Holt's union activity and, having gained such knowledge, called her into the office of General Manager Tolson who immediately unlawfully interrogated her about her union activities and threatened her with discharge if she did not end such activities. Before the meeting ended, Holt was discharged. The judge discredited the testimony of Tolson and Marketing Director Echols, who also was present, about the reasons for her discharge. We, therefore, like the judge, find that the Respondent has failed to meet its burden of showing that it would have discharged Holt even in the absence of any union activity. See Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). We find it unnecessary to rely on the judge's speculation in fn. 32 of the decision in reaching this result.

Ariel L. Sotolongo, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Thomas J. Ray, Esq. (Allison, MacKenzie, Hartman, Soumbeniotis & Russell, Ltd.), of Carson City, Nevada, for the Respondent.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD J. BOYCE, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was tried in Carson City, Nevada, on 4 and 5 November 1987.[1] The complaint, based on a charge filed by United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local 711, affiliated with United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC (Union) alleges that Wykle Research, Inc. (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act) on 8 May 1987 by "discharg[ing] its employee Tammy Holt . . . because [she] joined or assisted the Union or engaged in other protected concerted activities."[2]

The complaint alleges that Respondent, by its general manager, Carl Tolson, further violated Section 8(a)(1) on 8 May by "interrogat[ing] an employee about his/her union membership, activities, and desires and [those] of other employees," and by "threaten[ing] an employee with discharge if he/she joined or assisted the union or engaged in other protected concerted activities."

II. JURISDICTION AND LABOR ORGANIZATION

Respondent, a Nevada corporation located in Carson City, sells certain dental products nationwide on a nonretail basis. The pleadings establish that its annual sales to customers outside Nevada exceed $50,000, and that it thus is an employer engaged in and affecting commerce within Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The pleadings establish, as well, that the Union is a labor organization within Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED MISCONDUCT

A. Evidence

About 90 percent of Respondent's sales are by telephone from Carson City. The telephone salespeople are called telemarketing service representatives—telemarketers for short. Most of the remaining sales are realized at dental meetings around the country. Telemarketers sometimes represent Respondent at those meetings.

Tammy Holt was a telemarketer. She began on 5 January 1987 and, as the complaint alleges, was fired on 8 May. She was one of about six telemarketers when discharged.

The telemarketers did not have union representation at relevant times. Holt began promoting representation to her coworkers on 6 May, distributing a prounion flier to two of them, discussing the flier with another by telephone, and inviting several to her home for a postwork organizational meeting on May 7. The flier, prepared by

[1] This manner of setting forth dates comports with the wishes of the Board.

[2] Sec. 8(a)(3) forbids an employer from "discriminat[ing] in regard to hire or tenure of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization." Sec. 8(a)(1) prohibits an employer from "interfer[ing] with, restrain[ing], or coerc[ing] employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7" of the Act. Sec. 7 guarantees employees "the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations . . . and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection."

Holt's husband after conferring with the Union's business agent, Bob Whitney, stated variously that the Union "is willing to represent telemarketers and other clerical positions"; that representation "would of course mean better benefits, wages, and working conditions for all"; and that "a majority of employees [would have] to attend a meeting to discuss this" with Whitney "to get the show on the road."

The next day, 7 May, Holt continued to pass word of that evening's meeting. The meeting materialized as planned, but only three employees—Holt and two others—attended. Whitney presided, and supplied Holt with union authorization cards. Among those invited but not present was Thelma Banker, whose duties included serving as secretary for Respondent's general manager, Carl Tolson.

At work the first thing the following morning, 8 May, Holt and Banker had a conversation in which the issue of Banker's signing a union card came up.[3] Holt was on her way to the restroom at the time. She and Banker commonly conversed on such occasions, Banker's desk being "directly across from" the restroom. Soon after, at her telephone cubicle, Holt complied with a coworker's request for a card.

Assertedly feeling duty-bound to do so, Banker presently told Tolson about her encounter with Holt. This, according to Tolson, was his first knowledge of Holt's union activities.[4] About the same time, apparently, two of Holt's coworkers informed Respondent's marketing director, Darrell Echols, of the previous evening's meeting—his first awareness, so he testified, of Holt's activities.

Prompted by Banker's disclosure, Tolson forthwith summoned Holt, Echols, and Banker to his office to "get the matter straightened out." Banker's purpose in being there, Tolson testified, "was to corroborate the statement . . . regarding Tammy's bothering her, and also to take minutes of the meeting." Tolson and Echols both testified that they had not previously discussed the situation with each other.

Holt testified that Tolson began the meeting by saying he understood that she had "had a union meeting last night" and that she "had been soliciting union cards." She ignored the reference to the meeting, as she recalled, but admitted complying with a coworker's request for a card. Tolson came back, per Holt, that she "should quit" if she was "that unhappy with the company." Tolson further stated, according to Holt, that "unions in Nevada are illegal," and that she would "be fired" if she "did not cease and desist [from] union activities" and "sign a paper" so pledging. Holt assertedly responded that she would not "sign anything" until conferring "with somebody else," and the focus shifted to other matters.[5]

Tolson testified that he opened the meeting by saying he had heard that Holt was "soliciting" for the Union. He also testified, twice, that he questioned Holt whether she had asked Banker "to sign a union card." He later denied putting that question to her, averring that he instead remarked, "I understand—Thelma tells me that you—you've been bothering her regarding a union card."

Tolson's account continued that he told Holt, following these "introductory or preparatory" comments, that any soliciting was to be "on her own time, during breaks, lunch hour, or off the premises"; that he did not "care what she did during those periods," but that she was "not to do it on company time." Holt responded, according to Tolson, that she would do "whatever she wished . . . anytime she wanted," prompting him to state that her "job function was to be on the phone and stay on the phone," and that she "could do whatever she wished . . . during the break times . . . or after hours or before hours . . . providing it wasn't disruptive to other employees."

Tolson admittedly told Holt "at least once" in the context of her union activities "that, if she was unhappy with the company, she should quit." She replied, so he testified, either that she would "when she [got] another job," or that she would "get another job when she [felt] like it." Tolson denied referring to the meeting at Holt's house, contending that he "did not even know there was a meeting."

Tolson also denied giving Holt a cease-and-desist ultimatum. According to an affidivit he gave during the precomplaint investigation of this matter, however, he "advised" Holt that she was "disrupting the flow of work of the company," that he "had been informed that her constant complaining and attitude was disruptive to her fellow employees," and that he "would be forced to terminate her . . . if she didn't stop disrupting the work flow."[6] Tolson, in his live testimony, did not address the remark Holt attributed to him that unions are illegal in Nevada. He stated in his affidavit: "I did inform her Nevada was a right-to-work State. I did not tell her unions were illegal."[7]

[3] The details of this conversation are in conflict. Banker testified that Holt started it by asking her to sign a card; that she replied in the negative, "[A]bsolutely not. I spoke with my husband last night. He feels I'm not even eligible to be covered by this. I'm not interested. You're interrupting my work. Get away from me"; and that Holt promptly withdrew. Holt testified, on the other hand, that Banker began the exchange, asking "how the meeting had gone" and if Holt had asked Whitney about Banker's eligibility for union representation; and that she said Whitney did not know, but that Banker could sign a card if she wished and they "could go from there."

[4] Banker reported, by Tolson's initial version, that Holt had asked her to sign a card, persisting even after Banker had said to "stop bothering" her; and that Holt also had been "bothering everybody else." Tolson later testified that Banker did not say others had been "pestered," only that she had been "pestered" and that "some of the employees . . . are unhappy."

[5] In evidence without objection is a fragmentary note in Holt's handwriting purporting to summarize Tolson's cease-and-desist ultimatum. Holt testified that she scribbled it "at the same time he was saying it," and that its essence is that Tolson ordered her "to cease and desist with union activities and, if [she] didn't then [she] will be dismissed."

[6] In addition to its cease-and-desist reference, Holt's aforementioned note (fn. 5) states, "Do out side." Holt denied that this supports Tolson's version that he merely told her to solicit "off the premises." She testified that it instead reflects her telling Tolson that she had approached employees only outside.

[7] Asked if Tolson said that "unions in Nevada are illegal . . . or that Nevada is a right-to-work state," Holt repeated that "he said unions in Nevada are illegal." She added, in answer to a followup question, that she "understand[s] what the difference is."

Echols testified that the portion of the meeting devoted to Holt's union activities was "very brief," and that, while he could not remember "exactly what we started off with," it "may have" come at the meeting's outset. He recounted Tolson's saying he had "had some complaints that people had been solicited at work," specifically mentioning that Banker had been "approached about signing some type of union card"; and that Tolson proclaimed:

> I'm not going to have it . . . on my time, on my payroll time. If you want to do it out in the parking lot on your time, be my guest. But you're not to do it on my time.

Echols also testified that Tolson said, with reference to Holt's union activities, "If you're that unhappy, why don't you just leave?" Echols mirrored Tolson's denial of a cease-and-desist ultimatum, further denying that Tolson otherwise threatened Holt with discharge.

Banker testified that Tolson forbade "solicitation of anything on company time or company premises," and that this "opening sentence was the only time it [Holt's union activity] was even brought up." Banker continued that she did not "believe [Holt] responded to that," and the subject was dropped. Banker stated that she could not recall Tolson's uttering a cease-and-desist ultimatum.

Neither Echols nor Banker was examined whether Tolson said unions are illegal in Nevada.

The discussion eventually turned to Holt's pay and job performance, evolving as Echols recalled into "a shouting match."[8] Holt complained that her performance and personal circumstances demanded better pay, and that Tolson had acted illegally by overriding a presumed earlier commitment from Echols and Sharon Williams, her immediate supervisor, to raise her monthly base salary from $500 to $700.[9] Tolson came back that he had not approved the raise, that her performance "didn't warrant" a raise, and that she should "sell more" if she "want[ed] more money." Tolson about then echoed his earlier remark, "if you're unhappy with the company, why don't you quit?"

Echols assumed a more active role as the exchange progressed. Alluding to Holt's "screaming and yelling"—his depiction, disputed by her—he commented: "Tammy, I don't consider this professional behavior. . . . [D]o you consider yourself a professional?" She answered, by her account, "[C]ontacting the Union was the most professional thing I could ever have done."

At length, Holt testified, she "told them that [she] was not unhappy with the company" but only with Tolson, and that, "if he would have left the telemarketing group alone, the motivation would be up and [they] would be selling much better." At that point, Holt continued, Echols > stood up and turned around and looked at [her] and said: "I cannot tolerate that attitude towards the general manager. You're fired!"

Echols recalled Holt's and his concluding remarks somewhat differently. He testified that, after saying she "liked" the company and "liked" him and Williams, Holt said she had "a problem with" Tolson, expanding, "I think he's an ass and he makes me sick." With that, Echols went on, he announced: "Tammy, that's it. You're fired!" Similarly, Tolson testified that, first having said she would "work for Williams and . . . Echols, but [not] for him," Holt called him "an ass." Echols thereupon "jumped up," according to Tolson, and declared: "That's disruptive and it's misconduct and . . . I won't tolerate that attitude towards the general manager, and so you're terminated—you're fired!"

Asked later if Holt called him an ass, Tolson evinced less conviction, testifying, "I believe so." Holt denied using that term or any other that might be considered profane.

Banker recounted Holt's saying, "just before she was terminated," that > she could do her job if the general manager left her alone, but that she did not like him and she couldn't do a job if he continued to be part of their department or come into their department.

Echol's response, as related by Banker, was: "[B]ecause of your attitude and your failure to work on improving your attitude, you're hereby discharged." Banker averred that "there may have been some names called," but she could not be sure without checking her shorthand notes, which were not produced.[10]

By all live accounts, Tolson said nothing following Echols' pronouncement. As Echols put it, Tolson "kind of looked bewildered . . . [and] . . . just left the room." In his affidavit, however, Tolson stated:

> I told her her termination wasn't based on any outside activities, it was based on misconduct, her being disruptive to her coworkers and for entering unauthorized areas. I had received a report from Sharon Williams that around 5/5 Williams had caught Holt in Williams' office going through files, I don't know what files.

The meeting lasted about an hour. In its immediate aftermath, Echols prepared and Banker typed a so-called statement of understanding, extracted from Banker's shorthand notes. It stated:

[8] Holt, asked if she raised her voice during the meeting, testified, "No, there was no need to." I find this improbable in the circumstances.

[9] On 9 April, Echols and Williams met with the telemarketers to discuss their pay, among other things. Holt and others had been complaining that they were underpaid, and Echols himself "felt the base salary was a little low." In Echols' words, they "put together a plan" to raise the base salary to $700 a month. Tolson withheld approval pending further research, however; and, when Holt learned this, she told Tolson that she wanted her raise "immediately." Tolson responded that he would "get approval" just for her, retroactive to 1 April, but that did not materialize.

[10] Banker later revealed that even her notes would not be conclusive, explaining, "[I]f there were some profanity . . . I may or may not have written it in my shorthand notes." The record does not disclose if the notes still exist. Banker testified that she gave them to Tolson after she was done with them.

> This is to document a meeting held in Carl Tolson's office at 10:00 a.m. on Friday, May 8, 1987. Attending were Carl, Darrell Echols, Tammy Holt and notes were taken by Thelma Banker.
> Carl told Tammy that if she was unhappy with Wykle Research, she should find another job.
> Tammy stated that she had made contact to have a union card signed only after an employee had asked her for the card. Carl then specifically cited Thelma as having been contacted on company time.
> Tammy's base salary and commission structure were outlined by both Carl and Darrell. Tammy feels she has been mistreated, and has not received all compensation agreed to when she was brought on board. Carl stressed that she is presently ahead of her schedule on her income earning, as suggested upon her initial employment.
> Carl stated that Wykle Research is not responsible to fulfill all Tammy's family income needs.
> Tammy stated her unhappiness with Carl—not with Wykle Research. Darrell informed Tammy that he (Darrell) is her immediate Department Manager, and cannot tolerate that attitude. Therefore, Tammy is being released from employment effective 12 noon today, May 8, 1987.

On Echols' request, Holt waited until the document was prepared, the idea being that she joined him and Tolson in signing it. After reading it, however, she refused to sign. She testified:

> I refused to sign it for the fact that it did not have a couple of the main words. . . . I told [Echols] that at the meeting Mr. Tolson told me I had to cease and desist with union activities or I was fired, and it was not in this document.

Holt testified that, faced with her refusal, Echols telephoned Tolson, after which he told her that Tolson "did not say that"; that she had "misunderstood" him. Holt, insisting as she recalled that she had not misunderstood Tolson, persisted in her refusal to sign. Echols did not speak of this incident in his testimony.

"[T]hat day or the next day," Banker testified, she transcribed her shorthand notes more literally. She termed the resulting minutes a "verbatim transcription."[11] They make no reference to a cease-and-desist ultimatum, depicting Tolson's comments regarding Holt's union activities this way:

> Carl stated he had heard some "rumblings" about solicitation of union cards to be signed, disrupting the work of fellow employees, and these fellow employees were annoyed at the constant interruptions. He further stated that these interruptions must cease. Further disruptive activities of any sort will be cause for dismissal. Any solicitation must be on off hours, or on employee's personal time, and outside the building—not on company time. Carl further stated that the signed (by Tammy) company policy declares solicitation activities on company premises to be strictly prohibited. Carl told Tammy, "If you are dissatisfied with your job, you should look for another one."

Nor do Banker's minutes indicate that Holt called Tolson an "ass." They deal with the concluding portion of the meeting, when that supposedly occurred, as follows:

> Tammy said that, "I like the company—it's just you (Carl Tolson) that I don't like. If you (Carl Tolson) would just stay away from me, I could probably do a good job here." At the moment, Darrell intervened and said to her: "I am your immediate Department Manager, and I cannot tolerate that kind of disrespect for our company's General Manager. Therefore, you are dismissed because of your attitude at 12 noon today."

Banker's minutes elsewhere reveal that

> Tolson told Holt early in the meeting that she had "a choice as to whether [she was] going to be here or gone," and that he "want[ed] the choice made by the end of today";
> Echols told Holt she had "excellent closing rates" and "works very hard on the phone"; that her "biggest problem has been herself—the constant 'bitching' and complaining"; and that she should "get out of the department . . . if she was unhappy."
> Tolson said he was "not satisfied with Tammy's performance" at a recent dental meeting in Detroit, and that she "outlined reasons the show was not profitable (including [booth] location, etc.)."
> Echols "stated that Tammy could earn all she wanted, because of her talents"; and that Tolson said:
> You've been here for six months. The first few months, your sales were poor, but now you're starting to really roll. You get your money on performance—not on your wishes.
> Echols declared, just before the concluding exchange, "that if [Holt] is so extremely unhappy with the company, she should resign and find herself another job."

Lori Richards, a telemarketer at the time, testified that she had a conversation with Echols after Holt's discharge in which he said he took the action because Holt had "got[ten] a little mouthy . . . toward her boss." Echols enlarged, according to Richards, "All we wanted to talk to her [about was] that you can't solicit union at work." Echols said nothing about this conversation in his testimony.

Respondent would have it that it also discharged Holt on 10 April. That was a payday. When her check did not reflect an expected $200 increase in her monthly base salary,[12] Holt confronted Echols and Williams, and a [11] As earlier noted, Banker conceded the possible incompleteness of the underlying notes, at least as concerns profanity.

[12] Fn. 9, supra, provides context for this expectation.

several-hour encounter ensued. She protested not only the pay situation, but a proposed revision of the telemarketers' work schedules, projected to go into effect in June,[13] contending that it would create insuperable child-care problems. She beseeched at one point, "[W]hy don't you just fire me, so I can collect my unemployment."

Echols and Williams advanced several possible solutions—volunteering Williams' children as babysitters; offering Holt split shifts; permitting her to leave to deliver the children, then return to work, without being docked. Holt was not receptive, however, and Echols finally "excused" himself to confer with Tolson, who directed that he "let her go" if she was "that adamant" about the unworkability of the proposed changes. Echols thereupon gave Holt her final check, urging as he did so that she "try and work this out." He admitted: "I didn't want her to leave. I didn't want her to quit."

Holt called Echols later that day, reporting that she had discussed the matter with her husband and that they could "work out the hours." Echols responded, as he recalled:

> Fine, Tammy, under these conditions: . . . That you come back with a good attitude, get back on the phone and do your job, and I don't want to hear any more about it.

She responded with the sought-after assurances, and returned to work apparently without suffering any actual break in employment.

Echols testified that the discharge in question "was strictly [his] decision and [he] took full responsibility for it." Tolson likewise testified that "Echols discharged her," adding that he "had the authority to overrule" Echols, but instead tacitly "concurred." Both testified that they did not foresee, when the fateful meeting began, that it would end as it did. Echols asserted, however, that Tolson "had been on [his] case to get rid of her for quite awhile"; that he, too, was "fed up with" and "thinking of terminating her" by 5 May; and that he "intended to terminate her," but "not particularly on" the 8th. The reasons for Tolson's disenchantment, according to Echols, were that Holt's sales "weren't there, she wasn't performing what we needed to justify her"; and her "bitching and moaning was something we didn't want."

Echols first testified that he fired Holt > because I was tired of her performance. . . . I was tired of her constant outbursts, her disruptive behavior, that was affecting this department and . . . that I had spent too much time on . . . . I don't know of any company that you could go to . . . that an employee could do that and get away with it.

Echols later testified that Holt's last statement in the meeting upset him, and "that's why [he] fired her . . . spontaneous[ly]" and without premeditation, "right on the spot, right when the comment was made." Asked again why he took the action, Echols answered, "Because I didn't want this disruptive behavior and this person in my department anymore. She was not performing." He elsewhere testified variously that "the sole factor was her performance"; that her "sales performance . . . was part of it"; that the "primary reason" was her "disruptive behavior"; and that he "terminated her because of her disruptive behavior" in the 8 May meeting, as well.

Asked his meaning of "disruptive behavior," Echols testified:

> Her constant disruption to the other employees, which affected their performance; her constant disruptions about her salary, the policies, the procedures, everything about the company.

He later answered the same question this way:

> Her constant complaining and moaning, her disruptive behavior to the other employees, the fact that she wasn't doing her job, she spent more time complaining than being on the telephone, which is her job, to be on the telephone.

Echols denied—"absolutely not"—that Holt's union activities figured in his action.

Tolson's live testimony to the contrary, he stated in his affidavit:

> I decided to discharge Holt for (1) misconduct, her going into unauthorized files in Williams' office, (2) disruptiveness, constant complaining about the company, her husband, her home life, to her fellow workers, and (3) insubordination, her refusal not [sic] to stop bothering her fellow employees. [Emphasis added.][14]

His affidavit aside, Tolson testified, "There's a multiplicity of reasons why Ms. Holt was terminated." Purporting to relate them, he adverted to the 8 May meeting, testifying:

> She became quite vocal and used some language that was unconducive for a woman or a lady in my office . . . and used some very vile terms regarding myself and Darrell Echols.

Tolson concededly could not remember, and the record does not otherwise intimate, that Holt called him anything other than an "ass." Nor does the record contain any evidence that she directed that or any other such epithet to Echols.

Again seemingly contradicting his affidavit, Tolson denied that Holt was discharged because she "would not [13] The proposal consisted of increasing the telemarketing complement to 12 and adding a second shift—one working four 10-hour days per week, the other three 10-hour days and 4 hours on Saturday, and both being paid the same base salary.

[14] Tolson testified that this extract from his affidavit refers to Holt's 10 April discharge, not that in question. A reading of the extract, in context, unequivocally indicates the contrary, however, and the same affidavit states that the incident in Williams' office occurred "around 5/5."

stop bothering other employees."[15] He denied, as well, that poor sales were the "ultimate reason."[16] He also denied that Holt's union activities were a factor, insisting that he was "not at all" concerned about the employees' "forming a union." His "only concern as it relates to [union] activity," he testified, "was that it [not be] on company time."

Although Tolson's affidavit cites Holt's "going into unauthorized files in Williams' office" as one of the reasons for her discharge, he did not speak to that in his live recital. Echols and Holt both recounted, however, that Echols once chastised her for using the telephone in Williams' office. Echols testified that she told him she was calling in search of other employment, and that he remonstrated: "[T]his is an off-limits area and you're on my time." Holt countered, according to Echols, that the premises had no phone for personal calls, and he offered the use of his office phone when she was on break.

Tolson's affidavit states that this incident occurred "around 5/5." Echols first testified that it happened sometime between 13 April and 8 May, but that he could not remember "what date it is." He later testified that it was 5 May, and that he had documented the incident in writing. Holt testified, on the other hand, that it was "at the beginning of April," and Williams recalled that it was "about a month before [Holt] was terminated." Perhaps unwittingly revealing that it happened as recalled by Holt and Williams (and/or that the incident was not that important in the overall scheme of things), Echols testified that the reasons for the 8 May discharge were much the same as those underlying Holt's 10 April so-called discharge, "the only thing new . . . [being] . . . her behavior at the Michigan dental meeting."

Holt and another telemarketer, Dottie Voight, represented Respondent at a meeting in Detroit from 25 to 27 April. Tolson testified that Holt's standing with him suffered from word of her antics there. Echols had reported, according to Tolson, that Holt's conduct had been "unbecoming a professional"; that she had "gone out in the aisle and tried to trip dentists, and grabbed them." Echols added, per Tolson, that Voight was "extremely embarrassed with Tammy's behavior at the show," resigning as a result.

Tolson continued that he "wanted to fire" Holt when he heard this, but that he deferred to Echols, who said he wanted "to observe her for a couple of more days and then make a decision." Echols further remarked, as Tolson recalled, that Respondent was "shorthanded and a body was better than none."

Echols testified that he learned about the Detroit meeting, from Williams, on his 5 May return from a trip. Williams reported, so he testified, that Holt had been "tripping doctors in the aisle, and that her brazenness so "upset" Voight that she had quit. Williams recounted in turn Voight's telling her that Holt "had went so far as to go out and stand in the aisle and basically trip doctors"; and that she, Williams, passed the information on to Echols.

Echols testified that Holt acknowledged to him literally tripping dentists, explaining that extreme aggressiveness was needed to offset a poor booth location. He responded, he testified, that this was "not the professional behavior [he] was expecting," and would be "reflected in [her] performance review." Holt testified that she neither tripped anyone, nor told Echols that she had. She did admit, though, that she "did everything [she] could to get" dentists to Respondent's booth, because "sales was down," and Voight "was not aggressive enough," and the booth was "in a spot where hardly any doctors went by."[17] Voight, testifying as Respondent's witness, said nothing about the tripping, instead likening Holt's approach to that of a carnival barker "yelling at you to come into their booth." Voight did not go into the reasons she left the payroll.

Tolson testified that Holt had "a positive attitude" and that her performance was "maybe a little bit above average" in February and March, his only reservations being her "extremely bad" English and lack of "professionalism" when dealing with dentists. But, after 10 April, he asserted, her attitude "changed considerably" and her "disruptiveness" increased—she "was never on the phone,"[18] she "was constantly interruptng other people,"[19] her "sales were down,"[20] and she was complaining about her pay and "the general aspect of the company."[21]

Echols, who became marketing director in early March, testified that he "was not satisfied with [Holt's] performance" from that time to 10 April citing both her "disruptive behavior," which he called his "main concern," and her sales record. She "was a disruptive influence to other employees" throughout that time, he amplified, because of her complaints "every single payday" that "the company had ripped her off." Others consequently "started complaining and questioning their paychecks, too," he continued, compelling him to go over the underlying calculations with a few of them each payday as a routine occurrence. This, Echols noted, was "very irritating."

Echols admittedly did not feel in those early weeks, however, that Holt "couldn't be worked with." He testified that he once resisted Tolson's urging that he "get rid [15] Tolson's affidavit states in relevant part: "(3) insubordination, her refusal not to stop bothering her fellow employees." The italicized "not" plainly subverts the intended meaning of the passage, and should be disregarded.

[16] Respondent's counsel stated on the record that "sales are not really an issue in this case."

[17] Echols characterized Detroit sales as "atrocious," failing even to cover expenses.

[18] Tolson testified, "[A]s soon as I walked in, she turned around and got on the phone." Asked if he spoke to her about this, he testified: "It's not my position to do that. That's her supervisor's position."

[19] Tolson indicated that he did not personally see this, testifying, "I was hearing complaints from other telemarketers regarding her disruptiveness."

[20] Holt's sales figures were $1873 for January, $7247 for February, $9972 for March, $4408 for April, and $4173 for May up to her discharge. Tolson acknowledged that her May sales were "rather high," but averred that this is misleading because of "false orders." Echols testified that Respondent knew nothing about any false orders "till after she left . . . so that wasn't even a factor in her dismissal. The record is anything but conclusive that Holt in fact placed false orders.

[21] Tolson testified that Holt's complaints "primarily" concerned her pay—"it was never correct as far she was concerned." He added, "[T]he entire company shuddered when payday came up, because we knew we were going to have a problem with Holt on the pay."

of her," replying: "[N]o, I don't want to get rid of her, because . . . she's got a lot of room for improvement and . . . she's got some potential and I'd like to work with her."

Echols assertedly watched Holt "more closely" following her abortive severance of 10 April. He explained: "I'd already terminated her. I'd already been told by Mr. Tolson to fire her several times. My neck was on the line here by bringing her back."

"For the first few days," Echols testified, "she seemed to be fine," but then, come payday, she resumed her litany about having been "ripped off." Nor was that the only source of irritation, according to Echols. He added that he "noticed her more and more frequently talking to the other people in the other cubicles" about matters unrelated to work, and that four others had complained to him that she was "bothering [them] again." He further testified that this "was affecting" the others' performance; that their calls "had dropped off."

Asked what he did when he saw Holt engaging others in inappropriate talk, and how often it happened, Echols replied that he told her to "go back to work," but that he could not recall "how frequent it was"—that he "was so disgusted with the whole matter [that he] didn't mark it off." Concerning the incidence of coworker complaints, Echols testified, "[S]o frequent that, if I kept writing down every date and every occurrence, I wouldn't have gotten any of my work done."

As earlier mentioned, Echols testified that he memorialized Holt's being in Williams' office. In evidence is a two-page document, ostensibly prepared by Echols on 5 May relying on a synthesis of memory and jottings on "little note pads," which purports to summarize that and other of Holt's misdeeds and failings. The first page states:

> Tammy
> 5/5 Unauthorized entry into supervisor's office to search for new job. I heard her & told her not to be doing this from this building, during work hours. Verbal Warning given.
> 5/5 Tammy was observed out of her work station, having general chitchat and disrupting her coworkers. She has been spoken to several times about this & given a Verbal Warning.
> 4/25-4/27 Michigan Dental Meeting—Sales Quota was 5000—actual 998-2 people-Tammy Holt-Dotie Voight attended. When Dottie a new employee returned she told us Tammy would actually trip Doctors to stop them. Tammy was told that I was upset with her performance & she would not be attending another meeting. I was in Indianapolis when I heard an Exhibitor rave about how good the Michigan meeting was. We have always done well at this meeting and 5000 is an acceptable and attainable goal for this market.

Asked why he made a record of these matters at this time, Echols testified:

> I was still having problems with Tammy so I was still keeping documentation on occurrences that I felt warranted it. . . . [W]e had already talked to Tammy about her disruptive behavior, she'd been terminated before. She made a commitment to me that she would not do this, that she'd have a good attitude and do her job and this showed me that she was not doing what she said she would.

The second page of the document states:

> Every Pay Day of Commission Day
> Tammy would complain her husband would kill her & she couldn't show him her paycheck. Several options were given to Tammy—none of which she liked.
> She was hired at 500 base [plus] 400 commission.
> The guaranteed commission of 500 was extended 90 days on March 9 by Carl Tolson. He felt the company had not given her all the tools she needed to succeed.
> Several Training Sessions, Sales Seminars, PTSS Courses & 2 Trade Shows have been given to help Tammy reach her goals.[22]
> Everytime we sent Tammy on a trip she wanted to receive comp time for going. Wykle Research does not give comp time to salaried employees when they travel as they receive 5% commission on everything they write at the show plus all expenses paid.

Echol's reason for recording these matters, he testified, was > because these were occurrences that I had not documented before, as they occurred, and I thought it should be documented somewhere because I thought maybe I'd better let this person go.

He denied then knowing about Holt's union activities.

Holt testified that "everything was fine" and that she had "a very positive attitude" until 10 April, but that she "became unhappy" as an outgrowth of that day's meeting with Echols and Williams and consequently began looking for another job. She continued that "the morale of everybody . . . was going down" coincident with the erosion of her own; and that, while she "liked" Echols and Williams, she "didn't like" Tolson and "the way he conducted business."

Holt further testified that "all of" the telemarketers, as a "common occurrence," talked among themselves about nonwork matters; and that Williams often prodded them, "sometimes twice a day," to "go to work" or "get back on the telephones." Williams conceded as much, testifying that she had "to remind quite a number . . . of the telemarketers . . . on a regular basis . . . to stop the chitchat."

Holt denied, however, that she ever was singled out for being "disruptive" or "chitchatting." She also denied ever being told that her sales were "poor or unacceptable." Holt denied, as well, that she complained about her pay "every payday." She asserted that she "twice" questioned the "accuracy" of her commissions, and that

"quite a few" of her coworkers "quite often" did the same.

On or about 1 April, Holt and a coworker each received a $200 bonus. Echols testified that the announcement accompanying the presentation to Holt gave as the reason "her spending time and energy training . . . other telemarketers on the computer and because of the initiative she showed in doing that." Similarly, Tolson's affidavit states that the bonus was given Holt "for showing some initiative and doing extra work in showing other employees how to use the computer." Tolson and Echols nevertheless testified that that was not the real reason. The real reason, according to Tolson, was "for her to buy some clothes, because she was going to [a] dental meeting and her attire wasn't suitable."

Holt denied being told to use the money for clothes.

B. Conclusions and Reasons

1. The allegedly unlawful interrogation and discharge threat

Reviewing the evidence, Holt testified that Tolson began the 8 May meeting by saying he understood that she had "had a union meeting last night" and that she "had been soliciting union cards." Tolson later said, according to Holt, that she "should quit" if she was "that unhappy with the company"; and that she would "be fired" if she "did not cease and desist [from] union activities" and "sign a paper" so pledging. Holt further testified that she memorialized the cease-and-desist ultimatum in the form of a contemporaneous note, which is in evidence; and that she refused in the meeting's aftermath to sign the so-called "statement of understanding" because it contained no reference to that ultimatum.

Tolson admittedly opened the meeting by saying he had heard that Holt was "soliciting" for the Union, and concededly told her, "at least once" in the context of her union activities, "that, if she was unhappy with the company, she should quit." He acknowledged, as well, that he questioned Holt about asking Banker "to sign a union card," later averring that he instead said, "I understand—Thelma tells me that you—you've been bothering her regarding a union card."

Tolson denied mentioning the previous night's organizational meeting, or that he gave Holt a cease-and-desist ultimatum, asserting that he merely directed to solicit "on her own time." Tolson's affidavit states, however, that he "advised" Holt that she was "disrupting the flow of work of the company," that he "had been informed that her constant complaining and attitude was disruptive to her fellow employees," and that he "would be forced to terminate her . . . if she didn't stop disrupting the work flow."

Echols also denied that Tolson made a cease-and-desist pronouncement, adding that he did not otherwise threaten Holt with discharge. Banker testified that she did not recall a cease-and-desist ultimatum.

Neither the "statement of understanding" nor Banker's more complete minutes refer to a cease-and-desist ultimatum. The minutes reflect Tolson's telling Holt, however, that "further disruptive activities of any sort will be cause of dismissal"; and that she had "a choice as to whether [she was] going to be here or gone," and he "want[ed] the choice made by the end of today."

Crediting Holt, I find that Tolson delivered a cease-and-desist pronouncement substantially as she described. Her demeanor in the telling was altogether covincing, and the content of her testimony on the point, including that about the memorializing note and her refusal to sign the "statment of understanding," not only stood up under the rigors of cross-examination, but came across as eminently plausible. Her account gains added documentary enhancement, moreover, from the remarks linked to Tolson by Banker's presumably sanitized minutes that "further disruptive activities of any sort will be cause for dismissal," and that Holt had "a choice . . . to be here or gone" and he "want[ed] the choice made" by day's end.

I conclude that, by thus conditioning Holt's continued employment on her abstention from union activities, Tolson threatened her with discharge in a manner violating Section 8(a)(1).

Regarding the allegedly unlawful interrogation, Tolson admittedly brought up Holt's card-solicitation activities—either in question form or as a declarative statement. I find, crediting Holt, that he also mentioned the "union meeting last night."[23] I conclude that these remarks were interrogative in purport if not in form, and that, juxtaposed with Tolson's cease-and-desist ultimatum and the surrounding circumstances generally, they constituted additional violations of Section 8(a)(1).[24]

2. The allegedly unlawful discharge

In Wright Line, the Board stated:

> [W]e shall henceforth employ the following causation test in all cases alleging violation of Section 8(a)(3) or violations of Section 8(a)(1) turning on employer motivation. First, we shall require that the General Counsel make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in the employer's decision. Once this is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct.[25]

I conclude that the General Counsel has made the requisite prima facie showing that Holt's protected conduct was a motivating factor in Respondent's decision to discharge her. Thus:

(a) Holt was the foremost, possibly the only, union proponent among Respodent's telemarketers.

[23] Again, Holt's demeanor was most persuasive. Tolson's denial was weakened by his accompanying assertion that he "did not even know there was a meeting." Given that Holt had invited Banker to the meeting, and that Banker felt duty-bound to report Holt's card-solicitation activities to Tolson, I deem it most unlikely that she did not also tell him about the meeting.

[25] 251 NLRB 1083, 1089 (1980). This formulation received Supreme Court approval in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

(b) Tolson and Echols first heard about Holt's union proponency the very morning of the discharge.

(c) Respondent was profoundly disturbed by word of Holt's union activities, as witness Tolson's immediately calling her to his office to "get the matter straightened out," and his conduct during the ensuing meeting—most notably, his cease-and-desist ultimatum.

I further conclude that Respondent has failed to overcome the General Counsel's prima facie showing. My reasoning is this:

(a) Had Holt called Tolson "an ass" during the 8 May meeting, as he and Tolson testified; or directed "some very vile terms" at Tolson and Echols, as Tolson would have it; and had Echols thereupon discharged her "spontaneous[ly]" and without "premeditation," as he testified at one point, the discharge probably would not have violated the Act.[26]

(b) The record contains no evidence, however, that Holt said anything remotely vile;[27] and, while the meeting doubtless grew loud and heated, I credit Holt that she did not call Tolson "an ass." [28] The supposition necessarily follows that Tolson and Echols made this up to lend colorable legitimacy to an improper action.

(c) Tolson and Echols, moreover, did not leave it at that. After testifying that he discharged Holt as an on-the-spot reaction to her supposed outburst in the meeting, Echols testified, variously, that "the sole factor was her performance," that her "sales performance . . . was part of it," and that the "primary reason" was her "disruptive behavior"—by which he professed to mean her "constant disruption" of other employees and her "constant disruptions about her salary, the policies, the procedures, everything about the company."

Echols to the contrary, Tolson testified and Respondent's counsel represented that Holt's sales were not an issue; and Tolson, compounding the confusion, stated in his affidavit that the decision was his, based on Holt's "going into unauthorized files in Williams' office," her "constant complaining . . . to her fellow workers," and her "refusal . . . to stop bothering her fellow employees." Tolson then fouled the stew still more by testifying that this last was not part of the mix.

These /several assertions in the aggregate, far from serving Respondent's intended purpose, significantly buttress the General Counsel's prima facie showing. They perforce belie any contention that the discharge was spontaneous and unpremeditated; and their egregious inconsistency suggests a truth-be-damned flinging of mudballs against a wall in the hope that some might stick. Further, to the extent that Echols' and Tolson's "reasons" do correspond—their recurrent references to Holt's disruptive and bothersome behavior—the inference is inescapable that they were alluding at least in substantial part to her union activities.[29]

(d) Most of the irritants cited by Tolson and Echols in would-be justification of the discharge had been endured for weeks before the 8 May revelation of Holt's union activities. That she was discharged that same day because of those irritants, one or all, to the exclusion of her union activities, therefore begs belief.[30]

(e) Aside from the just-noted infirmities in Respondent's defense, it suffers from Tolson's and Echols' shared penchant for reckless exaggeration and other obvious dissimulation.

Some salient examples: (1) Tolson's testimony, contrary to both his affidavit and the remarks during presentation, that Holt was given the bonus "to buy some clothes" rather than "for showing more initiative and doing extra work"; (2) Echols' testimony, unsupported by Voight, denied by Holt, and inherently unbelievable, that Holt literally had been "tripping doctors in the aisle" at the Detroit meeting; (3) Echols' added testimony, uncorroborated by Voight or Williams and intrinsically suspect, that Voight quit because of Holt's Detroit conduct; (4) Echols' evasion, when asked how often he saw Holt engaged in inappropriate talk, that he "was so disgusted with the whole matter [that he] didn't mark it off"; and (5) Echols' related ploy, when asked the incidence of coworker complaints about Holt, that they were "so frequent that, if [he] kept writing down every date and every occurence, [he] wouldn't have gotten any of [his] work done."

Yet other instances of Tolson's and Echols' manifest and discrediting lack of candor are (6) Tolson's testimony that Holt "was never on the phone" (emphasis added) after 10 April, whereas Banker's minutes reveal that Echols acknowledged during the 8 May meeting that Holt "work[ed] very hard on the phone"; (7) Holt's being singled out by both Tolson and Echols as the cause of recurrent interruptions, even though the record contains no substantial evidence that she was ever singled out for warning or rebuke on that account and Williams testified that she "had to remind quite a number . . . of the telemarketers . . . on a regular basis . . . to stop the chitchat"; and (8) Tolson's testimony—absurdly inflated and seemingly at odds with Echols' admission that "a few of" the employees questioned their pay as a "routine occurrence"—that "the entire company shuddered when payday came up, because we knew we were going to have a problem with Holt on the pay."

Tolson's and Echols' want of veracity is additionally revealed by (9) the total absence of corroboration, even from Tolson, for the statement in his affidavit that Holt got "into unauthorized files" in Williams' office; and (10) the unconvincing character of Echols' testimony about the timing of Holt's being in Williams' office. First testifying only that it was sometime between 13 April and 8

[26] Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493, 497 (1984).

[27] Among the dictionary definitions of vile are these: "1. morally base or evil; wicked; depraved; sinful 2. offensive to the senses or sensibilities; repulsive; disgusting 3. cheap; worthless 4. degrading; low; mean 5. highly disagreeable or most inferior; very bad . . . ." Webster's, New World Dictionary (2d College Edition 1972).

[28] Holt, as earlier indicated, generally was a convincing witness. Tolson and Echols, given to easy hyperbole in their zeal to disparage Holt, were not. In addition, Holt's calling Tolson "an ass" is not corroborated by the postmeeting "statement of understanding," by Banker, or by Banker's more detailed minutes; and Tolson's later testimony only that he "believe[d] so," when asked if Holt had called him that, was singularly weak.

[29] E.g., Virginia Metalcrafters, 158 NLRB 958, 962 (1966); Winn-Dixie Greenville, 157 NLRB 657, 662 (1966).

May, he later asserted that it was on 5 May, even producing a memorandum he supposedly had prepared that same day and ostensibly documenting this and other of Holt's transgressions. Holt and Williams persuasively testified, however, that the incident was weeks earlier; and, as earlier noted, Echols himself implied as much (and/or that the incident was of no great moment), testifying that "the only thing new" surrounding the discharge in question, as opposed to Holt's 10 April "discharge," was her "behavior at the Michigan meeting."[31]

One could go on; the foregoing is illustrative rather than exhaustive of the chinks apparent in the accounts of Respondent's two chief witnesses. When deceit is at the core of a defense, deceit unavoidably radiates far and wide. "O what a tangled web we weave . . . ."

(f) Finally regarding Respondent's burden, just as the content of Tolson's and Echols' testimony was fraught with conspicuous artifice, their demeanor in the rendering was correspondingly unconvincing.[32]

Conclusions of Law

Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act on 8 May 1987 by discharging Tammy Holt; and further violated Section 8(a)(1) on 8 May by interrogating Holt about her union activities, and by telling her she would be fired if she did not cease and desist from engaging in union activities.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[33]

ORDER

The Respondent, Wykle Research, Inc., Carson City, Nevada, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Coercively interrogating any employee about union support or union activities.

(b) Threatening employees with discharge unless they refrain from activities on behalf of United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local 711, affiliated with United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC or any other labor organization.

(c) Discharging employees for engaging in union activities.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Tammy Holt immediate and full reinstatement to her former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position; without prejudice to her seniority and other rights and privileges; and make her whole, with interest, for any losses of wages or benefits she suffered as a consequence of the unlawful termination of her employment on 8 May 1987.[34]

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful termination of Tammy Holt and notify the employee in writing that this has been done and that the termination will not be used against her in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its facility in Carson City, Nevada, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[35] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 32, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[31] Thus rejecting Echols' testimony that the incident in Williams' office happened on or about 5 May, I also reject his testimony that he prepared the memorandum that day and that it constitutes a reliable recordation of events. I deduce that he instead prepared it sometime after the discharge, self-servingly shaping its contents to support a theory that Holt's misconduct had exceeded the limits of tolerance by 5 May just before the onset of her union activities, yet proximate to the discharge.

[32] The argument might yet be made, despite all the deficiencies in Respondent's presentation, that the circumstances immediate to the discharge bespeak an impulsive reaction by Echols to an unprotected provocation. A more tenable interpretation, in light of those deficiencies, is that Tolson and Echols scripted the fateful meeting with the idea of goading Holt into some kind of discharge-justifying excess.

[33] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[34] Backpay shall be computed in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest in accordance with New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Under New Horizons, interest is computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621.

[35] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Notice To Employees
Posted By Order of The
National Labor Relations Board
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT coercively interrogate employees concerning their union activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees with discharge unless they refrain from activities on behalf of United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local 711, affiliated with United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT discharge employees for engaging in union activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Tammy Holt immediate and full reinstatement to former jobs or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make her whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from her discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL remove from the employment records of Tammy Holt any reference to her termination; and WE WILL notify her in writing that this has been done and that the termination will not in any way serve as a basis for future personnel or disciplinary action affecting her.

Sprinkler Fitters Local No. 704, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of the United States and Canada, AFL–CIO and McRae Fire Protection, Inc. Cases 7–CA–1411 and 7–CC–1421

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On May 27, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Irwin H. Socoloff issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The complaint alleges that the Respondent, Sprinkler Fitters Local 704, violated Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act by engaging in secondary picketing with the object of forcing or requiring other individuals to cease doing business with the Charging Party. The Respondent filed an answer denying that it had violated the Act, but at the hearing it withdrew its answer and, along with the other parties, stipulated and moved that the judge enter a decision and recommended order in conformity with the allegations and prayer for relief contained in the complaint. The parties further stipulated and moved that the judge issue a notice to members and employees consistent with the recommended remedy.

The prayer for relief contained, inter alia, the following language:

> 1. Cease and desist from:
> (a) Picketing at or in the vicinity of the premises of the Bellbrook Nursing Home jobsite, Rochester Hills, Michigan, during hours when the Charging Party is not working on the site.
> (b) In any manner or by any means, including picketing, orders, directions, instructions, requests, or appeals, however given, made or imparted, or by any like or related acts or conduct, or by permitting any such to remain in existence or effect, engaging in, or inducing or encouraging any individual employed by Liberty Construction Corp., or by any other person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce, to engage in a strike or a refusal in the course of his employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any service or in any manner or by any means, threatening, coercing, or restraining Liberty or any other person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce where in either case [an] object thereof is to force or require Liberty Construction Corp., or any other person, to cease doing business with the Charging Party.

In his recommended Order, however, the judge substituted the following for the quoted material:

> 1. Cease and desist from:
>
> (a) Picketing at the Bellbrook Nursing Home jobsite, Rochester Hills, Michigan, where an object thereof is to force or require Liberty Construction Corp., or any other person, to cease doing business with McRae Fire Protection, Inc.
> (b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

The judge's notice contained similarly worded provisions.

The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's failure to provide relief consistent with the stipulation of the parties and to issue a notice consistent with that stipulation. Specifically, the General Counsel contends that the provisions of paragraph 1(b) of the judge's recommended Order, and the corresponding provisions of his notice, are not equivalent to the provisions of paragraph 1(b) of the prayer for relief. The General Counsel requests that the recommended Order and notice be modified to conform to the stipulation of the parties. We find merit in the exceptions.

As the General Counsel points out, paragraph 1(b) of the recommended Order is a standard cease-and-desist order for violations of Section 8(b)(1)(A); it does not require the Respondent to cease and desist from violating Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B). Paragraph 1(b) of the prayer for relief, by contrast, closely tracks the language of Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) and orders the Respondent to cease and desist from violating that portion of the Act. Similar provisions have been included in other cases in which 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) violations have been found.[1] Consequently, we shall modify the recommended Order and notice to conform to the parties' stipulation by substituting the provisions of paragraph 1(b) of the prayer for relief for those of both paragraphs 1(a) and 1(b) of the recommended Order and the corresponding portions of the notice.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Sprinkler Fitters Local No. 704, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of the United States and Canada, AFL–CIO, Livonia, Michigan, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(a).

"(a) In any manner or by any means, including picketing, orders, directions, instructions, requests, or appeals, however given, made or imparted, or by any like or related acts or conduct, or by permitting any such to remain in existence or effect, engaging in, or inducing or encouraging any individual employed by Liberty Construction Corp., or by any other person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce, to engage in a strike or a refusal in the course of his employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any service, or in any manner or by any means, threatening, coercing, or restraining Liberty or any other person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce where in either case an object thereof is to force or require Liberty Construction Corp., or any other person, to cease doing business with McRae Fire Protection, Inc."

2. Delete paragraph 1(b).

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

[2] Because our modifications will render redundant the provisions of par. 1(a) of the judge's recommended Order and the corresponding provisions of the notice, we shall further modify the recommended Order and notice to delete those provisions, which are, we note, somewhat inconsistent with the provisions of par. 1(a) of the prayer for relief. The General Counsel does not specifically except to the judge's failure to provide the relief requested in that paragraph. In any event, the provisions of that paragraph are themselves redundant, because par. 1(b) directs the Respondent to cease and desist from violating Sec. 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) "in any manner or by any means." Accordingly, we shall not include the provisions of par. 1(a) of the prayer for relief in the Order or the notice.

The General Counsel also notes that the judge failed to address his notice to employees as well as members, as provided for in the complaint. We shall substitute a new notice to conform to the prayer for relief, as stipulated by the parties.

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES AND MEMBERS POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT in any manner or by any means, including picketing, orders, directions, instructions, requests, or appeals, however given, made or imparted, or by any like or related acts or conduct, or by permitting any such to remain in existence or effect, engage in, or induce or encourage any individual employed by Liberty Construction Corp., or by any other person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce, to engage in a strike or in a refusal in the course of his employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any service, or in any manner or by any means, threaten, coerce, or restrain Liberty or any other person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce where in either case an object thereof is to force or require Liberty Construction Corp., or any other person, to cease doing business with McRae Fire Protection, Inc.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

IRWIN H. SOCOLOFF, Administrative Law Judge. On charges filed on August 11, 1987, and January 22, 1988, by McRae Fire Protection, Inc., against Sprinkler Fitters Local No. 704, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of the United States and Canada, AFL–CIO (the Respondent), the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 7, issued a complaint dated February 4, 1988, alleging violations by Respondent of Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Respondent, by its answer, denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

Pursuant to notice, trial was held before me in Detroit, Michigan, on March 23, 1988, at which the General Counsel, the Charging Party, and the Respondent were represented by counsel. At trial, Respondent withdrew its answer and the parties agreed to have me issue a decision in conformity with the complaint allegations.

On the entire record in this case, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Liberty Construction Corp., a general contractor in the construction industry with offices in Southfield, Michigan, has been engaged, at all times material, in the construction of the Bellbrook Nursing Home in Rochester Hills, Michigan. The value of this construction project exceeds $1 million and involves the use of goods and materials, valued in excess of $70,000, which are delivered to the Bellbrook jobsite directly from points located outside the State of Michigan.

McRae Fire Protection, Inc., the Charging Party, is a subcontractor at the Bellbrook jobsite, engaged in the installation of a sprinkler fire protection system. In performing this work, it uses goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000, which are shipped to its Michigan facilities directly from points located outside Michigan. Other subcontractors working at the jobsite include Jerrett Construction, Elite Stucco & Drywall, Shawnee Shores Construction, S & M Heating, R. J. F. Mechanical, Resnick Electric, and Marco Cement.

Each of Liberty Construction Corp., McRae Fire Protection, Inc. and the above-referenced subcontractors are employers and/or persons engaged in commerce, or in an industry affecting commerce, within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) and Section 8(b)(4) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

As alleged in the complaint, I find and conclude:

A. At all times material herein, Respondent has had a labor dispute with the Charging Party. It has not had a labor dispute with Liberty Construction Corp., or any subcontractor other than the Charging Party, at the Bellbrook jobsite.

B. In furtherance of its dispute with the Charging Party, Respondent has engaged in the following conduct at the Bellbrook jobsite:

1. From on or about August 3, 4, and 10, through August 19, 1987, Respondent picketed the jobsite at an entrance that was posted for the exclusive use of neutral persons, their employees, visitors, and suppliers, despite the fact that there was an alternative entrance available that had been posted for the exclusive use of the Charging Party, its employees, visitors, and suppliers.

2. From on or about August 10 through August 19, 1987, Respondent regularly picketed the Bellbrook jobsite from 5:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m., during jobsite workdays, despite the notice it had received that the Charging Party did not work during those hours.

3. From on or about January 21 through 29, 1988, Respondent picketed the jobsite from 6:30 a.m. to 2 p.m., during jobsite workdays, despite the notice it had received that the Charging Party did not work during those hours.

C. As a result of Respondent's conduct, set forth above, individuals employed by various of the neutral subcontractors refused to work at the Bellbrook jobsite.

D. Respondent engaged in the conduct set forth above with an object of forcing or requiring Liberty Construction Corp., and other persons to cease doing business with the Charging Party.

E. By the acts and conduct described above, Respondent has engaged in violations of Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with the operations of Liberty Construction Corp. and McRae Fire Protection, Inc. described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practice conduct in violation of Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Liberty Construction Corp., McRae Fire Protection, Inc., Jerrett Construction, Elite Stucco & Drywall, Shawnee Shores Construction, S & M Heating, R. J. F. Mechanical, Resnick Electric, and Marco Cement are employers and/or persons engaged in commerce, or in an industry affecting commerce, within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) and Section 8(b)(4) of the Act.

2. Respondent Sprinkler Fitters Local No. 704, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of the United States and Canada, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By its picketing at the Bellbrook jobsite in August 1987 and January 1988, Respondent engaged in unfair labor practice conduct within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[1]

ORDER

The Respondent, Sprinkler Fitters Local No. 704, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of the United States and Canada, AFL–CIO, Livonia, Michigan, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Picketing at the Bellbrook Nursing Home jobsite, Rochester Hills, Michigan, where an object thereof is to force or require Liberty Construction Corp., or any other person, to cease doing business with McRae Fire Protection, Inc.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its Livonia, Michigan office, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[2] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 7, after being signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days thereafter in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Furnish the Regional Director for Region 7 with signed copies of the notice for posting by Liberty Construction Corp. and the subcontractors at the Bellbrook Nursing Home jobsite, if willing, in places where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

[1] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[2] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Lincoln Lutheran of Racine, Wisconsin, Inc. and Katherine Arena. Case 30–CA–9464

August 31, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On April 29, 1988, Administrative Law Judge George F. McInerny issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

George Strick, Esq., for the General Counsel.
John M. Loomis, Esq. and Katherine Williams, Esq. (Beck, Chaet & Loomis, S.C.), of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, for the Respondent.
Duane Arena, Esq., of Racine, Wisconsin, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GEORGE F. MCINERNY, Administrative Law Judge. Based on a charge filed on February 4, 1987, by Duane Arena, Esq., on behalf of Katherine Arena[1] (the Charging Party), the Regional Director for Region 30 of the National Labor Relations Board (Board) issued a complaint on March 27, 1987, alleging that Lincoln Lutheran of Racine, Wisconsin, Inc. (Respondent, Lincoln Lutheran, or the Center), had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 2 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. (the Act), by discharging and failing to reinstate the Charging Party because she had engaged in protected, concerted activities under the Act. The Respondent filed an answer in which it denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

[1] Duane Arena is the husband of Katherine Arena, as well as her attorney in this matter.

Thereafter, on June 23 and August 3 and 4, 1987, a hearing was held before me at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, at which all parties were represented by counsel, and had the opportunity to present testimony and documentary evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to present oral and written motions, and to argue orally. After the close of the hearing, the Respondent and the General Counsel submitted briefs, which have been carefully considered.[2]

On the entire record, including my observations of the witnesses, and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent is a Wisconsin corporation with its office and place of business in Racine, Wisconsin, where, among other things, it is engaged in the operation of a nursing home known as the Becker-Shoop Center. During the calendar year ending December 31, 1986, the Respondent derived gross revenues of over $100,000 from its nursing home and purchased and received goods and materials valued at over $10,000 directly from points outside the State of Wisconsin.

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Lincoln Lutheran is a nonprofit corporation owned and operated by 24 sponsoring churches. The majority of the sponsors are Lutheran churches, but the list also includes one Episcopal, one Methodist, and one Catholic church. Lincoln Lutheran offers elderly care, principally in Racine, consisting of three nursing homes, one of which is the Becker-Shoop Center which we are concerned with here, three independent living facilities, four supervised living facilities, and such other programs as meals-on-wheels, wellness programs, telephone programs (involving daily calls to elderly persons), adult day care centers, support groups, and neighborhood senior centers. The Company also maintains facilities in Kenosha and Oak Creek, also in Wisconsin.

The Becker-Shoop Center, the facility involved in this case, is a 110-bed skilled care nursing facility established in 1982, by the merger of two previously existing facilities. As the description implies, it is a place where seriously handicapped individuals are cared for and treated. Approximately 40 patients have what has been diagnosed as Alzheimer's disease, 20 others are not so diagnosed but exhibit the symptoms of Alzheimer's disease. All the patients are confused, crippled, or wandering, and require the highest level of medical care.

[2] After the close of the hearing, the Respondent submitted a motion to correct transcript in a number of places. There being no opposition to this motion, and since the proposed corrections comport, except in two instances, with my memory of the testimony at the hearing, I grant the motion except for the proposed corrections on p. 87, L. 15, which should read "employment at will," and p. 238, L. 9, where the proposed correction does not relate to the record at that place.

The administrator of the Becker-Shoop Center almost since its establishment in 1982 has been Daniel Langenwalter. The nursing department, which is where the events composing this case took place, has been headed since April 1983 by Director of Nursing (DON) Elaine Dyer. She has been assisted since 1984 by Assistant Director of Nursing (ADON) Judy Suter, and PM Coordinator Sue Barney, who was appointed in 1985.[3]

Daniel Langenwalter testified that during 1985 and 1986, the times in question here, the Becker-Shoop facility employed three classes of people in the nursing department; registered nurses (RNs), licensed practical nurses (LPNs), and aides, also known as group living therapists (GLTs).[4] There are three shifts daily, providing 24-hour nursing services. The first shift runs from 6:45 a.m. to 3:15 p.m., the second from 3 to 11 p.m., and the third from 11 to 7 a.m. The normal complement of nursing department employees on these shifts was described by Langenwalter as:

First shift: 16 aides; 1 LPN; 3 RNs
Second shift: 14–16 aides; 1 LPN; 3 RNs
Third shift: 5 aides; 0–1 LPN; 1–2 RNs

Carol Jarosz, the Respondent's corporate administrator of human resources, testified that RNs at the Center were employed in three categories, based on the number of hours they work. There are permanent full-time people, who work at least 80 hours during the Center's 2-week payroll payroll period; permanent part-time people, who work between 40 and 80 hours in the 2-week period; and limited part-time people, who work between zero and 20 hours in the 2-week payroll period. Some of the last category come in to work on regular schedules, others are on call and are referred to as "floats." At times material here there were eight or nine in the permanent full-time category, seven or eight in the permanent part-time category, and six to seven in the limited part-time category.

B. The Discharge

Katherine Arena was hired at the Center as a limited part-time RN in April 1983. She worked from 4 to 8 p.m. for a time, then from 3 to 8:15 p.m., and finally from 3 to 9 p.m., generally on weekends.[5] She was described as a competent nurse and there is no contention here that her work was unsatisfactory or in any way connected with her discharge.

So far as I can determine from the record here, Arena's problems with Lincoln Lutheran began in the late summer of 1985, when she became concerned with the Center's policies, particularly staffing, scheduling, absentee and tardiness, shift exchanges, the level of care provided to patients, morale problems, and other matters. She expressed her opinions on these matters frequently and openly. In September 1985 Arena contacted all of the RNs at the facility and invited them to a meeting on September 23, at the office of her husband, Attorney Duane Arena. Seven or eight nurses attended the meeting, which lasted about 3 hours, and at which the above topics were discussed along with a suggestion that they form a "council" or group of three nurses, who could represent the group and deal with the DON about the group's concerns.

The management of the Center heard of this, apparently from some of the attendees, and reacted by sending Arena a warning letter dated September 30, 1985, over Langenwalter's signature. The warning set out the facts that Arena had complaints about "the Nursing Service Department at Becker-Shoop Center"; and that she had discussed these complaints "at work and on work time" with other nurses. The letter went on to say that Langenwalter had no problem with the fact that Arena had complaints, but pointed out that there was a complaint procedure set out in the Lincoln Lutheran employee handbook. Because she had failed to follow the prescribed procedure, she was being warned and directed henceforth to follow the applicable procedures under pain of further disciplinary action, "up to and including termination."

The warning also contained a statement of the Respondent's view of the status of RNs at the Center: "as a staff R.N. you are considered a professional and part of the management team. Discussion of Management related concerns you may have relative to the operation of Becker-Shoop Center or Lincoln Lutheran of Racine, Wisconsin, Inc., with Subordinates is not appropriate." Langenwalter concluded by suggesting that Arena put any questions about this matter in writing and send them to Elaine Dyer, the director of nursing, or himself.

The letter was presented to Arena at a meeting with Langenwalter and Dyer. Arena remonstrated, asking to be told who her "accusers" were, and whether the letter was prompted by the September 23 meeting. Langenwalter refused to respond.

Arena then turned the September 30 letter over to her husband and attorney, Duane Arena. He immediately sent a letter, addressed to Joy Moy,[6] c/o Lincoln of Racine, with copies to Langenwalter, Jarosz, and Dyer, demanding that the September 30 letter be withdrawn, and threatening action under the laws of Wisconsin, or an unspecified lawsuit.[7]

[3] Other corporate officials who were mentioned in this hearing were Joy Moy, executive director of Lincoln Lutheran and in charge of all its facilities, and Carol Jarosz, corporate administrator of human resources.

[4] The LPNs and aides have been, since 1976, part of an overall collective-bargaining unit certified by the Board and represented by Local 150, Service and Hosptial Workers, AFL–CIO. The RNs were specifically excluded from this unit.

[5] The difference in Arena's hours from the Center's established shifts is explained by the fact that RNs and LPNs worked sometimes on a "short shift," from 3 to 9 p.m. on the second shift, for example; and sometimes as "long shift" covering the whole 3 to 11 p.m. schedule for the shift. Sometimes part-timers would work a long shift, but there is no indication that full-timers worked short shifts, with the exception of Sue Barney, the second-shift coordinator.

[6] As noted above, Joy Moy is and was the executive director of Lincoln Lutheran and, as such, ranking above Langenwalter.

[7] Apparently there was a civil suit filed in state court that was dismissed by the Racine County Circuit Court and was, at the time of this hearing, on appeal.

After this letter was sent, Duane Arena had lunch with another local lawyer named Robert Riegelman, who was also a member of Respondent's board of directors. The two lawyers agreed that it might be well if the parties to the dispute, Lincoln Lutheran and Mrs. Arena, could talk about the problems raised by Arena's activities and Lincoln Lutheran's response. Accordingly, she arranged a series of meetings with Executive Director Joy Moy in the late fall and early winter of 1985. They discussed a number of topics, and at the conclusion of the meetings, Moy arranged to remove the September 30 letter after a 6-month period.[8]

Arena had been rated by DON Dyer in February 1985, and again on September 5, 1985, prior to the September 30 warning or the September 23 meeting. In each of these written evaluations, she had been rated "average" on almost all of the 60 or more printed categories on the rating form.[9] Then, on January 20, 1986, Arena was rated, this time on a revised form that took more of a narrative form than the forms used in the 1985 ratings. Arena protested this evaluation and had a series of meetings with Dyer and ADON Judy Suter on this protest. By the time they had their fourth meeting it was evident from Arena's testimony[10] that there was a lot of tension, and even dislike, between she and Dyer. As it turned out, a new evaluation was prepared with revisions (which seemed to me mainly cosmetic) that satisfied Arena, and this incident blew over.

Arena encountered no further problems during the remainder of the winter of 1985 and up until July 1986. On July 9 the Center held a meeting described by Director of Human Resources Carol Jarosz as being for all RNs, "and other department supervisors." Jarosz attended as did a Lincoln Lutheran lawyer, Arthur Beck. The purpose of the meeting was to discuss the recently negotiated collective-bargaining agreement between Lincoln Lutheran and Local 150. Beck, who had represented Lincoln Lutheran at the negotiations that led up to the agreement, and Jarosz who was chairman of the Center's bargaining team in these negotiations, reviewed the agreement, pointing out duties, rights, and responsibilities for supervisory staff contained in the document.

As Beck explained the terms of the contract, Arena proceeded to ask questions concerning matters such as what would the RNs do in case of a strike; whether the bargaining unit employees had been offered a pay cut; and comments to the effect that the unit employees worked hard, they contributed greatly to the fine reputation Lincoln Lutheran enjoyed, and concerning layoff of aides. Arena's questions and comments were described by Jarosz as a "challenge" to Beck's explanations, and as "heckling" by Reverend Jane Lantis, a Lutheran minister and the chaplain at Lincoln Lutheran, who was present and sitting next to Arena at this meeting.[11]

Jarosz held another meeting on September 24 with RNs at the Center. This time the topic was "positive ways to discipline." This may seem anomalous, but Jarosz explained that she was trying to explain to the nurses ways to coach people, counsel them, and to develop and follow progressive disciplinary methods as a team. According to Jarosz, Arena asked a number of questions dealing with questions of phasing out limited part-time nurses, rotation of hours, assignment of hours by seniority, and other matters. Jarosz testified that Arena continued to press her questions even though Jarosz gave answers that she felt should have settled the issues. They spent so much time on these questions that the time alloted for the meeting ran out before Jarosz was able to complete her agenda.

On October 14, Elaine Dyer held a meeting of RNs and LPNs to discuss changes in paperwork and in summary care of patients. Some time into the meeting, Arena asked if there would be an opportunity at that time to bring up concerns of nurses. Dyer responded that they would if they had time. After another 26 or 30 minutes, Arena again asked if they could discuss "concerns, because we had several." Finally, about 5 minutes before the meeting was scheduled to adjourn, Dyer asked if there were any questions. Arena said that it was "obvious to me that we had no more time, certainly to open up nursing concern issues" and asked if they could set up another meeting to discuss these issues. A conversation ensued in which Arena kept pressing to have a meeting and Dyer was driven to respond first that she did not think it was possible; to remarking that Langenwalter was out of town; to an excuse that they did not have room available and that they had no money to pay nurses for attending such a meeting. Arena and "a couple of the other nurses" said that they did not need to be paid, that they would come on their own time. Dyer finally agreed that they could find a place to meet. He asked Arena what she wanted on the agenda. Arena replied that she did not think they needed an agenda. Dyer pressed her on that point and Arena cited an example of exchange (of shifts) policy. The meeting then adjourned.

After this meeting broke up Arena and Dyer continued their discussion in the corridor, outside the meeting room. The conversation centered on Arena's concerns for the policy of hours available for limited part-time RNs. They apparently disagreed on this as well as other issues, and I am led to believe that the discussion became rather acrimonious.[12]

Both before and after the October 14 meeting, Arena had contacted and continued to contact other RNs and [8] Langenwalter testified that this was done.

[9] The copies of these forms in the record are almost illegible, particularly in respect to the numerical ratings. While I was able to get the overall sense of the exhibits, it would have been helpful if the copies were checked more closely before being submitted as a part of the record.

[10] Dyer did not testify in this proceeding.

[11] Katherine Arena's description of this meeting shows that it was not her intention to challenge nor to heckle. In her view, Beck encouraged interruptions for questions at any time, and her questions were merely requests for clarification of some of the issues in the contract. However, see my comments on Arena's testimony, below.

[12] I have based these findings on the several meetings in July, September, and October 1986, from Arena's testimony, which I found generally credible, although marked with emotions, impressions, and extraneous matters.

LPNs to survey the problems and attitudes of others and to work up subjects to bring up at various meetings.

Arena worked over the weekend of October 18 and 19. She looked for a notice for the promised nurses meeting but did not see any. In talking with other nurses she found not only that there had been no notice of such a meeting, but that Dyer had been calling nurses in individually for meetings.

On Monday, October 20, Arena called Dyer and asked if she had changed her mind about the nurses' meeting. Dyer replied that she had not changed her mind, but had decided to meet with the nurses "to talk about their concerns on a one to one level rather than in a group setting." Arena began to argue, accusing Dyer of going back on her word and suggesting that Joy Moy had said they were to have monthly meetings to discuss nurses' concerns. The conversation continued for a while, and finally Dyer asked Arena to come in for the meeting on October 22.

On October 22, Arena arrived, met with Dyer, and was told that Langenwalter wanted to see her. Langenwalter then handed her a letter of discharge. He refused to discuss this letter with Arena, telling her that it was self-explanatory and, after some argument, she left the premises.

C. Concerted Activity

The record seems abundantly clear that Arena, while she may have had personal and individual reasons for some of her concerns over working conditions at the Center, recognized that hours for limited part times, exchange policies, and the possible phasing out of the limited part-time category had broader application. She must have had some conversation on matters of mutual concern to get six or seven other nurses down to her husband's office in September 1985.

Arena testified, credibly, that she had talked to other nurses both before and after the October 14 meetings about the very things she raised at that meeting, and undertook to force Dyer into further group discussion of these issues at another meeting. After having observed Arena closely while she testified at this proceeding, I find it inconceivable that she had never discussed her concerns with her fellow workers. Accordingly, I find that Arena was engaged in concerted activity with her coworkers in September and October 1986, on matters of common interest, and she was not expressing only her own individual concerns at that time. See Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493 (1983).

D. Reasons for the Discharge

During the course of the hearing, I made the comments that management may have viewed Arena as a "Pest." In his brief the General Counsel described her as a "gadfly" to management. Daniel Langenwalter talked about a series of events that he said led to Arena's discharge. He included what he termed her fundamental disagreement with the direction of Elaine Dyer, the director of nursing; her inability to accept general direction; her public arguments about orders and policies, scheduling, absentee-tardiness policy, administration of the Local 150 contract, and exchanging or swapping shifts. He complained that she would not stop talking and arguing at meetings; she would not accept answers to her questions provided by management; and management reached a point, after the October 20 telephone conversation between Arena and Elaine Dyer, in which the former accused the DON of going back on her word, of that this was the last straw. Dyer talked to Langenwalter. He, in turn, talked to Carol Jarosz and Joy Moy. They all concurred that Arena should be discharged and she was.

As I have indicated, I took the opportunity presented by her lengthy stay on the witness stand to observe Arena, and her demeanor, carefully. She is obviously well-educated, well-spoken, articulate, confident, and persuasive. I did get the impression of zealotry beneath a composed and calm exterior. But this was manifested primarily in Arena's efforts in her testimony to be complete, to include in her description of events not only what was said, but what background influenced the participants, and what they thought and felt, as well as what they said. It was necessary, on a number of occasions during her testimony for the General Counsel, and also myself, to caution her about going beyond the boundaries of the matters she was eloquently describing. I did not discern in her demeanor the confrontational aspect or the "heckling" ascribed to her by some witnesses, but I can see that her attitude could, under certain circumstances, be tenacious and annoying if not abrasive.

I saw also, in Arena, a person who is vitally concerned with fairness and justice not only for her peers, but also for those with less education and training. This is not to say that Langenwalter or Dyer was an advocate for unfairness or injustice. But they had their own framework within which fairness and justice would be administered through themselves and their supervisory staff. Because Arena was considered by them to be a part of that supervisory staff, she was required to conform to the procedures and policies of Lincoln Lutheran. If she was a supervisor, then Respondent had every right to her loyalty and adherence to supervisory procedures set down by management.

For her part, Arena seemed to regard herself not so much as a supervisor, but an advocate for her fellow RNs, for LPNs, aides, and patients. It is undisputed that Arena sought to bring up her concerns at meetings. It is clear, also, that she consulted with others. She was criticized for discussing what went on at a management meeting with an aide, and she was noted for allowing an aide to voice her discontent in a public area. She testified that she discussed her concerns with other nurses before and after the October 14 meeting.

It seems to me significant, however, that with all the matters that Langenwalter enumerated as leading up to Arena's discharge, it was not until she pressed Elaine Dyer for a group meeting, or discussion of mutual concerns, that the decision was made to discharge her.[13] I do not need to make a finding based on these facts, but if Arena was not a supervisor, there is substantial evidence to warrant a finding that her discharge was prompted, at least in part, by her efforts to persuade management to sit down with the RNs as a group, albeit an unorganized group, to discuss conditions of employment at the Center.

The case thus comes down to a question of whether Arena was a supervisor under Section 2(11) of the Act, or was an employee entitled to the protections of Section 7 of the Act. If she was a supervisor, her discharge, even though it was prompted by her concerted activities, would not constitute a violation of the Act;[14] if she was not, then the discharge would be a violation.

E. The Supervisory Question

1. Company policy and procedure

In considering the question of whether Arena and her fellow registered nurses are supervisors as defined in the Act, I have broken the evidence down into two types of categories. The first, which is discussed in this section, deals with the official position of Lincoln Lutheran as set out in its policies and procedures, and in its official treatment of its registered nurse employees; and the second looks at the actual duties, functions, and responsibilities of the RNs.

First, I note the representation case filed by Local 150 on October 20, 1975, requested certification in a unit composed of "all regular full-time and regular part-time employees working 16 or more hours per week." Specifically excluded from this petition were "supervisors, confidential employees, office clerical employees, registered nurses and guards . . . . "In his Decision and Direction of Election, the former Regional Director for Region 30 did not mention the registered nurses, and they were duly excluded from the unit certified on February 9, 1976. When the Becker and Shoop facilities were merged in 1982, Lincoln Lutheran applied the existing certification to the merged employee group. There is no indication in the record that there was ever any attempt to amend the certification to include the registered nurses, nor is there any evidence that a petition was ever filed for a separate unit of registered nurses.

The job description signed by Arena at the time of her appointment in April 1983 provides that, as a staff nurse, she will assist with supervision and management of the unit (to which she is assigned) including personnel assignments. Further, in the absence of the director of nursing and assistant director of nursing, the RN with the "highest seniority" is to be the "supervising nurse."[15] Duties for this position include supervising the assignments of all nursing personnel.

The employee handbooks that were received in evidence at this hearing are not much help. On one hand, the handbook was used by Langenwalter to warn Arena for not using the complaint procedures contained in the handbook. On the other hand, provisions for the wearing of uniforms cover only aides, and not LPNs or RNs.[16]

All of these institutional positions are somewhat equivocal and not entirely clear regarding the status of the registered nurses. However, the evidence becomes clearer regarding statements by management officials to the RNs and to other employees. There is no question but that RNs were designated as supervisors.[17] They were required to attend management meetings together with department heads. They were consulted on their views regarding upcoming negotiations with Local 150. They were called to meetings to discuss the results of those negotiations. They attended meetings to discuss supervisory techniques, administration of progressive discipline, and other matters that in any context, are supervisory in nature. Officially, registered nurses were authorized to evaluate other employees,[18] to transfer or reassign, and to recommend disciplinary action.

2. Company practice

In practice the indicia of authority with which management has attempted to clothe the registered nurses is less clear. There is no doubt from the testimony of registered nurses, Merle Donahue, Wanda Childers, Sandrie Baugrud, Kathryn Anderson, and Arena herself, that the RNs had authority to direct the work of aides working on their shift, and to report these aides to Dyer or her assistant, Judy Suter, if they did not perform their duties in a manner, as described by Arena, "up to Lincoln Lutheran Standards of expectation." Donahue testified about a written warning that she issued to an aide several years before, and Childers testified that she recommended that an aide named Janette Hopkins be dismissed, and Hopkins was dismissed. Childers also stated that she made a recommendation for transfer of an aide named Tom Sura, but that recommendation was not followed.

Marjorie Smith, a former aide at the Center, testified that she was chief steward for Local 150 in 1986 and 1987. She stated that she worked on the second shift and that it was the practice for aides to go first to Sue Barney, the PM coordinator, with problems. If Barney was unavailable, then to a full-time RN, then to a part-time RN. On complaints presented by employees to [14] There is no evidence here that the rule outlined in Parker-Robb Chevrolet, 262 NLRB 402 (1982), would apply. See also Pontiac Osteopathic Hospital, 284 NLRB 442 (1987).

[15] The record shows that the DON and ADON ordinarily work the first shift approximately 7 a.m. to 3 p.m. This would, of course, have left the other two shifts with only RNs present up to the fall of 1985, when Sue Barney was appointed as "PM Coordinator," working from about 3 to about 9 p.m.

[16] It is also noted that RNs are hourly rated employees, not exempt from overtime requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act. They keep time records on an hour system, unlike other employees who punch time-clocks.

[17] All the registered nurses who testified about the issue agreed that they were told they were supervisors.

[18] While the General Counsel alleges that evaluations have not been shown to have any "effect on wages or employment status" of aides, he overlooks provisions of the Local 150 contract for transfer, reassignment, and promotion, where it is clear that Lincoln Lutheran could use the results of evaluations to affect probationary status or to deny requested actions; subject, of course, to the grievance and arbitration procedures of the contract.

Smith as a steward, Smith said she had been told to bring these up with Barney or one of the full-time RNs.

Cynthia David, another former aide, testified that it was the practice if an aide had a personal problem and wanted to be excused, to see the long-shift nurse, even though that person might be an LPN. David was not aware of any aide being sent home or suspended by a shift nurse. She did, however, state that she viewed all registered nurses as part of the management team, and noted that aides did receive guidance on what to do and how to do it from the RNs.

Arena testified that she did not think she had authority to allow employees to leave early, pointing out an occasion when she was told that not to allow aides to leave their posts to go out to the parking lot to warm up their cars. She also pointed out an instance where she felt obliged to consult Judy Suter, ADON, by telephone when confronted with a request by an aide to leave early. Arena also pointed out that with the appointment of Sue Barney as PM coordinator, Sue would handle difficult problems, and the full-time RNs would take care of the matters. The part-time nurse, like Arena, would then have little if any authority over problems. However, Arena also said that she had authority over the work of three or four aides, had authority to direct the work of these aides, and had equal authority with the charge nurse[19] to allow people to go home early and to handle medical problems of patients.

On evaluations of aides, Arena and other part-timers had done this, at least up to the early part of 1985. At that time, Elaine Dyer had told the staff that, henceforth, full-timers were invited to participate in the process and provide impact. Wanda Childers, a part-time RN on the third shift, testified that as late as July 1986, she had evaluated an aide on her shift. As Childers pointed out when questioned about calling in employees that "somebody had to do it."

Conclusions

All of this testimony shows that there may be differences in the perception of individuals about their levels of authority and responsibility depending on whether a registered nurse is full-time or part-time; working a long or short shift; or working first, second, or third shifts. However, I am convinced that the evidence shows that all registered nurses, whether full-time or part-time, long shift or short shift, from whatever shift, are described as supervisors; are considered by aides to be part of the management team; and have authority to assign and direct the work of the aides on their shift, using independent administrative as well as professional judgment. They have authority to call people in, to allow people to leave early, and to send people home. They have authority to recommend disciplinary action and, whether their recommendations are followed, there is testimony, by Arena and Wanda Childers, that higher management accepts the underlying facts on which those recommendations are based. They have authority to evaluate employees, even though the part-timers may voluntarily participate in the evaluation process. There is no indication in the record that evaluations so made have any less impact upon the final result of the evaluation process.

Accordingly, I find that Katherine Arena, along with the other registered nurses at the Becker-Shoop Center, is a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, and that her discharge on October 22, 1986, did not violate the Act. California Beverage Co., 283 NLRB 328 (1987); St. Alphonsus Hospital, 261 NLRB 620 (1982); Sutter Community Hospitals of Sacramento, 227 NLRB 181 (1976); Greenbrier Valley Hospital, 265 NLRB 1056 (1982); and cases cited therein.

Conclusions of Law

1. The Company, Lincoln Lutheran of Racine, Wisconsin, Inc., is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Company has not committed any unfair labor practices under the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[20]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[19] Lincoln Lutheran does not have a category of charge nurses, the usual term for a nurse in charge of a shift or an area, but on each shift, one nurse's name is marked with an atserisk. That designates the nurse in charge of the shift.

[20] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On April 30, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Robert T. Wallace issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] and to adopt the recommended Order.[4]

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] We agree with the judge that a bargaining order to remedy the Respondent's misconduct is warranted under NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969). The Respondent's unfair labor practice conduct included telling employees that others would be discharged for union activities, creating the impression of surveillance, coercive interrogations, the promise and grant of benefits, and multiple threats of discharge, loss of jobs, loss of overtime, change of operations, and plant closure. The severity of these instances of misconduct is underscored by the Respondent's unlawful discharge of eight union supporters. The seriousness of the misconduct is further underscored by the fact that the misconduct was in large part committed by the owner and his sons in a family-run business and that the misconduct was personally directed at over 25 percent of the unit. In addition, the Respondent's misconduct occurred for the most part within days of the employees' commencing active solicitation for Teamsters and Chauffeurs Local 525.

The Respondent's misconduct was swift, pervasive, and severe. We are convinced that the misconduct is the type that has lingering effects and that is not readily dispelled by traditional remedies or time. Accordingly, we agree with the judge that an election would not reliably reflect genuine uncoerced employee sentiment. Kona 60 Minute Photo, 277 NLRB 867 (1985); Quality Aluminum Products, 278 NLRB 338 (1986); Reno Hilton, 282 NLRB 819 (1987).

[4] The judge ordered the Respondent to cease and desist from granting certain benefits to induce employees to reject union representation. Nothing in that Order or in our Decision and Order should be construed as requiring the Respondent to vary or abandon those benefits.

In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Paul Mayfield d/b/a Mayfield Produce Co., Staunton, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Mary J. Tobey, Esq., for the General Counsel.
John J. Murphy Jr., Esq. and Henry W. Sledz Jr., Esq. (Kovar, Nelson & Brittain), of Chicago, Illinois, for the Respondent.
Nancy M. Watkins, Esq. (Wiley, Craig, Armbruster & Wilburn), of St. Louis, Missouri, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

ROBERT T. WALLACE, Administrative Law Judge. On a charge and an amended charge filed by the above-named Union on 27 June and 2 August 1985, respectively, a complaint was issued on 2 August 1985, as amended, in which it is alleged that Respondent Paul Mayfield d/b/a Mayfield Produce Co. violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act by discharging eight employees[1] for supporting the Union in an organizing drive. It is also alleged that Respondent committed numerous independent violations of Section 8(a)(1) through coercive interrogations, unlawful surveillances, threats, and promises of benefits;[2] and a bargaining order is sought.

The case was tried before me on 16 through 20 September 1985 at St. Louis, Missouri. On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

Findings of Fact and Determinations of Alleged Violations of Section 8(a)(1)

Respondent is engaged in the nonretail sale and distribution of fresh produce from two facilities located in Illinois near Staunton. During a representative 12-month period ending 31 July 1985,[3] it purchased and received at those facilities products valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Illinois. It admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

Respondent Company is owned by Paul Mayfield and, admittedly, he and his sons (Dave, Tim, Larry, and Dennis) are supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. In that role they were aided by "leadmen" Dave Ellis, Roger Leetham, and Ray Haynes who, according to the Mayfields, regularly relayed their instructions regarding company policies and work assignments to other employees, evaluated the performance of other employees, and were authorized to issue verbal reprimands to other employees.

[2] The General Counsel requests permission to withdraw three of these allegations (5m, n, and o), stating that no evidence was presented in support thereof. This unopposed request is granted.

At all pertinent times Respondent had 51 employees not including office clericals and Mayfield family members. The 51 work as drivers, warehousemen, produce sorters, and salad room employees. Their assignments, however, are informal as they are frequently transferred from one job to another. For example, loaders and palletmen often become drivers and/or assist drivers on their routes, sorters regularly help load trucks, and all employees from time to time are called on to assist the sorters.

In mid-April leadman and loader Jeffrey Knezik reported for work about 7 a.m. While they were awaiting job assignments, Dave Mayfield came over to where they were standing. He told them that "we" (i.e., the Mayfields) were going to talk to the foremen[4] because "the union representative might be coming by"; and he went on to say that "before we go union . . . [the Mayfields] were going to pay union wages." I find the latter statement to be an unlawful promise of benefits to forestall unionization.

On 19 May three drivers (Holland, Johnson, and William Rothe) met with Union Representative Charles Bryson and discussed how to conduct an organizing drive. At the end of the meeting Bryson urged them to pursue the matter with an agent (Dale Stewart) of Local 525.[5] Accompanied by a fourth driver (James Tiepelman) they met with Stewart on 23 June. After hearing their complaints about low wages and lack of medical insurance and job security, he gave them further instructions on the mechanics of organizing; and he also passed out a quantity of blank authorization cards. An active solicitation effort ensued, and by 26 June the Union had in its possession 31 signed cards.

James Missey was hired as a driver by Respondent on 21 June. On the following morning he was on the loading dock awaiting arrival of the driver he was to ride with that day. He was standing next to Tim Mayfield and leadman Ellis and heard the former tell the latter that there would be a union at the Company only over "their [the Mayfields] dead bodies," and he went on to say that if necessary they would prevent unionization by running the company with family members only. Those statements constitute an unlawful threat to discharge or lay off employees if they chose to be represented by a union. They also are coercive in that they convey an impression that Respondent would do anything, legal or otherwise, to keep a union out. Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472, 475 (1982).

On finishing his shift 24 June, Barnes was called into the office, where Dave Mayfield asked if he had heard anything about the Union. Receiving no response, Mayfield told him that he had heard "through the grapevine" that Barnes had participated in a discussion about the Union at his stepfather's (Butler's) house. Again Barnes said nothing, whereupon Mayfield stated, "We heard your dad is the main cause of this and its usually the new truck drivers[6] that try to start something . . . . All us Mayfields have to do [to defeat the Union] is drop the produce trucks, and the warehouse and everything, and just sell . . . [tomatoes to] McDonalds. So tell . . . [Butler] if he values his job, just to drop it." The interview ended with Mayfield pointing out that another produce company had gone out of business because of unionization. I find the interview unlawful for several reasons. Barnes was not an open union supporter and the questioning was patently intimidating. Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984), enfd. sub nom. Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 11 v. NLRB, 760 F.2d 1006 (9th Cir. 1985). In addition, Mayfield's "grapevine" comment created an impression that employees' union activities were under surveillance. Further, his remarks entail proscribed threats to change operations and to fire Butler to defeat unionization.

On the next day, just as Butler got out of his truck after finishing his route, leadman Ellis took him aside and warned him that earlier in the day Dave Mayfield said he was going to fire Butler for holding secret union meetings at home. The statement is patently coercive in that it conveys a threat to discharge an employee for engaging in protected concerted action. It also creates an impression of surveillance of activities on behalf of the Union. In this connection I find that Ellis, although not shown to be a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, nevertheless was an agent of Respondent because he was regularly used as a conduit for relaying instructions and policies of management and reasonably could be viewed by employees as speaking on Respondent's behalf. Roskin Bros., 274 NLRB 413 (1985); B-P Custom Building Products, 251 NLRB 1337, 1338 (1980). And that result is not affected by the circumstance that Ellis may have acted on his own initiative and out of friendship for Butler.

Potocki was one of 12 employees who regularly worked in the "tomato room" grading and crating tomatoes by color (ripeness). By 26 June he had signed an authorization card and had persuaded seven coworkers in the tomato room to do so; and he had returned all the cards to Johnson. That morning he was approached on the job by Leadman Haynes who told him, "truck drivers were being fired and . . . the company would fold up before they allowed a union in." Later in the day Haynes came back and told him that one of the drivers who had been fired was "your buddy Mike [Johnson]," and he suggested that Potocki should "ask Mike what the Union had got him now." To Potocki's inquiry about why they were being fired, Haynes replied, "I don't know what reasons were given, but it was for union activities . . . for trying to get a union in." For reasons expressed above concerning Leadman Ellis, I find that Haynes acted as an agent of Respondent in communicating unlawful threats of discharge and plant closure.

[4] As used by the Mayfield's the term "foremen" includes leadmen.

[5] About a week later driver Butler invited to his home a group of dockmen and sorters (Barnes, Hay, Hall, Simburger, and John Wells) and told them about the contact made by the drivers with the Union. There followed a general discussion of the pros and cons of unionizations.

[6] At this time Butler had been employed by Respondent for about 2-1/2 months.

By the end of the workday on 26 June, Respondent had discharged all the alleged discriminatees (except Potocki) for asserted disparate reasons. Dennis Mayfield told Johnson that the insurance company "had lowered the boom on us last night so you can't drive anymore." Tim Mayfield informed Holland "they" were going to have to let him go on advice of their insurer because of a traffic ticket he received in January, and also because he was "unaccessible" when needed for driving a night (mushroom) route. Butler too was terminated by Tim Mayfield because of an incident occurring about a month before when he had damaged a fender by backing into a pole. Barnes and Hall both worked on "parts," i.e., they filled orders for less than full cases of produce. They were dismissed by Dave Mayfield who told them they had failed to properly rotate produce. He also mentioned that Dennis Mayfield's 12-year-old son, Mark, had been hired to replace Barnes. Hay and Simberger worked on the dock loading and unloading trucks. Dave Mayfield approached them separately but conveyed the same message to each: their services were no longer required because he was replacing them with relatives. He added: "You know this is a family run business."

Driver Tiepelman returned to the plant late in the afternoon on 26 June. Larry and Dennis Mayfield were standing nearby. As Tiepelman passed by, Larry invited him to say something about the Union, adding he heard Tiepelman was a "ring leader." When Tiepelman denied having had anything to do with the Union, Larry stated, "You're supposed to have that barbeque in Livingston for a Union meeting." Tiepelman replied that his barbeque had a purely social purpose. Larry then said that if there were "anymore things brought up about . . . [Tiepelman's involvement with] the Union's," they were going to let him go. I find the interrogation to involve coercion, communication of a threat, and creating an impression of surveillance—all in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

On reporting to work at 8 a.m. on 27 June, Potocki was called into the office, where Larry Mayfield told him he was being laid off. Asked why, Larry explained that three cases bearing Potocki's initials and containing an unusually high ratio of bad tomatoes (15 to 20 out of 80 per case) had been discovered at a customer's facility and that a contract had been lost because of it.[7]

Driver Rothe arrived at work that morning about 2 hours before Potocki. As he entered the office to punch in, Larry asked him if he had heard anything about a union, adding "I know you are an old union man so I figure you might know something." Rothe replied yes he did know something and volunteered, "Tiepelman came to my house last night and is pretty freaked out . . . because he said you guys threatened to fire him . . . as an instigator of the Union." Larry responded, "Yeah, we have to get this thing straightened out because . . . we can't have a union in here telling us what to do . . . if it persists we will end up dropping off a bunch of routes and . . . the family will just run the place from then on . . . [and] we might be better off that way . . . [and] make more money." Larry also inquired whether Rothe (who had signed an authorization card and solicited other employees to do so) had been approached by anyone. Rothe responded, "No." About 4 p.m., having completed his route, Rothe again went to the office. Dennis and Tim Mayfield were there. Rothe replied that he would just repeat what he had told Larry that morning: that Tiepelman said he had been threatened with discharge for acting as an instigator of the Union. Tim responded: "Yeah, Jim Tiepelman is a troublemaker." Rothe replied: "I don't know Jim all that well so I couldn't really tell you one way or another." Dennis then opined that he could not understand "these guys," why they wanted to picket the place, especially because one of them (Holland) recently had been allowed to work overtime so that he could pay for a motorcycle. I find the a.m. and p.m. inquiries both involve coercive interrogation as to protected union activities. In addition, I find Larry Mayfield's observation that routes would be eliminated to be an implied threat to lay off or discharge employees for engaging in protected concerted activities.

On the morning of Friday, 28 June, Respondent received a copy of a petition in which the Union asked the Board to order a representation election at the plant. At 6 p.m. that day, Respondent called a special meeting of drivers. Nearly all of a total of 19 drivers were present. Each was given a two-page typewritten "Drivers Guide" which, in addition to a restatement of applicable standards of conduct and appearance, contained two new announcements: (1) that in the future the company would provide uniforms and caps at no cost to the drivers,[8] and (2) that a bonus program had been established for them. Dennis Mayfield commented on both items, and with respect to the latter he stated that under the bonus program each driver could earn as much as $35 per week. Respondent's insurance broker David Alender (a son-in-law of Paul Mayfield) also talked to the drivers. He said that if they were interested he would have an expert come and speak to them about a group medical/life insurance plan during the regular monthly drivers' meeting on the following Monday, 1 July. The drivers agreed; and at the Monday meeting all opted to sign up for the plan. I find that the conferring of these new benefits, timed just after Respondent received formal notification that an election was in the offing and hard on the heels of a series of unlawful interrogations and threats as well as the discharge of eight known union supporters, was an unlawful offer of benefits intended to induce employees to reject the Union. Compare NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405, 409 (1964), in which the Court stated, "The danger inherent in well-timed increases in benefits is the suggestion of a fist inside the velvet glove. Employees are not likely to miss the inference that the source of benefits not conferred is also the source from which future benefits must follow and which may dry up if it is not obliged." Here, the circumstance that at least two of the benefits had been under consideration (Alender had obtained bids from several insurers during a 3-month period beginning in December 1984; and the Mayfields previously had "talked about" extending to the drivers a bonus plan similar to one effectuated for loaders in March or April) lacks significance because Respondent failed to provide any indication concerning why it chose this particular time to confer benefits. See Litton Dental Products, 221 NLRB 700, 701 (1975).

[7] At the trial Larry testified (Tr. 659) that it was not until 5 July that the customer told him the contract was to be terminated.

[8] Although Respondent had not deducted a $5 weekly uniform rental fee from driver paychecks since payroll period ending 6 June, it was in the process of changing suppliers and drivers had received no assurance that fees would not be resumed on 1 July, the effective date of a contract with a new supplier.

On the evening of 30 June, Simberger and Barnes approached leadman Leetham in the driveway of his home. Leetham said he did not want to talk, adding that he would probably get fired if he was seen with them. On being pressed by Simburger about why "we" were fired, Leetham was silent for a couple of seconds and then said: "If you go messing with the Union that is it." As in the case of Leadmen Ellis and Haynes, Leetham is shown to have been vested with an appearance of speaking authoritatively on behalf of management and, as alleged, I find his statement that employees were discharged in retaliation for union activities to be binding on Respondent and unlawful.

Paul Mayfield addressed the drivers at the meeting on 1 July. In his words:

> I started out saying I hear or see that you . . . want a union. To me it is legal and it is your choice . . . I said now boys you know that when you . . . came to get your jobs we told you just how much we would give you and you agreed with that . . . I also told them now you know that this business is very competitive . . . . If we will charge $.25 more we won't have . . . [customers] and any added expense could cause us to lose business, lose customers. We wouldn't be able to sell things. If we can't sell them, we can't put it on the truck, can't deliver it, that would affect the . . . routes and also . . . [I mentioned] that we had some routes that were marginal. We were trying to hang on to them and economically it wouldn't help us if we had more expense.

Three employees (Rothe, Crainick, and Tiepelman) each testified that Paul Mayfield was more explicit. They claim, and I credit their accounts, that he told them that overtime and routes probably would have to be cut if a union came in. I find that comment unlawful. Although an employer can make predictions about precise effects resulting from unionization, he must go further and provide an adequate factual basis why such consequences are probable and beyond his control. Engineered Control Systems, 274 NLRB 1308 (1985); Bacchus Wine Cooperative, 251 NLRB 1552, 1559 (1980). Here, there is no indication that employees were given anything more than the rambling discourse quoted above; and, in that circumstance, I find Paul Mayfield's prediction is simply a veiled threat to cut off overtime and to lay off employees if they chose the Union. Fred Lewis Carpets, 260 NLRB 843, 849 (1982); Virginia Apparel Corp., 264 NLRB 207, 210 (1982). The coercive nature of Mayfield's speech is intensified when viewed in the context of Respondent's threats of plant closure and discharge as well as the actual discharges. Grove Valve & Regulator Co., 262 NLRB 285 (1982).

Within a short time after 27 June, Respondent hired 16 new employees, not including the hire of 12-year old Mark Mayfield. All 16 were on a part-time (2 or 3 days a week) basis pursuant to a newly established policy. When David Mayfield was asked at the trial why the policy had been changed at that particular time, the following exchange occurred:

> A. It works better.
> Q. Why is that?
> A. Experience proves it that it has.
> Q. Why?
> A. I don't know. They [part-time employees] come in for shorter amounts of time. They are more alert. They are more on time. They don't come in drunk.

That response, however, stands in sharp contrast to his earlier testimony that newly hired part-time loaders "come and go so fast I don't remember [their hire dates] . . . . They are part-time. They find other work." Also, he explained that a part-time loader had worked only a short time and was fired because "he came in drunk three nights." Based on the record as a whole, I conclude that a more likely reason for the policy change was Respondent's perception that part-time workers are less apt to take a proprietary view of their jobs and join unions.

Credibility Determinations

The violations of Section 8(a)(1) cited above are based on testimony of employees that I find internally and mutually consistent; and to have been rendered candidly and without animosity. I also note that two of the employees (Rothe and Crainick) have continued in Respondent's employ and the credibility of their adverse testimony is enhanced by the fact that it was given at considerable risk. Bohemia, Inc., 266 NLRB 761, 764 fn. 13 (1983); Shop-Rite Supermarket, 231 NLRB 500, 505 fn. 22 (1977). Also at risk was another witness (Missy) who had been laid off on 30 July and had hopes of being recalled. Two others (Knezik and Tiepelman) had voluntarily terminated their employment with Respondent and so stand to gain nothing financially from their testimony in this proceeding. As to the alleged discriminatees, their testimony regarding 8(a)(1) violations (with one exception)[9] relates solely to uncontroverted statements of Leadmen Ellis, Haynes, and Leetham. Respondent offered no explanation why those individuals failed to testify, and that circumstance warrants an inference that, if called, their testimony would be corroborative. The same conclusion applies to statements of Tim and David Mayfield alleged to have been uttered in the presence of Leetham and Ellis. Antenna Department West, 266 NLRB

[9] I have accepted as true Barnes' testimony regarding his conversation with David Mayfield on 24 June based on a favorable impression of his credibility vis-a-vis that of David, coupled with the fact that the account is consistent with a pattern of conduct on Respondent's part depicted in the testimony of other witnesses.

909, 912 (1983); Castle Instant Maintenance/Maid, 256 NLRB 130, 135 (1981); American Chain Link Fence Co., 255 NLRB 692, 693 fn. 4 (1981).

The Discharges

The testimony of the eight dischargees regarding the reasons given them for their respective terminations is substantially undisputed.[10] Indeed, the Mayfields claim that the decision to effect the discharges for those reasons was a collective one and was arrived at wholly apart from consideration of any protected activities engaged in by those selected for separation. In my view, however, the evidence amply demonstrates that they were fired precisely and solely because each had supported the Union. In effect I find that the Mayfields' claim is wholly pretextual. Accordingly a detailed Wright Line[11] analysis is unnecessary.

In reaching this conclusion I have in mind: the close proximity of the discharges to the onset of protected union activities and the lack of any adequate exculpatory explanation for the timing; credited testimony that Respondent claimed "grapevine" knowledge of employee activities in support of the Union; overt animus toward union supporters manifested by repeated threats to fire those employees who sided with the Union; and the spurious nature of the reasons offered for the discharges. Concerning the latter, I note (1) that although Johnson, Holland, and Butler were discharged allegedly for faulty driving, Johnson's poor driving record had been compiled prior to his being hired and he had been assured by Dennis Mayfield in mid-March that he could continue driving provided he received no tickets for moving violations, a condition he had fulfilled. Holland's alleged dereliction involved a speeding ticket received 1 month before he was rehired in February, and he had informed Dennis Mayfield of the citation during his rehire interview.[12] Butler's accident was promptly reported by him on the day it happened (6 June) and, on viewing the damaged vehicle, Tim Mayfield told him not to worry because the damage was too slight (under $500) to report to the insurance company and he cautioned him not to let it happen again;[13] (2) that in light of Dave Mayfield's testimony that he walked through the parts department two or three times a night to see how things were going and conducted an after-hours inspection of that area once a week, that he often complimented Hall and Barnes for running "a very neat area," and that he put into effect a $20-a-week bonus for them about 1 week prior to 26 June—I find it more probable than not that any rotten vegetables "discovered" in the parts department on the night of 25 June and for which he fired them on the following day were those the two employees had culled from incoming produce and set aside for return to suppliers pursuant to established procedures; (3) that on the day (27 June) following the discharge of loaders Hay and Simburger, assertedly to replace them with Mayfield relatives, Dave Mayfield hired three nonfamily members—two as part-time loaders and the third as a member of the pallet crew, a job interchangeable with that of loader; and (4) that according to credited testimony of Potocki, Larry Mayfield, on being pressed tacitly, admitted that the real reason for his "layoff" was not bad tomatoes but his dad's orders.

Bargaining Unit/Majority Status

As previously noted, Respondent's work force is composed of 51 employees, including leadmen Ellis, Haynes, and Leetham. The 51 are full-time and regular part-time drivers and warehousemen; and included within the latter category are a number of informal classifications such as produce packers and sorters, salad makers, order fillers, pallet crew, and workers who load and unload trucks. Employees are frequently transferred from one job to another; and their wage rates range from $3.35 to $5 an hour. Regular part-time employees include high school students and they share the same working conditions and terms of employment as full-time employees. Although Respondent has two warehouses they are located within 2 miles of each other. Employees all clock in and out at the same warehouse and they often work at both facilities over the course of a day or week. Labor relations policy is centrally established by the Mayfields and working conditions are virtually the same at both facilities. In these circumstances, I conclude that the drivers and warehousemen, exclusive of Mayfield family members, constitute an appropriate unit for purposes of collective bargaining.[14]

The evidence also shows that 29 employees in that unit had signed authorization cards as of 26 June;[15] and I find all of these cards valid for the purpose of establishing majority status of the Union on that date. In reaching that conclusion I have concluded that Respondent's specific challenges to seven of these cards lack merit for reasons indicated below.

[10] Although certain Mayfields testified to "other" reasons for terminating some of the employees, those reasons were not expressed at the time of the discharges and I am not persuaded that they are anything other than afterthoughts.

[11] Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 445 U.S. 989 (1982).

[12] Another reason given to Holland for his discharge was his inaccessibility when needed on short notice for a "mushroom" run into St. Louis during early morning hours. He had operated that run about four times a week during the month of May pursuant to his request for an extra (i.e., overtime) assignment. I credit his testimony that the run had been awarded another driver in early June, so I find that his asserted inaccessibility had become a moot question at least 3 weeks prior to his discharge.

[13] Tim Mayfield states that he merely told Butler to fill out an accident report; and he claims he made the decision to fire Butler on the spur of the moment after reading a letter (undated) which Dennis Mayfield placed on his desk on 26 June. In the letter, lessor Ryder states that "if . . . [Butler] is involved in another occurrence resulting in property damage, personal injury or is guilty of other reckless or abusive handling of a motor vehicle, we may request he not be permitted to operate a Ryder vehicle." I accept as more plausible, and therefore credit, Butler's testimony about Tim's comments on 6 June as well as his claim that on 26 June Tim said he had no other choice but to let him go because Ryder said he could no longer drive their trucks.

[14] It was stipulated that office clerical employees are appropriately excluded from the unit.

[15] The evidence also shows that two additional cards (neither of which were offered in evidence by the General Counsel) were not signed by the employees (Kenneth Hopper and Gary Mills) whose purported signatures appeared there. Johnson admitted signing Hopper's name but claimed lack of knowledge regarding the false signature of Mills.

The cards of employees Donald (Leroy) and Becky Cook were credibly authenticated by Holland. Respondent does not contend that the signatures thereon are not theirs, nor did it offer any evidence disputing Holland's account. Instead it asserts, without any case citation, "that any card whose authenticity depends even in part upon the testimony of a proven forger and perjurer remains unauthenticated." The statement has reference to the fact that Johnson testified that he had been present when the Cooks signed cards. The short answer here is that in accepting those cards I have relied only on the testimony of Holland and have not had to decide whether Johnson told the truth in this instance.

Employee John Schwartz testified that he signed a card on 23 June and that on the following day he told Johnson to tear it up. Assuming Schwartz did attempt to revoke, that action was ineffective because it was taken after commencement of Respondent's unfair labor practices, and there is a presumption that the requested revocation was a result of the unlawful conduct. Warehouse Groceries Management, 254 NLRB 252 (1981); Air Products & Chemicals, 263 NLRB 341, 352–353 (1982). Indeed, any effort objectively to assess the degree to which Schwartz or any other employee might have been affected by those practices would be speculative at best and, at worst, could result in rewarding wrongdoing.

Several employees (including Ron Phillips, Douglas Missey, Raymond Plenske, and Phillip Lutes) claim they signed cards in order to obtain an election. But subjective intent is not relevant where, as here, the language on the cards[16] is free of ambiguity. Signers plainly designate the Union as their collective-bargaining representative, and they authorize it to use the cards either for purposes of recognition or for an election. Mere use of the disjunctive does not create any ambiguity. Neither does the highlighted caption stating that the card is not an application for membership in the Union. On the contrary, the caption makes clear to signers that they do not have to join the Union in order to obtain collective-bargaining representation or an election. Pedro's Restaurant, 246 NLRB 567, 579 (1979); WCAR, Inc., 203 NLRB 1235, 1246–1247 (1973).[17] In that regard, there is no basis for an assumption that Respondent's employees were too unsophisticated to understand and be bound by what they sign. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969). Further, no signer claims to have been told to disregard the language of the card or that the card would be used solely to obtain an election; and the record is devoid of my implication to that effect. Photo Drive Up, 267 NLRB 329, 363–364 (1983); Cumberland Shoe Corp., 144 NLRB 1268 (1963), enfd. 351 F.2d 917 (6th Cir. 1963).[18]

Bargaining Order

The unfair labor practices found to have been committed by Respondent, including the mass discharge of eight union supporters shortly after commencement of an organizational drive—an action accompanied by prior and subsequent threats of loss of jobs, unlawful interrogations, statements creating impressions of surveillance, and promises (indeed implementations) of increased benefits—are so serious and pervasive that the possibility of erasing their coercive effect and of conducting a fair election by use of traditional remedies is virtually nonexistent. I am aware of no significant mitigating circumstances. On the contrary, the effects of Respondent's acts are magnified because they took place in a relatively small family run business and were perpetrated by the owner and his sons. Thriftway Supermarket, 276 NLRB 1450 (1985); J. Coty Messenger Service, 272 NLRB 268 (1984). Accordingly, I conclude that entry of a bargaining order is appropriate and necessary in this case.

Conclusions of Law

I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act in the particulars and for the reasons stated above, and that it is not shown to have violated that Act in any other respect. I further find that those unfair labor practices and each of them have affected, are affecting, and unless permanently enjoined will continue to affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. And I further find that the following employees of Respondent (the unit) constitute a unit appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time drivers and warehousemen including produce packers and sorters, order fillers, loaders, laborers, receiving and storage and salad room workers, employed by Respondent at its facilities in or near Staunton, Illinois, excluding office clerical and professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

That on or about 26 June 1985, a majority of employees in the unit designated and selected the Union as their representative for purposes of collective bargaining; that since that time the Union, by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act, has been, and is, the exclusive representative of the unit for purposes of collective bargaining regarding wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment; that the unfair labor practices found to have been committed here are so serious and substantial in character that the possibility of erasing their effects and of con-

> I, the undersigned employee of . . . authorize . . . [the Union] to represent me in collective bargaining.

Then comes spaces for identification of signers followed by a prominent (bold-face) notation:

> THIS IS NOT AN APPLICATION FOR MEMBERSHIP
> This card is for use in support of the demand of Teamsters Local Union 525 for recognition or for an N.L.R.B. election.

[17] Although Respondent cites NLRB v. Peterson Bros., 342 F.2d 221, 224 (5th Cir. 1965), for the proposition that language identical to that on the cards involved is ambiguous, the Board in Pedro's Restaurant and WCAR, Inc., supra, appears to take a contrary view; and other circuit courts expressly disagree with the pertinent portion of the Peterson case. See NLRB v. C. J. Glasagow Co., 356 F.2d 476, 478 (7th Cir. 1966), and Auto Workers v. NLRB, 363 F.2d 702 (D.C. Cir. 1966).

[18] Although Respondent does not mention the matter in its brief, Barnes' statement that he did not read the card before signing does not invalidate it as evidence of support for the Union. Sertafilm, 267 NLRB 682, 692 (1983).

ducting a fair election by the use of traditional remedies is slight, and the employees' sentiments regarding representation, having been expressed through authorization cards, would, on balance, be protected better by issuance of a bargaining order than by recourse to traditional remedies.

REMEDY

In addition to the customary cease-and-desist order and requirement for notice posting, my Order will require Respondent (1) to offer unconditional reinstatement to Robert Holland, Michael Johnson, Thomas Butler, Thomas Barnes, Kenneth (Gene) Hay, Lester Hall, Richard Simburger, and Matthew Potocki Jr.; (2) to make them whole for all wages and benefits lost as a result of their unlawful discharge, in accordance with the principles set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977); see generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962); and (3) to recognize and, on request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the unit in regard to terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement.

I conclude that the scope and severity of Respondent's unfair labor practices evince a general disregard for the employees' fundamental statutory rights and warrant a broad cease-and-desist order. Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[19]

ORDER

The Respondent, Paul Mayfield d/b/a Mayfield Produce Co., Staunton, Virginia, its agents, officers, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discouraging membership in the Union, or any other labor organization, by discharging employees or otherwise discriminating in any manner with respect to their tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment.

(b) Threatening employees with discharge, loss of jobs and overtime, and change of operations or plant closure if they select a union as their collective-bargaining representative.

(c) Coercively interrogating employees concerning their or other employees' union activities or sympathies.

(d) Engaging in surveillance of union meetings and activities or creating an impression that it is doing so.

(e) Telling employees that other employees were or would be discharged or otherwise discriminated against because of their union activities.

(f) Promising to give employees health and life insurance coverage, bonuses, free uniforms, and other benefits if they opt to be represented by a union.

(g) Granting employees health and life insurance coverage, bonuses, free uniforms, and other benefits to induce them to opt not to be represented by a union.

(h) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the unit described below with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other conditions of employment, and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a written, signed agreement:

> All full-time and regular part-time drivers and warehousemen including produce packers and sorters, order fillers, loaders, laborers, receiving and storage and salad room workers, employed by it at its facilities in or near Staunton, Illinois, excluding clerical and professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Offer Robert Holland, Michael Johnson, Thomas Butler, Thomas Barnes, Kenneth (Gene) Hay, Lester Hall, Richard Simburger, and Matthew Potocki Jr. immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(c) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges of and failure to reemploy Robert Holland, Michael Johnson, Thomas Butler, Thomas Barnes, Kenneth (Gene) Hay, Lester Hall, Richard Simburger, and Matthew Potocki Jr., and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its facilities in or near Staunton, Illinois, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[20] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 14, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[19] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[20] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act specifically found.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

The National Labor Relations Act gives all employees the following rights.

To engage in self-organization
To form, join, or help unions
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing
To act together for collective-bargaining or other mutual aid or protection
To refrain from any or all of these things.

Chinatown Planning Council, Inc. and Young Shi Lee. Case 2-CA-22244

September 13, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On April 7, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Steven Davis issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions, to modify the remedy,[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Chinatown Planning Council, Inc., New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the administrative law judge.

[1] The judge inadvertently failed to cite F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), for the computation of backpay. The recommended remedy is modified accordingly.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge our employees because they make complaints to us on behalf of their coworkers and themselves regarding working conditions of our employees, or because they circulate petitions among our employees which complain about our employees' wages, hours, and working conditions.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Young Shi Lee immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and WE WILL make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against him, with interest.

WE WILL remove from our files any reference to the unlawful discharge of Young Shi Lee and notify him in writing that this has been done and that the discharge will not be used against him in any way.

CHINATOWN PLANNING COUNCIL, INC.

Leonard Grumbach, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Henry C. Woicik, Esq., of New York, New York, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

STEVEN DAVIS, Administrative Law Judge. Pursuant to a charge filed on 13 May 1987[1] by Young Shi Lee (Lee), a complaint was issued by Region 2 of the National Labor Relations Board on 26 June against Chinatown Planning Council, Inc. (Respondent).

The complaint alleges that Respondent unlawfully discharged Lee because he (a) made complaints to Respondent on behalf of his coworkers and himself regarding working conditions of Respondent's employees and (b) circulated a petition among Respondent's employees that complained about Respondent's wages, hours, and working conditions.

Respondent's answer denied the material allegations of the complaint and raised certain affirmative defenses, and on 30 September and 1 October a hearing was held before me in Brooklyn, New York.

On the entire case, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and after consideration of the letter filed by the General Counsel and brief filed by Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a not-for-profit corporation, having an office and place of business at 456 Broadway, New York City, is a contractor under a contract with the New York City Department of Housing Preservation and Development (HPD). Pursuant to such contract, Respondent provides personnel to rehabilitate, renovate, and repair city-owned real estate. Respondent admits and I find that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[1] All dates hereafter are in 1987 unless otherwise stated.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

Respondent is a "multi-social service, educational and planning agency," serving the Chinatown community with numerous programs, including adult education, day care, youth, and senior citizens' activities and manpower training programs in sewing, clerical careers, jewerly, hotel service, and patternmaking.

The Intercity Remodeling and Apartment Repair (IRAR) is another of Respondent's programs, and the one involved herein. Its purpose is to train the new Chinese immigrant in repair and renovation of buildings owned by the City of New York. The trainee learns the skills necessary to rehabilitate the properties and utilizes those skills to find jobs when he leaves IRAR. The work performed by the trainees includes painting, plastering, installation of walls and ceilings, general maintenance and renovation work, and removal of garbage and debris.

HPD pays Respondent $90 per day per trainee and Respondent pays the trainee an hourly sum, from which taxes and social security payments are deducted. Respondent also provides workers compensation and disability insurance for the participants. The trainees, who work 35 hours per week, work in crews of six people, comprising a crew of five and one site supervisor, who assigns work and teaches them how to do the job.

The contract with HPD, which began in September 1986, provides for training of certain "on-site" skills such as proper use of tools, materials, and equipment; appropriate work attire; work techniques; fellow worker and supervisor relations; meeting job (productivity) standards; and identifying site health and safety measures and general job skills (punctual attendance).

The contract also requires Respondent to conduct certain "off-site" training, including "life skills" classes, the purpose of which is to improve the trainee's self-awareness, self-reliance, and job readiness. Specifically, the classes are to teach the participants how to dress, behave, and respond in job interviews; how to budget and allocate their salaries; and general skills necessary to function in society.

Notwithstanding the "off-site" contract clauses, Lee received no classroom training during his tenure with Respondent. Deputy Executive Director John Wang testified that no such training was given because IRAR was a new and large program and the emphasis in the beginning of the program was to organize the work crews and get the renovation work done.

Lee was hired in October 1986 at the beginning of the IRAR-HPD program. His first assignment consisted of repair and renovation work and removing garbage. About 2 or 3 weeks after he began work, Lee began to speak openly with his fellow employees concerning improving their working conditions.

On 24 November 1986 he received at $2 raise to $7 per hour.

In December 1986 he was assigned as a driver to pick up and deliver material and transport workers.[2] Early that month he continued to discuss working conditions with coemployees, who he met while making deliveries. They spoke about such issues as low wages, unfairness of supervisors, poor lighting, and lack of gloves and dust masks.

On 1 January 1987 Lee received a raise to $8 per hour.

That month, on at least three occasions, Lee told Jones Chow, the director of the IRAR program, of employee complaints concerning lack of masks and gloves and poor lighting in the buildings. Jones responded that Respondent had just purchased expensive masks and gloves, and no more would be bought. Lee told him that a worker was hurt due to insufficient lighting, and Chow replied that the injury was caused by the trainee's carelessness.

Also in January a site supervisor was discharged. A meeting of about six people, including Lee, was held at the supervisor's home. Also in attendance was another site supervisor. The participants spoke about the lack of dust masks and other equipment, insufficient lights, and poor treatment of the workers.

Two weeks later, another meeting was held, and the same matters were discussed. Those present, including Lee, considered contacting the Board or the media with their grievance, but decided to give Respondent an opportunity to respond to their charges. Lee wrote a petition and, during his travels to various worksites in late January, he secured signatures on the petition. Twenty signatures, including three site supervisors, were obtained by early February.[3] The petition is as follows:[4]

> Petition to the manager, Mr. Chow
> We have been working for the CPC's IRAR for more than three months. During this period, we have given our best in fulfilling our responsibilities. However, the fact that the IRAR being just established, most things are just getting started from the very beginning. Especially, about the assignment and reassignments of personnel, it has been crucial. And it has not been particularly ideal on getting us benefits and the supply of tools and materials to the job sites, which had led to a severe waste of time and effort. In light of the IRAR's future, and to increase the quality and efficiency of the work, we respectfully request that you will invite the CPC's Board of Directors to call an all-employees discussion meeting and to send an observer to it; so that the administrative staff and the job site co-workers can frankly and mutually discuss (the matters), unifying our aims and efforts to create better results. In pursuance of getting CPC's IRAR to be one of the local contenders, and not letting down the good intention of the government in delegating the opportunity to serve our fellow Chinese; therefore, we pray that such a meeting be called immediately for the benefit of all.

[2] On 18 December Lee requested and received from IRAR Director Jones Chow a letter, for visa purposes, which stated that Lee "is employed in [IRAR] on an hourly rate basis as a construction worker."

Sincerely,
Job Site Workers

On 9 February, the following letter was distributed to the staff and trainees by Manager Jones Chow:[5]

The IRAR has been established for four months. It is time to make a summation:

1. Our IRAR's situation

The CPC itself is a not-for-profit organization. It is not like other enterprises or social organizations which have set capitals and foundations. As some of the workers and trainees have already known, at the formation of our unit, the only assets was a contract with the HPD; other than that, there was nothing else. Not to mention were the tools, processing-site, cars, warehouses and offices which were necessities in the founding of a construction company. Even the paper for business purposes was borrowed and printed by the Brooklyn Branch [of CPC]. The office was also on loan temporarily. I like to use here to thank the tremendous support of the Brooklyn Branch.

Through the combined efforts of all; one may say that the ones with money provided the funds, the ones who could work provided the labor, the ones with tools provided the tools, the ones with cars provided the transportation . . . there was a tremendous support in various ways. Today, we can say that we are on track, and completing the HPD's contract according to specifications. The HPD is ever increasing its confident on our work. At HPD, our reputation is ever on the rise. The CPC's Headquarters has expressed extreme satisfaction and the importance of our works. Our unit have also provided other CPC units with much inexpensive refurbishings. Therefore, the results are firm, and these results are due to the combined efforts of all. Here, I like to thank especially the staff, team leaders and trainees who totally supported my work during this period.

2. Our IRAR Goals

Due to being newly established and lacking in experience, [we have] signed a contract this year, within which there are things which are disavantageous to us and have affected directly on our welfare. For example:

a. Particularly low hourly wages. The workers, who are satisfied in working with the unit can't maintain the lowest living standards.

b. Trainees are without paid holidays, no medical insurance, and having a lost sense of security and belonging.

c. The assigned construction items have not been enough to completely train a trainee in skills for independent work.

I know of all these and understand your feelings. But these are facts which I can only express my regrets. I hope that, when signing the second contract this September I will get them for us all. Also hope that all of us can be more patient, work arduously, in creating for us the advantageous conditions for the signing of the second contract with HPD. I also think that, at that time, my unit will have over 12 teams of workers. It no longer will be just involved in the removing of garbage, painting, types of simple tasks. It will be the renovation of the whole building, including electrical, plumbing, and even heating systems. I like to see that the team leaders then would come from today's trainees. Whichever, the future is very bright and prosperous, but it awaits our combined efforts.

3. The difficulties and problems we are now having.

Although our unit is on track, it's still far from a enterpreneurial constructing firm. For example:

a. Not having a good warehouse, and the warehouse capacity is inadequate. Our materials can't be well protected; and a good warehouse managing system can't be established.

b. Not enough cars lead to the discontinuities in transporting the materials and created working delays. Tools which coundln't be removed and have been stolen are common occurrence.

c. Pays not being on time. Over-times was not paid. The increases of pay, being approved by me, were not paid accordingly. . . . These need me to activity and continuously to reflect to the Headquarters and requesting the headquarter's help to solve them expeditiously. However, as a unit, from nothing to its existence, from small to big, it can't be done in one step. There must be a through period, where [we are] not just waiting, nor should we over hurried it. And such is the proper attitude to take.

I know we all have many correct views and suggestions. I welcome you to bring them out. We will listen if these ideas will be beneficial toward the unit's unity. We will accept the reasonable suggestions about work. Things can be solved immediately will be solved immediately. For instance: the workers whose approved pay increases, I will positively get them back for you. The reasonable [ideas] which can't be solved immediately will be solved later. However, what I don't want to see is that when you have some opinions and reflect them on [your] working attitudes. Moreover, that due to the differences in views, I don't want to see your ways of disobedience to the work assignments.

4. Conclusion

We should value this good opportunity in the establishment of such a construction unit, providing our immigrants with the opportunity for employment and the learning of skills.

[5] The letter is as it appears in the original.

> I hope that the top and bottom of the unit will be united in heart and purpose, exerting the most of body and soul, to bring our work into a higher level; to gain for the Chinese greater benefits.

By the time the 9 February letter from Chow was distributed, Lee had not sent his petition to Respondent or shown it to anyone from management.[6] Lee asked the trainees if he should submit the petition and some said he should not, so he did not send it to Respondent.

On 17 February Lee did not work due to a toothache. That was his only absence during his tenure with Respondent. He stated that he called his site supervisor twice that day, but the supervisor did not answer his beeper and, consequently, did not speak to him that day.

The following day, 18 February, Lee reported to work and was told by his supervisor to call IRAR Director Chow. Lee worked that day, and called Chow and was told to see him the next day.

At their meeting, Chow asked Lee why he did not work on 17 February. Lee explained that he had a toothache, showed him the medicine he was taking, and offered to produce a doctor's note.

Lee stated that Chow changed the topic and asked: "How come you are still doing that thing?" Lee replied that he did not. Chow added, "Somebody reported to me that you are still doing this." Lee asked to confront his accuser, but Chow said that that was not necessary. Chow also said that "you have to stop doing this." Lee answered, "this matter is not merely my own opinion, it involves many other people's opinion. I cannot just stop it as I wish." Chow replied: "Then you don't have to come to work." Lee asked why he was being fired and Chow refused to give him a reason, but gave him a letter that stated that he was terminated.

On 27 February, Respondent received a letter sent by Lee. In the letter, Lee protested his dismissal, and mentioned that he had circulated a petition and enclosed a copy, but without the signatories' names.[7] On receiving the letter, Deputy Executive Director John Wang asked Chow for an explanation. Wang testified that Chow told him (Wang) that he heard that a petition, relating to improving working conditions, was being circulated and that the petition may be related to Lee. Chow, who made the decision to fire Lee, told Wrang that Lee had a poor attitude at work, and was absent on a number of occasions, and in his last week he was out for a couple of days and did not call in. In addition, Chow told Wang that certain supervisors complained about Lee and asked that he be transferred, and also that during worktime Lee went to other worksites without permission.

On 3 June, after the filing of the charge and in response to an inquiry from the Asian American Legal Defense Education Fund, Wang asked Chow for a written report of the reasons for Lee's discharge. Chow's letter to Wang referred to complaints from supervisors about Lee's work, attitude, and absence. The letter, which was received in evidence, stated that Lee was a good trainee from the time of his hire until 1 January when his attitude "changed." As demonstrated by his (a) wasting time by speaking with other trainees and disobeying orders, (b) failure to return calls from the office, (c) visiting worksites without authorization and causing dalays in the work schedule, and (d) taking the company van without informing the office and leaving it on the street for several days causing the truck rental company to cancel Respondent's rental contract.

The letter is hearsay and cannot be received as proof of Lee's conduct. It was written by Chow, and refers to reports of other supervisors on which, in part, Chow based his decision to fire Lee. Neither Chow nor the other supervisors testified and of course Chow's letter to Wang cannot be cross-examined. In addition, Wang was apparently unaware and did not have firsthand knowledge of any of the alleged incidents mentioned in the letter. He testified that he first learned of Lee's discharge when he received Lee's letter 1 week after the firing, and he then called Chow and received an oral report of the reasons for the discharge. Moreover, Chow's letter cannot qualify as a business record because it was prepared after the charge was filed and in response to an inquiry from the attorney for Lee. In addition, Chow, although no longer employed by Respondent, was not shown to be unavailable to testify.[8] I accordingly reject as inadmissible hearsay the letter written by Chow to Wang as proof of Lee's malfeasance. Cumberland Farms, 258 NLRB 900 fn. 1 (1981); Auto Workers Local 259 (Atherton Cadillac), 225 NLRB 421, 422, 427 (1976). Even if that letter was not hearsay, Lee credibly denied receiving any complaints from supervisors; and Respondent could not produce, although they were subpoenaed, any canceled van rental contracts.

III. ANALYSIS AND DISCUSSION

A. Lee's Status as an Employee

Respondent argues that Lee is a student or trainee and not covered by the Act. The General Counsel asserts that Lee is an employee entitled to the protection of the Act.

As set forth above, Lee worked in apartment renovation 35 hours per week, and was paid an hourly wage, which was more than the minimum wage, from which taxes and social security payments were deducted. Respondent provides workers compensation and disability insurance for its trainees. Based on these facts, Lee would appear to be a regular employee.

However, the evidence establishes that the theoretical goal of the IRAR program is to train the workers so that they could graduate from the program and, with the skills learned, seek employment elsewhere. The program's contract also provides that Respondent shall conduct life skills classes for the trainees, with instruction in job interviewing, managing money, and functioning in society, and shall provide counseling and assist the trainees in obtaining medical, legal, social, and educational services. However, no life skills classes were taught during Lee's tenure because the program was new and, according to official John Wang, Respondent was primarily interested in getting the crews organized and the renovation work done. Lee credibly testified that he did not receive job counseling, English lessons, or instruction in anything not related to his work assignments.

[6] The site supervisors appear to have some supervisory authority: They assign work to the trainees, show them how the work is to be done, and can order them to redo the work if it is unsatisfactory. However, Lee considered them to be employees, not part of management. The evidence is insufficient to make a determination whether the site supervisors are statutory supervisors. In view of the decision herein, I believe that, in any event, such a determination is unnecessary.

Respondent contends that these aspects of the IRAR programs render the relationship between Respondent and the trainee one of teacher-student, and not employer-employee.

I cannot agree. Respondent's relationship to these "trainees" is indicative of a commercial and business operation. The "trainees" work and terms and conditions of employment are identical to that employed in other private enterprises. The only difference is the trainee aspect of their work. However, they are working at regular trade occupations while receiving on-the-job training. In this respect they are "apprentices" who are being trained in the trades covered by the Act and not students acquiring an education.[9] Beecher Ancillary Services, 225 NLRB 642 (1976).

The only other difference in the nature of the employment relationship is the theoretical social aspect of the IRAR program. However, no counseling or educational programs were offered by Respondent and Lee received none. Indeed, Official John Wang testified that none were given because the program was new and Respondent wanted to get the work crews organized and the renovation work done. Thus, the work aspect of the program was deemed to be more important than the social service aspect. Even if the counseling and classroom services were held, I would still find that Lee was an employee within the meaning of the Act. NLRB v. Lighthouse for the Blind, 696 F.2d 399 (5th Cir. 1983), and 244 NLRB 1144 (1979), in which it was found that certain handicapped workshop employees were statutory employees.

B. The Discharge

1. The General Counsel's prima facie case

Lee testified without contradiction[10] that from nearly the start of his employment in October 1986 he engaged in concerted activity by speaking about poor working conditions. He had these discussions with his fellow workers at jobsites, and two meetings at a discharged site supervisor's home. He wrote a petition protesting poor benefits and lack of materials and requesting that a meeting be held at which problems could be discussed. He obtained the signatures of 20 people, including 3 site supervisors, on the petition.

Although the petition was never submitted to management, Respondent was apparently aware of employee discontent. Thus Lee told official Jones Chow several times in January of employee complaints. Shortly after Lee obtained the last signature on the petition, Chow distributed a conciliatory letter in which he praised the workers, recognized that they received low wages and few benefits, and had insufficient materials. He told the workers that the "proper attitude" is to be "more patient." He also invited them to make their views known and promised to accept "reasonable suggestions" and immediately resolve any problems that could be quickly corrected. However, he warned them that their work should not sufer because of their attitudes or different views.

Eight days later, Lee was absent from work due to a toothache. The following day he was fired, during a conversation in which Jones Chow asked him why he was "still doing that thing?" Chow then told Lee that someone reported to him that Lee was "still doing this." Lee asked who the accuser was and Chow refused to identify him. Chow then said that "you have to stop doing this." Lee replied that what he did involved others, and he could not stop it on his own. Chow then fired Lee. The discharge conversation clearly related to Lee's activity among the employees in seeking better working conditions. Chow must have been aware of his activity since Lee told him, on three occasions, of employee complaints that he received at the jobsites. Chow's 9 February letter indicates an awareness of employee discontent generally, and asks them to exhibit the proper attitude of patience.

In addition, 10 days after his discharge, Chow told official Wang that he heard that a petiton relating to working conditions was being circulated and that the petition may be related to Lee.

Based on Lee's open conduct of concerted activities by discussing working conditions with fellow employees at jobsites and at a former site supervisor's home, his writing of a petition in protest of poor working conditions, his securing of 20 signatures on a petition at various worksites, the letter of Jones Chow to employees urging patience as the "proper attitude," and the discharge interview in which Chow accused Lee of continuing his activities and Lee refused to abandon them, all convince me that the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing that Lee's concerted activities were a motivating factor in Respondent's decision to discharge him. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

2. Respondent's defense

As set forth above, no one with firsthand knowledge of the discharge and the reasons for it testified. I have rejected as hearsay Official Wang's testimony of what Chow told him were the reasons for the firing, and letter

[9] Cedars-Sinai Medical Center, 223 NLRB 251 (1976), cited by Respondent, is therefore inapposite. Firmat Mfg. Corp., 255 NLRB 1213 (1981), is also inapposite because the employee there was a full-time vocational high school student who was employed under a cooperative training program through the school. He was paid at a lower rate than regular employees and did not receive any of the benefits enjoyed by other workers.

[10] I note that at times Lee was combative with Respondent's counsel, and Lee objected to certain appropriate questions and attempted to refuse to answer them, but I do not believe that that these incidents caused his testimony to be fatally flawed, especially where much of his version of the facts was uncontradicted.

to that effect[11] and supervisors' letters regarding Lee's work record.

Even if I were to accept those rejected items of evidence, I would find that Respondent has not proven that Lee would have been discharged in the absence of his concerted activities. Wright Line, supra. Thus, certain reasons for the discharge are not credible:

(a) Absences—Lee was absent only once, on 17 February, during his 4-month tenure. He tried to call his site supervisor that day but could not reach him. When asked for the reason for his absence, Lee told Chow he had a toothache, showed him the medicine he was taking, and offered to supply a doctor's note. Chow did not respond to this offer. Although Chow allegedly told Wang that Lee was absent several times, and a couple of days in his last week, it appears that the 17 February absence was the only time he was out.

(b) Van—It was alleged that the van rental company canceled Respondent's lease with it because Lee left the van on the street for several days without notifying the rental company. Lee credibly denied any impropriety and, although subpoenaed, no cancellation notices were produced by Respondent.

(c) Attitude change—It was alleged that Lee's attitude changed beginning on 1 January at which time he visited worksites without authorization and spoke with other workers. This coincides with Lee's receipt of employee complaints and transmittal of them to Chow and his solicitation of signatures on the petition he wrote. Lee's undertaking of these activities was not welcome by Respondent—the proper attitude, as announced in Chow's letter, was one of patience. Further, the discharge interview in which Chow discharged Lee on Lee's refusal to be patient, and unwillingness to stop his concerted activity, demonstrated that the "attitude" problem referred to related to his protected, concerted activity.

I therefore find and conclude that Lee was discharged for his protected, concerted activities. Wright Line, supra.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Chinatown Planning Council is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. By discharging Young Shi Lee because he made complaints to Respondent on behalf of his coworkers and himself regarding working conditions of Respondent's employees, and because he complained about Respondent's wages, hours, and working conditions, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease an desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

[11] Chow's 9 February letter to the employees is admissible. Both parties agreed to its receipt in evidence.

Having found that Respondent unlawfully discharged Young Shi Lee, I recommend that Respondent be ordered to reinstate him and make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against him. The amount of backpay shall be computed in the manner set forth in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[12]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I make the following recommended[13]

ORDER

The Respondent, Chinatown Planning Council, Inc., New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against any employee because he makes complaints to it on behalf of his coworkers and himself regarding working conditions of Respondent's employees, or because he circulates petitions among Respondent's employees that complained about Respondent's wages, hours, and working conditions.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Young Shi Lee immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against him in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge of Young Shi Lee and notify him in writing that this has been done and that the discharge will not be used against him in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its New York City facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[14] Copies of the [12] Under New Horizons, interest is computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest accrued before 1 January 1987 (the effective date of the amendment) shall be computed as in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[13] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Case 22–CA–15150

September 14, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On May 18, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Harold B. Lawrence issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a statement in opposition to the exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions, brief, and statement in opposition and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The judge incorrectly found that the petition was received at the South Plainfield facility the day after the Respondent had received notification of a speeding ticket issued to Brewster, the alleged discriminatee. Rather, the petition was received July 15, 1987, and notification of the ticket was received July 16, 1987. The judge's inadvertent error does not affect the decision.

Gary A. Carlson, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Elliot Mandel, Esq. (Kaufman, Frank, Schneider & Rosenweig), of Melville, New York, for the Respondent.
Albert G. Kroll, Esq. (Zazzali, Zazzali & Kroll), of Newark, New Jersey, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HAROLD B. LAWERENCE, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard by me at Newark, New Jersey, on 28, 29, and 30 October 1987. The complaint alleges that Synergy Gas Corporation (Synergy) and Propane Transportation Corporation (Propane Transportation), referred to jointly in the complaint as the Respondent, are a single employer and violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by firing George Brewster for supporting Local 863, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO, the Charging Party (the Union). The joint answer interposed on behalf of the two companies as Respondents denied that they were a single-integrated enterprise in commerce while admitting that each individually was an employer engaged in commerce, denied the material allegations of the complaint, and denied the commission of any statutory violation. The two companies will occasionally be referred to as the Respondents or as the Employer. At the hearing, the Respondents contended that they fired Brewster because he failed to adhere to safety standards.

The parties were afforded full opportunity to be heard; to call, examine and cross-examine witnesses; and to introduce relevant evidence. Posthearing briefs have been filed by the General Counsel for the Respondents.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

There is no issue concerning jurisdiction, counsel having admitted the pertinent jurisdictional allegations. The answer admits allegations to the effect that Synergy operates a bulk propane plant and is engaged in the wholesale distribution of propane; that Propane Transportation is bulk transportation of propane; that both companies operate out of an office and place of business in South Plainfield, New Jersey; and that both companies derive gross revenues in excess of $50,000 annually from the transportation, distribution, and sale of propane directly to points outside the State of New Jersey. I find that at all times material each company was and is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section (2), (6), and (7) of the Act and that the Union was and is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. General Statement of the Facts

1. Respondents' business and operations

The Respondents are subsidiaries of Synergy Group, Inc., a holding corporation owned by members of the Vogel family with offices in Farmingdale, New York. Jon Vogel is executive vice president and a principal. Daniel Shientag is general counsel. John P. Russell is vice president of operations of Synergy, Propane Transportation, and another affiliate named Skelgas, Inc., and is chairman of the safety committee of Synergy and Skelgas, Inc. At the pertinent times, Shientag, like the others, had his office at the central headquarters in Farmingdale. Control of labor relations for all the corporations controlled by the Vogel family is handled by Shientag. The common ownership and control of these enterprises and the centralization of the control of labor affairs leads me to conclude that for the purposes of the Act, the Respondents constitute a single-integrated enterprise and a single employer.

Propane transports liquid propane from refineries and pipeline terminals to local bulk distribution plants in New York, New Jersey, Vermont, and New Hampshire, utilizing 11,000-gallon cylindrical barrel tractor-trailer transport. It has been compared to a pipeline on wheels. It employs 20 persons including, as of July 1987, 6 or 7 drivers.

Synergy is involved in wholesale and retail distribution of propane and maintenance of storage facilities for it. It operates straight chassis trucks with rack bodies to hold aluminum cylinders (for delivery to retail customers) or tanks, which hold 3000 gallons of liquid propane. Synergy operates nationally. The country is divided between 2 regional managers, under each of whom there are 10 area managers, each of whom supervises 8 to 10 branches. The 124 branch managers run the day-to-day activities of the local installations. The employee complement in each branch varies. There may be as few as 4 or more than 30, depending on market density and geographical location. Every branch has short-haul drivers who deliver propane locally and some also have long-haul transport drivers and mechanics. Two-thirds (1200) of the employees are drivers.

Russell's duties are the same in Synergy, Propane, and Skelgas, Inc. and involve all matters pertaining to product delivery and manpower requirements. He reports directly to Jon Vogel. At the time of the incidents involved in these proceedings, Philip Nicolette, the area manager who supervised South Plainfield, reported directly to Russell because the office of regional manager was temporarily vacant.

2. The hiring and discharge of Brewster

Brewster had 12 years' experience driving flammable liquids at the time he applied for a position with Respondents at South Plainfield, New Jersey, on 19 May 1987.[1] He was hired by William Hall, the branch manager, a week later, after a check was made with his previous employer. At the time of his interview with Hall, he took an open book test on rules of the Department of Transportation. In his previous employments, Brewster had received tickets pertaining to equipment violations but had never received one for a moving violation.

He soon became disappointed with the pay and working conditions and contacted John Braden, the business agent of the Union, which had a contract with Respondents covering their facility at Parsippany, New Jersey, about 30 miles away. Braden sent him authorization cards and early in June Brewster began soliciting signatures on the cards. His activities continued for approximately a month. He signed his own card on 10 June. And he enlisted the support and aid of Joseph D. Vuono, who signed a card on 8 July.

On 13 July, the Union filed a petition for an election, alleging that a substantial number of the 17 employees of Synergy at South Plainfield wished to be represented by it. A copy of the petition was mailed to Respondents on 14 July. It was received at South Plainfield on Thursday, 16 July, which happened to be the day on which Hall, Nicolette, and Russell had scheduled a meeting regarding a New Jersey fuel tax audit. Hall turned the petition over to Nicolette, who gave it to Russell when he arrived for the meeting. They discussed the question whether the dissatisfaction that gave impetus to the drive for unionization was concentrated among the short-haul or the long-haul drivers, but came to no conclusion. Russell delivered the petition to Shientag when he returned to Farmingdale later in the day.

The day before, Russell had received in his mail a notice from the New Jersey Turnpike Authority advising Synergy that on 7 July a ticket had been issued to one of its drivers, George Brewster, for traveling 69 miles per hour in a 55-mile-per-hour zone. Brewster had not advised Hall or anyone else in the Company that he had received the ticket. Russell, after ascertaining that Nicolette knew nothing about it, conferred with Jon Vogel, and later in the day instructed Nicolette to terminate Brewster. Russell testified that he made the decision to terminate Brewster.

On Monday, 20 July, Nicolette and Hall notified Brewster that he was being terminated. He requested a letter setting forth the reasons. Nicolette called Russell in Farmingdale and Russell agreed to issue a letter. Nicolette advised Brewster that, pending issuance of the letter, he would be on suspension.

On 23 July, Russell issued a letter on Propane Transportation stationery, notifying Brewster that his employment with Propane was terminated as of 20 July. The letter set forth three reasons for the termination: (1) the issuance of the summons to him for exceeding the posted speed limits; (2) violation of section 392.2 of the Federal Safety Regulations, which, according to the letter, required that regulated vehicles be operated in accordance with the laws of the jurisdiction in which they operate; (3) failure to comply with item 11 of the Synergy Gas Corporation Safety Manual Policies and Procedures for Operating Motor Vehicles, which, according to the letter, required drivers to report citations for traffic violations within 24 hours of receipt.

B. Analysis of the Evidence

1. The evidence adduced in support of the complaint

a. The extent of Brewster's organizational activity

Brewster testified that he became dissatisfied with the pay and working conditions shortly after he started with Respondents in June and began seeking signatures on the cards sent by Braden. He claimed that he did so openly without making any attempt to preserve secrecy, that he spoke to 10 or 12 persons, gave cards to at least 7 and possibly 10 persons, and spoke to them in the garage, in the lunchroom, and elsewhere on the premises. However, the evidence is not convincing that his efforts were extensive. He was not specific about when or where he spoke to any particular persons or obtained signatures on cards. Except for the card signed by Joseph D. Vuono, he was unable to identify any significant number of cards or describe the circumstances under which they were executed or received by him from the signatories. The cards that he and Vuono signed are the only two cards in evidence. Despite Brewster's testimony that he began talking to the other employees early in June and that Vuono handed out the cards for him when he had to be on the road, Brewster's card is dated 10 June and Vuono's card is not dated until 8 July. Brewster's testimony that he had spoken to Vuono about the Union "on many occasions" indicates to me that Vuono took some time to become convinced and renders it unlikely that Vuono did much soliciting. There is no satisfactory evidence respecting the duration and intensity of Brewster's activities and insofar as Brewster claims to have engaged in such activities, the record is barren of corroboration from any source respecting the time, the extent, or the location of Brewster's activity in support of the Union. The picture he furnishes is not as sharply focused and I am left with the impression that his efforts were not open and in plain view or so intensive as necessarily to come to management's attention.

b. Animus

In other cases involving other corporations owned by them in similar lines of business, Respondents' management has been found to have committed unfair labor practices. In its dealings with the Union in connection with the situation at South Plainfield, Respondents' management failed to heed the direction of the Regional Director, contained in the order directing an election, that an Excelsior list be furnished to the Union. The attitude of management connoted something beyond refusal to cooperate with an adversary. When Russell arrived at South Plainfield and was given the petition by Nicolette, his reaction was, "Oh, boy!" He later asked Nicolette and Hall what the "problem" was and whether the union drive was among the long-haul transport drivers or the short-haul distribution drivers.

The musings of Respondents' managers about the "problem" that led the employees to seek the help of a union do not necessarily show their intention to search out and eliminate the union activities. If viewed as a sign of malaise among the work force, it is within the prerogatives of management to make proper inquiries regarding it. In this case, Russell interrogated the branch and area managers. He did not interrogate employees. But on the basis of the past history of his management's dealings with unions, the exsistence of union animus is not out of the question.

Russell conveyed an incredible picture of the reaction in Farmingdale to the Union's petition: according to him, there was no reaction at all. He testified that on his return to Farmingdale, he gave the petition to Shientag, who received it without comment. It was later the subject of a conference between Shientag and Jon Vogel, from which no significant quotations have emerged. This lack of candor at the hearing, combined with management's past record, leads me to believe that union animus existed. The question is whether the events at issue were motivated by it.

c. Conversation between Brewster and Hall

Brewster testified that on Wednesday, 22 July, he returned to Hall's office to turn in some paperwork and petty cash and to collect his pay. No one else was present. They exchanged amenities and took care of the several items of business. According to Brewster:

> And then right before I was ready to depart I said "Bill, off the record, and the reason I am getting laid off or fired and is this due to union activity?" And he said "Yeah, but I am going to deny it." And then from there I said "I am going to do what I have to do." And he said "Go ahead it is really out of my hands."
> And this is when I contacted the union and the law office was involved. And this is where I got my Petition and I knew it was unlawful . . . .

Hall denies having made the statement, asserting that when Brewster came in he turned in his paperwork and they talked about toll money, medical records, and paysheets.

In assessing the relative credibility of the two men regarding this conversation, I am compelled to offset numerous points on which Brewster's testimony was less than accurate or candid (such as the extent to which he was tested, the extent to which regulatory material was made available to him, and the extent to which Respondents supposedly ignored his requests for a new vehicle) with a solitary instance in which I find Hall's testimony questionable on a relatively immaterial point, whether Brewster and Hall had a conversation in Hall's office on the morning of Saturday, 18 July. Brewster testified he came in that morning and Hall told him to come in to see him again on Monday morning. Hall testified that he did not usually work Satrudays but could have been there that day, but he was firm in his denial that he had seen Brewster at that time.

It is apparent to me that Brewster's testimony is probably correct on this point. Nicolette testified that on the preceding Thursday he received Russell's instructions to terminate Brewster very late in the afternoon; since Brewster had already gone, he left the instructions with Hall. The following day Hall told him that he had not yet seen Brewster. Yet, though Hall had not seen Brewster on Friday and there is no testimony regarding any telephone contact, Brewster came in on Monday about 9:45 a.m. equipped with a tape recorder and prepared for a conference. As Hall did not explain how Brewster knew he was supposed to come in for a conference, I accept Brewster's explanation.

However, Hall's failure to recall this unimportant conversation with Brewster does not lend credibility to Brewster's contention that Hall, a manager experienced in labor relations, made a damaging admission to him that he was discharged for union activity. Accordingly, I do not find that Hall made the statement that Brewster attributes to him.

d. Employer's knowledge of Brewster's activities

There is no direct evidence in the record of any notice or communication to any person in a supervisory or managerial capacity, or to any person whose knowledge could be attributed to the Employer, that Brewster was engaged in activity in support of the Union. Accordingly, the General Counsel relies on circumstantial evidence from which he claims such knowledge or communication may be inferred: the allegedly small size of the plant at South Plainfield, the openness and lack of concealment of Brewster's activities, and the fact that two members of management had sons who were employed at South Plainfield as drivers. Of course, my finding that Brewster's efforts to organize support for the Union were not intensive undercuts the force of all of these arguments. There are other respects in which the factual basis for such an inference must be deemed insufficient.

James Gerard is the son of Joseph Gerard, the fleet manager for Synergy and Skelgas, Inc. Joseph Gerard's office is in the Farmingdale headquarters and he reports directly to Jon Vogel. Mark Rutledge is the son of Joan Rutledge, the dispatcher at South Plainfield. In another proceeding, Respondents stipulated that she was a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. The General Counsel contends that an inference is warranted that James and Mark would have brought Brewster's activities to the attention of management.

However, the evidence of family relationship is the only evidence in the case of the Rutleges, and there is not much more in the case of the Gerards. There is no evidence in the record that would establish the likelihood that either driver would have made such a communication to his parent. There is no evidence that either one lived in the home of the parent, took meals there, or discussed company business with his parent. There is no evidence respecting their views regarding unionization. Brewster testified regarding statements by James Gerard: "[c]onstantly he said you will never get a union in here and we will shut the plant down. . . . And he said there will never be a union down here and they will shut the place down. Mr. Vogel is a lawyer and he'll fire you and he will do anything if he finds out you are involved with the union." That is evidence of James Gerard's opinions and expectations, not that James Gerard made any communications to his father pertaining to organizational activity. Brewster also testified that James Gerard kept in close contact with his father through telephone calls, but he did not assert that the subject matter of any of the calls was Brewster's activity in support of the Union.

Brewster was vague concerning the knowledge that James Gerard and Mark Rutledge might have acquired. Asked whether he ever spoke to James Gerard about the Union, his response was that it was constantly, that James Gerard kept in close touch with his father, and that he made statements quoted above. However, Brewster subsequently limited his testimony to an assertion merely that James Gerard "was aware there was a union coming on and there was some things going on." Such a statement in direct response to a question whether he spoke to James Gerard about the Union indicates that he did not. Moreover, in view of James Gerard's relationship and his expressed attitude, it is inconceivable that Brewster would speak to him directly about joining the Union because he could not reasonably have expected him to do so or to sign a card.

In the case of Mark Rutledge, Brewster did not claim he ever spoke to him directly. He testified merely that Mark Rutledge was "around" when Brewster talked to other employees. That proves nothing. In fact, if Brewster spoke to or in the presence of James Gerard and Mark Rutledge, it can plausibly be argued that he did so because he was confident of their friendly feelings toward him and did not fear that they would do anything to jeopardize his employment. That would make it unlikely that they would report his activities to their parents.

The amount of room left for such guesswork demonstrates the size of the evidentiary void in this case. The kind of evidence that is required in such instances is noted in American League, 189 NLRB 541, 548–549 (1971), in which it was held that an inference that an employee informed the employer concerning the union activities of another employee is impermissible, and that such a contention must be established by direct evidence. The only permissible exceptions were held to be cases in which informers know the identity of union adherents, and inform the employer that the employees are engaged in union activity, and in which the fact that they made such statements to the employer is proved by direct testimony.

As would be expected, in view of the general lack of evidence to support an inference that James and Mark made any reports, there is no evidence that either parent had any significant discussions with other officers of the Company regarding any matter supposedly communicated by his son. The General Counsel's effort to adduce such testimony from Russell with respect to Gerard brought forth a complete denial that the senior Gerard had ever discussed anything about his son's work with Russell except for the solitary instance of a truck mishap.

The General Counsel argued that the length of the period of time—1 month—which Brewster claims he spent soliciting signatures justified an inference of knowledge of his activities on the part of his employer. The argument that a month is a lengthy period is based on the holding in Friendly Markets, 224 NLRB 967, 968 (1976), in which a shorter period was rejected as a circumstance justifying an inference of knowledge. The reverse conclusion does not necessarily follow and I reject the argument. I find the decision in Friendly Markets permitted chiefly for the observation there that the "small plant" doctrine is not applicable solely on the basis of the small size of a plant or the small number of employees, as those factors alone do not warrant an inference that management had knowledge of union activity of specific employees. There must also be evidence that the activities were carried on under conditions making it likely that management's attention would be drawn to them. See also Hadley Mfg. Corp., 108 NLRB 1641, 1650 (1954) (organizational activities carried on at the plant, but not during working hours); Samsonite Corp., 206 NLRB 343, 349 (1973) (small plant where supervision had close contact with employees); and American League, 189 NLRB

541, 548 (1971) (may consider employer's statements and conduct affording reason to believe it had gained knowledge of protected activities). In American League, it was commented that the size of a plant may be material if all the circumstances, including plant size, makes it likely that the employer observed the union activities of a discharged employee. See also NLRB v. Joseph Antell, Inc., 358 F.2d 880 (1st Cir. 1966).

Respondents' drivers are out on the road a good portion of the time and seldom are present at the premises in large numbers at one time. The remainder of the employees engaged in different types of work in different portions of the premises; besides the drivers, there are mechanics, yardmen, and servicemen. Hall is on the premises all day and makes several tours each day through the entire facility, but that by itself does not make it likely that he would encounter union activity and he does not use the lunchroom at all. So he is not likely to hear of any union activity. Nicolette, who knows all the employees by name, is familiar with their employment history, and considers some of them to be his friends, nevertheless has jurisdiction over both the Parsippany and South Plainfield branches and divides his time between them.

On these facts, no inference of knowledge is warranted. On the contrary, they demonstrate the precise opposite of what the General Counsel contends. In his posthearing brief, counsel for the General Counsel refers to "[t]he compact size of the premises that comprise the South Plainfield branch." The premises consists of a yard, a loading dock, storage tanks, and a building which was described in the testimony as large. It houses a 2-day service facility for the trucks, six offices, and a small lunchroom. There is no evidence of the dimensions of the premises, but no one referred to them as compact.

Accordingly, there is no basis on which I can infer that Brewster's employer had notice that he was soliciting signatures on union cards. Counsel for the General Counsel seems to have recognized this himself, for, in his posthearing brief, he presented as "the only explanation that makes sense" a completely different theory to explain Brewster's discharge. This was that, on receipt of the petition, management conducted an investigation to ascertain the nature of the problem, and that the members of management were so enraged on identifying Brewster as the culprit that they could not control themselves and fired him within "hours" of the receipt of the petition. If that is the only explanation that makes sense, then we are certainly warranted in discounting the "small shop" theory and the possibility that the sons of management personnel reported Brewster's activities, especially since Brewster started in June and was not fired until 20 July.

e. Timing of discharge

As a general matter, the timing of a discharge does not, either by itself or in light of the severity of such disciplinary action, compel the conclusion that the discharge was discriminatory. Ray's Liquor Store, 227 NLRB 1800, 1801 fn. 3 (1977). Timing is one of many factors to be considered and, like the others, may raise only a rebuttable inference. Central Buying Service, 223 NLRB 542, 547 (1976).

The discharge of Brewster occurred within a week after Russell, Shientag, and Vogel learned of the union petition for election. It also occurred within a week of receipt of the notice from the New Jersey Turnpike Authority. The three events occurred at approximately the same time.

Though Brewster claims his union activity was open and notorious, there is a lapse of 5 weeks between the commencement of his activity and his discharge. He does not claim that during that period anything was said to him about it or that any attempt was made to impede his union activity. There is no evidence linking his discharge to the filing of the union petition rather than to the receipt of the notice of the speeding ticket, insofar as the element of timing is concerned.

f. Claim of disparate treatment

A discharge that is consistent with an employer's past practice of discharging employees who commit similar conduct will be upheld even though the employee's protected conduct was also a motivating factor in the decision to discharge. See K & K Transportation Corp., 262 NLRB 1481, 1486 (1982). The General Counsel contended that the falsity of the asserted reason for discharge is shown by disparate treatment accorded Brewster, by general lack of concern on the part of management with safety matters, and by Respondents' assertedly faulty handling of driver discipline and safety matters.

I find that disparate treatment was not demonstrated. There is abundant evidence that other drivers were discharged following serious mishaps on the road and that Respondents were concerned about safety and sought to avoid situations involving peril to the public at large, their drivers, and their vehicles. Brewster's treatment was not substantially different from that accorded to others who had behaved similarly. Brewster had been employed for about 6 weeks when he was discharged. Joseph Smith, whose tractor-trailer overturned, was discharged after 2 weeks for driving at an unsafe speed (as distinct from driving in excess of a speed limit). Vuono was employed for a total of 10 weeks. He received a speeding ticket for driving a transport 55 miles per hour in a 45-mile-per-hour zone on 28 August. His tractor-trailer jackknifed. He was suspended pending analysis by the Safety Committee and discharged on 21 September. (That date is after the election, which was held on 18 September, negating any connection between Vuono's asserted union activity and his discharge.) Charles Breeze was fired in October 1986 for abandoning a loaded transport on the road. None of these drivers received warnings.

Russell testified that the incidents involving overturned trucks led to the issuance of an interoffice memorandum, dated 20 January 1987, addressed to all Transport Operating Locations, entitled, "Hiring Prerequisites and Procedures for Transport Drivers." That document appears to have been a bona fide attempt to ensure that all persons hired as drivers of transports were familiar with and adhered to recognized safety principles.

Brewster's offense was to drive a tanker 14 miles per hour over the posted speed limit. He was traveling at 69 miles per hour in a tanker fully loaded with 9000 gallons of flammable liquid propane. He compounded the offense by violating a company rule requiring that tickets be reported, on the lame excuse that the police officer told him that the Company would be notified directly. The General Counsel seeks to equate that conduct with lesser offenses of an altogether different nature for which drivers were not fired, such as failing to appear for work, failing to fill out equipment reports, and maintenance failures such as those just mentioned, which were not even attributable to the drivers. The comparison is completely inapt.

The General Counsel has pointed to Respondents' failure to discharge several drivers who received tickets, but the tickets in question were for equipment violations. A ticket issued to William J. Smith was for a truck loaded in a manner likely to result in a spill onto the road because of a loose binding. A ticket received by Bruce J. Golchuk was for insecurely fastened brake pads. Neither truck was a tanker and both tickets involved maintenance matters rather than moving violations. Even at that, it was not demonstrated that the deficiencies entailed continuation of any condition affecting the safe operation of the vehicles.

My conclusions are not affected by evidence that Respondents' disciplinary system is not highly organized or completely consistent or fool-proof in all cases. It appears that there is no written policy covering discipline and Respondents do not operate a progressive disciplinary system. But there is discipline. Oral and written warnings are issued by both branch and area managers and are generally geared to the gravity of the infraction. Hall testified that he customarily gives two verbal warnings and then a written warning, after which he asks Nicolette what further action to take.

Hall's testimony indicated the type of problems dealt with by warnings. Vuono was given verbal warnings for failure to write up his truck reports or complete his logs. Warnings were issued to drivers for failures such as omission to report equipment problems to the mechanics before leaving for home, for failure to come in to work (the latter resulting in discharge after three such warnings), lateness, and failure to fill in the logs. The warnings patently related to considerably less serious matters that were largely unrelated to safety infractions, and the issuance of warnings in such cases instead of dismissals did not constitute disparate treatment.

Nor is my conclusion affected by one apparently aberrant occurrence. Russell conceded that Jon Vogel observed a driver weaving back and forth between lanes in a dangerous manner. The driver was only given a verbal reprimand. Respondents offered no explanation and it appears to me to have been an utter failure to enforce discipline and safety rules. But this is the only known instance of failure to administer serious punishment for apparently dangerous action and it appears to be an anomalous occurrence which was offset by the other instances in which severe disciplinary action was taken.

Counsel for the General Counsel, in his posthearing brief, cites the failure of Respondents to produce subpoenaed documents consisting of lists of violations of motor vehicle traffic laws and ordinances by drivers employed at South Plainfield and urges that I infer that they would have shown that many drivers who received speeding tickets were not discharged. I decline to draw such an inference because Respondents' noncompliance was assented to by the counsel for the General Counsel. The subpoena was served at the South Plainfield facility 1 week before the scheduled date of the hearing. The Respondents timely moved to revoke the subpoena but the motion papers did not reach me in time. I ruled on the motion at the hearing and in effect denied it after modifying some of its requirements. Counsel for the Respondents stated that the subpoenaed records were stored in two 44-foot trailers and that the time-consuming task of extracting the pertinent records had been deferred pending the ruling on the motion. He offered to dig them out if I would grant a few days' continuance to enable him to do so. On the second day of the hearing, the matter was put to the General Counsel, who was expressly given the choice, by me, of going forward, resting his case, giving Respondents a few days to get the records, taking an adjournment to move for subpoena enforcement or whatever other action he deemed appropriate. He would not have been prejudiced by a continuance. He stated that he wished to proceed immediately. The existence and availability of the records could have been ascertained with certainty after a short continuance which was not granted because the General Counsel's election to proceed rendered it unnecessary. Under the circumstances, it would be unfair to draw an adverse inference from the Respondents' failure to produce the documentation.

g. Single employer status

The evidence warrants a finding that Respondents are a single employer, and a remedy, had I found a violation, would properly have been imposed on the two of them jointly and severally.

h. Conclusion

The evidence adduced by the General Counsel does not include any direct evidence or any persuasive circumstantial evidence that persons in positions of authority in Respondents' management were aware of Brewster's interest in, or activities on behalf of, the Union. There is no convincing evidence that the intensity or extent of Brewster's organizational activity made it likely that his activity would come to management's attention. There is no evidence of disparate treatment. A prima facie case was not proved. Moreover, even if it could be said that every element of a prima facie case of violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) was supported by some evidence, however slight, it could not be maintained that on the whole case the allegations of the complaint had been established by a preponderance of the evidence, for the Respondents convincingly rebutted the General Counsel's case.

The General Counsel has cited a number of cases in his posthearing brief in which an illegal discharge has been inferred from circumstantial evidence. None of the evidence in this case, however, is comparable to the type of circumstantial evidence that was introduced in the cases cited.

2. Respondent's explanation for Brewster's discharge

a. The explanation

If the evidence had been sufficient to establish a prima facie case of violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, the burden would have devolved on Respondents to show that the discharge had actually been for a reason not violative of the Act. Respondents offered one that I found completely credible: the gross violation of safety which resulted from Brewster's having seriously exceeded the legal speed limit with a fully loaded propane tank truck.

The nature and extent of a respondent employer's burden in cases such as this have been clearly spelled out. In Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083, 1089 (1980), modified 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), it was held that in cases alleging violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3), in which the employer had both permissible and impermissible reasons (under the Act) for discharging an employee, the General Counsel must establish a prima facie case that the employee's protected conduct was a motivating factor. The employer then has the burden of persuasion, or of going forward, and must demonstrate that it would have discharged the employee even in the absence of such protected conduct. The General Counsel retains the general burden of proof on the whole case. The extent of the employer's burden was clarified in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983), the employer must show that it acted for the claimed lawful motive by a preponderance of the evidence. See Roure Bertrand Dupont, Inc., 271 NLRB 443 (1984), and the cases cited.

Brewster conceded that he had been given a ticket on 7 July for speeding at 69 miles per hour in a 55-mile-per-hour zone, at a time when his transport was fully loaded with flammable liquid propane. He pleaded guilty and paid the fine in court on 7 August.

Russell explained the nature of the hazard. The transport of tankers carry 9000 gallons of liquid propane, a flammable substance. They cost $130,000 a piece. An accident can cause one to rupture. Such an accident in the Catskills produced a fireball that severely damaged the town in which it occurred. Vital arteries, such as the George Washington Bridge, can be blocked for extended periods of time by disabled tankers. Flip over of a propane tanker could result in the release of liquid propane, which in gaseous form occupies a volume 270 times greater than its liquid form. It is combustible when mixed with air. Nine thousand gallons of liquid propane translate into 328,000 cubic feet of flammable vapor.

Russell testified that three employees (Smith, Gunter, and Riddle) whose trucks overturned were discharged for unsafe operation. These incidents led to the composition of the interoffice memorandum dated 20 January 1987 on the subject of hiring prerequisites and procedures for transport drivers. The procedures outlined for ensuring the hiring of experienced and competent drivers are as follows: before a driver is hired, an abstract of his operating record is obtained to determine if he meets the Company's standards; references are verified; and a 2-day minimum training period is prescribed for all drivers before they are put to work, with emphasis on the hazards of operating a transport with a liquid load. Nicolette testified that the fleet director in Farmingdale (the position currently occupied by Gerard) reviews the abstracts of the records of all drivers once a year.

The Company complies with the U.S. Department of Transportation (DOT) regulations governing safety and drivers' hours and also complies with New York City curfew regulations. The DOT's Bureau of Highway Safety audits Respondents to ensure compliance with DOT regulations. All traffic citations received by drivers throughout the United States are required to be forwarded to Farmingdale. Of the 200 traffic tickets received there since 1982, only 2 were for exceeding fixed speed limits. The General Counsel scoffed at Russell's testimony to that effect, but I do not share his skepticism. Recognition of the hazards involved in this type of work explains the small number of tickets received at Farmingdale that involve moving violations and the relatively few discharges arising from improper operation of vehicles, for Respondents' drivers must be assumed to be of average intelligence and emotional stability. Many tickets were for equipment violations, which Russell stated were considered serious, but not as serious as moving violations. The Company has no written rule that requires that a driver automatically be discharged for receiving a speeding ticket, but Russell noted that Government regulations require drivers to obey local laws in the operation of their vehicles.

The drivers sign for receipt of a copy of the Federal safety regulations. The Company also distributes a safety manual to the branches which, among other things, requires drivers to report citations for traffic violations. Nicolette conceded, however, that the safety manual is not distributed to the drivers; instead, the branch managers use them as discussion guides for their monthly safety meetings.

Russell testified that the Company's concern with safety is rooted in its basic desire to remove unsafe conditions for drivers and the public, to avoid property damage, and to avoid bad publicity for the Company resulting from flipovers and resulting traffic jams. He asserted that the Company does not discharge drivers for every ticket that they receive, but for situations in which they are personally involved by their own actions. Equipment violations are not regarded as causes for discharges; the Company accepts responsibility for them. Company policy is to discharge drivers for speeding, unsafe speed, flipping over tractor-trailers, and other unsafe personal conduct.

Russell testified that when he received the notice of the issuance of the ticket to Brewster, he advised Vogel of it and Vogel made it clear that violation of such important company policy aganist speeding was not to be tolerated. Accordingly, he telephoned Nicolette and instructed him to discharge Brewster, and the following week, in conformity with Brewster's request, issued a letter stating the reasons for the discharge. Vogel contributed to the text of the letter to the extent of suggesting that the safety manual be consulted and cited in the letter.

b. The rebuttal

Brewster disputed the Company's asserted emphasis on safety. He testified that the only training he received before starting consisted of accompanying a transport driver on a trip to Philadelphia, primarily for the purpose of acquainting himself with the route. He claimed testing procedures for new drivers were faulty and that the propane safety test was not administered to him by Nicolette until 15 July. He conceded, however, that Hall had tested him on 20 May, in a test where he indicated his awareness that he was not supposed to exceed posted speed limits. He claimed never to have been shown or given a copy of the Synergy Gas Corporation Safety Manual referred to in the discharge letter though he had, on several occasions, asked whether such a company policy or procedure existed. He asserted that a cynical attitude prevailed in the shop and that the drivers joked about tickets they received (apparently tickets for New York City curfew violations). Most importantly, he accused Nicolette of giving him a runaround when he noted safety violations on his pretrip reports and when he requested repairs to his vehicle's heater, lights, front-end, and jumped wires.

However, the evidence shows that adherence to safety requirements was not as loose as Brewster contended. He conceded that he was given a new truck, and considering the short period of his employment, it is obvious that he did not have to wait too long for his complaints to be heeded. Nicolette testified that he offered Brewster a copy of the redbook when he took the test, but Brewster declined it because he said he already had one. That is credible, for Brewster came on as a driver with 12 years' good prior experience and he presumably would have, or say he had, a copy of it and Nicolette would have no reason to doubt him. Brewster did not contradict Nicolettes' testimony on that point.

It appears that Respondents were far less casual than Brewster contended despite lapses in compliance with or enforcement of various controls over the drivers stipulated by various governmental regulations. Respondents sought to excuse their failures in that regard on the basis of a change in management at the South Plainfield branch and the failure of Hall's predecessor to comply with paperwork requirements. Hall, who started as branch manager in November 1986, pleaded that subsequent omissions on his part were due to the fact that he had been in the job only 11 months and was uncertain of many of the procedures involving compliance with Government regulations covering drivers. However, at the time of the events in issue, he had already been on the job for 8 or 9 months. Granting that Respondents can be faulted, however, their failure to complete paperwork, by not keeping required documentation on file and in the driver's qualification files, still does not necessarily negate the assertion that Brewster was fired for failure to comply with regulations, nor does it even tend to negate it, especially since the proof shows that the requisite checks regarding Brewster's background were made at the time he was hired and that, regardless of deficiencies in paperwork, the essentials of a safety program were enforced.

Brewster also contended that if Russell had not received notice of the ticket, he would not have been fired at all. Brewster testified that when he came in on Monday morning, 20 July, to see Nicolette and Hall, they asked him why he let the notification go to Long Island; they said they could have handled it "internally" if the notice had come to South Plainfield. (Nicolette, in his own testimony, mentioned a discussion he had with Brewster in the shop on the afternoon of 16 July in which the fact that the notice went to Farmingdale was discussed.) It had gone to Long Island because the Company's address was on the registration, and Brewster explained that to them. Brewster's testimony has the ring of truth to it, but I assign to it an altogether different significance than that attached to it by the General Counsel. To me, it appears obvious that the three men were all in agreement that the arrival at company headquarters of the news of Brewster's ticket for speeding spelled serious trouble for him. Their attitude leaves no doubt that Brewster's infraction ran counter to an important company policy that was vigorously enforced. This interpretation receives added support from Nicolette's uncontroverted testimony that, when asked about it, Brewster acknowledged receipt of the ticket, but claimed that he was not required to turn it over or let them know about it. The fact that Brewster made the reporting requirement a point of contention shows the existence of a consistent position by management and its view, and Brewster's awareness of the view, that such violations were serious. Brewster even thought the ticket was serious enough to warrant retaining legal counsel at his own expense.

The General Counsel's case depended heavily on suspicion in lieu of evidence in its attack on Russell's credibility on the subject of the contents of his discussions with Vogel after he received Brewster's ticket in the mail. Russell's testimony is characterized as incredible. His cross-examination was designed to suggest that a man like Vogel, concerned with the operations of a nationwide organization, was unlikely to busy himself with a traffic ticket issued to 1 of 1200 drivers on the payroll and that the discussions must, instead, have involved more important things, such as the Union's petition drive and Brewster's participation in it.

The only persons who would know are, of course, Russell and Vogel, and possibly Shientag. Vogel and Shientag were not called as witnesses by either side.

Unquestionably, the story presented by Russell has some peculiar facets to it. Brewster's speeding ticket and the Union's petition for an election engaged the attention of top management simultaneously, but the way Russell tells it, the traffic ticket caused more excitement at headquarters than the union petition. When Russell brought the union petition back to Farmingdale and gave it to Shientag, Shientag put it on his desk without opening it and without comment. Russell testified he did not have any conversation with Jon Vogel about it. The exact reverse obtained at South Plainfield. While Russell was there he asked Nicolette and Hall what "might have led to this" and prodded them for answers. They attempted to figure out whether the long-haul or short-haul drivers were the focus of the union drive. The petition related to both companies, and Russell testified, "I asked them if they knew of any problems we had at the plant and because the things were combined we couldn't identify it."

In stark contrast to the silence that Russell says greeted receipt of the petition, at headquarters, the speeding ticket caused a great stir. Russell reported it to Jon Vogel, and had several conversations with Vogel about it in the course of which a decision was made to discharge Brewster. He quoted Vogel as saying "that he didn't want anybody driving company vehicles and speeding in them, and particularly since this was a transport the danger was magnified substantially." Russell asserted that Brewster's failure to turn in the ticket magnified the incident, and that it was unusual because most drivers turn in the tickets whether they are for moving or equipment violations.

Russell seemed to amplify Vogel's role in the discharge every time he was asked to repeat the conversations. When it became necessary to write a discharge letter, it was Vogel who suggested that Russell "check and see if there was anything in the safety manual that would be involved here." The third paragraph of the letter was the result of Russell's research into the safety manual. He quoted Vogel as saying, on being shown the notice of the ticket, "John, you know, you're the Chairman of the Safety Committee and I don't think you would endorse that either and I said, you're correct."

Pondering Russell's testimony, it is unclear to me why the safety manual would have to be researched when a solid ground for discharge already supposedly existed, or why top executives stood making statesmanlike speeches. It is unclear why the Brewster incident was handled as if such cases had never arisen before, and without conference with either Shientag or the paralegal who normally handled such matters in the Farmingdale office. It is especially unclear when the Respondents' defense is that Brewster's discharge was in conformity with established company policy and precedent, and when it is asserted that tickets came in from all over the country. (I note, but am not particularly disturbed by, the discrepancies in the various versions Russell gave of the "complete" conversations with Vogel to which he was repeatedly asked to testify, or by the discrepancy between him and Nicolette about the time of day of his telephone direction to Nicolette to discharge Brewster. I can overlook a witness' omission of parts of a conversation under the pressure of examination.)

In weighing all the evidence in the record, however, one comes to the realization that Russell's testimony furnished a credible version of what occurred. I accept it on the basis of his demeanor as a witness, the basic cohesion inherent in his testimony, the fact that doubts about it exist only doubts and do not exist as rebutting evidence, and the fact that there is no rebutting evidence.

Reflection shows that Russell's story is, in fact, highly plausible. Under the Company's normal procedures, drivers who receive tickets hand them in at the branches, which forward them to a paralegal at the central office in Framingdale, New York. Brewster's ticket came to Russell's attention accidentally and his first inquiry was whether the branch or area managers had been apprised of it. That is what he could reasonably have been expected to do. Since firing an employee is a serious matter in most business concerns, it is plausible that Russell, having become involved in Brewster's situation and being the officer responsible for safety matters, would pursue it personally and might discuss it with Vogel.

Russell testified that he spends little time in Vogel's office. That raises a question about why he would elect to do so on a matter such as Brewster's ticket. The explanation, of course, is the seriousness of Brewster's offense and its consequences. Yet, even if the ticket is treated as a minor matter, I do not find it incredible as does counsel for the General Counsel, that strict logic and efficiency did not govern Russell's conduct on that morning. He could have turned it over to the paralegal and need not have mentioned it to Vogel, but the existence of alternative courses of action does not require that his testimony be discredited. The state of the evidence, however, is that issuance of speeding tickets to drivers of propane tankers was an infrequent occurrence and not one to be anticipated in the course of normal operations, and that it was regarded as a serious matter. Russell's testimony about his talks with Vogel is unrebutted and I credit it. The gist of Russell's testimony is that the Company did not want drivers exceeding speed limits while driving their $130,000 tank trucks fully loaded with liquid propane, and Brewster did it, got a ticket for it, and did not report it, so they fired him. That is not hard to believe.

Further, I note that any link between the Vogel-Russell discussions and other events is purely speculative. There is no evidence that at that time they were aware that Brewster had been working in support of the Union or that they discussed his activities. The argument of the General Counsel is, essentially, an invitation to speculate that Russell and Vogel could have discussed Brewster from the standpoint of union activity or in connection with the union petition because they could have known about it from other management personnel who could have told them because they had sons who could have known about it and could have reported it to their parents. We are drowning in "could's" without a scintilla of evidence warranting an inference that any of these things actually happened.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Synergy Gas Corporation and Propane Transportation Corporation constitute a single employer for jurisdictional purposes and are now, and have been at all times material, engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 863, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO is now and has been at all times material a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondents have not engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[2]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[2] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Hussmann Corporation and International Molders & Allied Workers, AFL–CIO, CLC. Case 15–CA–10270–2

September 15, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On February 2, 1988, Administrative Law Judge J. Pargen Robertson issued the attached decision.[1] The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs, and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Hussmann Corporation, Mt. Meigs, Alabama, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent, a Delaware corporation with principal offices located in St. Louis, Missouri, is engaged in the manufacture of coolers and freezers at its Mt. Meigs, Alabama facility. During the past 12 months, the Respondent purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 at its Mt. Meigs facility directly from points located outside the State of Alabama.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by terminating employee George Smoke because of his union activity. In doing so, we do not rely on the judge's finding that "several, perhaps all" the employees discharged under the Respondent's 3-day absentee rule had been tendered greater latitude than Smoke. In rejecting the Respondent's defense that it discharged Smoke in reliance on a good-faith belief that Smoke had violated the 3-day absentee rule, we rely in particular on the judge's crediting of Smoke's testimony that he had called in on March 31 and April 2, his discrediting of Supervisor Schwalbach's testimony that Smoke had claimed only to have called in on April 2, and his finding that the Respondent discharged Smoke without having made an investigation that could reasonably show that Smoke had in fact failed, in violation of the rule, to call in on any of the 3 days.

Clement Kennigton, for the General Counsel.
Christopher C. Antone and Greg Richer Esqs. (Jackson, Lewis, Schnitzler & Krupman), of Atlanta, Georgia, for the Respondent.
Gerald T. Parks, Staff Representative, of Anniston, Alabama, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

J. PARGEN ROBERTSON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard in Montgomery, Alabama, on 18 June 1987. The complaint, which issued on 20 May 1987, based on a charge filed on 9 April 1987, alleged that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

In its answer Respondent admitted the comerce allegations that it is an employer engaged in commerce and that the Charging Party (Union) is a labor organization. Respondent did not admit, contending rather that it is without sufficient information, the allegations regarding the filing of the unfair labor practice charge. However, the original charge, the service sheet, and the postal returned receipt were received in evidence without objection from Respondent. Those documents show that the charge was signed by the Union as charging party on 6 April 1987, that the charge was filed on 9 April 1987, and that Respondent, by Donna Wyatt, executed the postal return receipt on 20 April 1987. Because there was no evidence disputing the above-mentioned documents, I credit the above evidence.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE EVIDENCE

A. No Solicitation

The General Counsel made several allegations that Respondent promulgated, enforced, and threatened employees regarding union solicitation on 9 March 1987.

Plant Manager Ned Gallis was called as an adverse witness by the General Counsel. Gallis admitted Respondent's employees engaged in two union organizing campaigns, that elections were held in May of both 1986 and 1987, and that Respondent openly opposed the Union on both those occasions.

The 1987 campaign was initiated with a union meeting with some of Respondent's employees on 8 March 1987. Those employees were advised to notify Respondent that they were engaging in union organizing activities. Union Staff Representative Parks testified that employee Ray Pruett was the primary employee spokesman for the Union in 1987.

On 9 March Ray Pruett rode to work with alleged discriminatee George Smoke. While at breakfast, en route to work, Smoke signed a union authorization card.

When Smoke and Pruett arrived at Respondent's facility, they prepared to solicit union cards at the back landing. Pruett offered a union card to employee Morrell Foster. Foster said he had already received a union card. After a few minutes Smoke and Pruett decided to wait and tell Plant Manager Gallis about the organizing activities before continuing to solicit. They entered that plant and, between the restroom and Plant office Manager Gallis' were discussing the 8 March union meeting, when Supervisor Leroy Hobbs approached. According to both Smoke[1] and Pruett, Hobbs said that he wanted to offer Pruett some friendly advise not to be passing cards out on company property. Hobbs testified that he told Pruett "not to be handing [union cards] out after the whistle blew, or during working time."

After the conversation with Hobbs, employees Pruett, Smoke, Jeff Fuller, James Goggans, and Scott Blackwell went into Plant Manager Gallis office. Gallis recalled that, in addition to himself, Supervisors Leroy Hobbs, Doug Cannon, and Mike Farrell were also present. Pruett told Gallis that the employees would conduct a union campaign on company property during nonwork-time. Pruett went on:

> He [Gallis] stressed it would be on our own time, and I told him, yes, it would. And he told me that passing out cards on Company time would be a violation of company policy and could result in termination.
> Q. Okay. Then what happened?
> A. Doug Cannon asked me if it was going to be on company premises. I told him yes, but on our own time. I thanked Mr. Gallis for his time and for listening to us and left the office and went to the break area to hand out union cards.

Gallis recalled that he told employees: "On the right time. I told them to be sure and do it on the rules, be sure and not do it during working time or they could get in trouble."

On that same day Plant Manager Gallis prepared a memo to General Manager Tim Garvey:

> 3/9/87 6:55 A.M.
> Ray Pruett—Spokesman
> Jeff Fuller
> Scott Blackwell
> James Dobbins
> George Smoke
> The above group of employees came into the shop office and advised me that they would conduct union business on company property on their own time.
> I accepted their demand, but told them to abide with all rules, and not to do any union business on company time or they would be in trouble. They accepted my reply.

Plant Manager Gallis admitted that by the word "trouble" he meant that employees "would end up getting fired for not working, but soliciting."

After meeting with Plant Manager Gallis, Smoke and Pruett solicited union cards for 3 or 4 minutes until it was time to start work. Smoke testified, without rebuttal, that Plant Manager Gallis and Supervisor Jim Schwalbach passed through the break area while he and Pruett were soliciting cards.

Plant Manager Gallis testified that in March 1987 Respondent was in the process of "revamping the rules." Gallis testified the rule on solicitation was taken down after the 1986 union campaign and was not reposted. Gallis admitted that the first the employees had direct notice that there was a rule against soliciting on company time was when he told them of the rule during the 9 March 1987 meeting.

B. George Smoke Discharge

George Smoke was terminated on 2 April 1987 for the stated reason: "23 days consecutive absent without notification. (G.C. Exh. 2-g.)

At material times one of Respondent's work rules dealt with absenteeism and the requirement to call in:[2]

> ANY EMPLOYEE WHO FAILS TO REPORT FOR WORK MUST CALL THE OFFICE (271-0730) by 9:00 A.M. OF THAT DAY TO REPORT THE REASON FOR ABSENCE !!!
> ANY EMPLOYEE WHO DOES NOT REPORT FOR WORK FOR THREE (3) CONSECUTIVE DAYS WITHOUT CALLING IN WILL BE CONSIDERED TO HAVE VOLUNTARILY RESIGNED FROM HIS JOB !!!

The evidence demonstrated that Respondent has on regular occasions enforced the 3-day rule by discharging employees.

There is no question that George Smoke missed work on 31 March and 1 and 2 April 1987. The evidence is undisputed that Smoke suffered from the flu, beginning when he was at work on 30 March. On 31 March Smoke visited a Dr. Kulkarn. The statement from Kulkarn (G.C. Exh. 7), was given to a foreman of Respondent on the afternoon of 3 April, the day Smoke was notified of his termination.

Although Respondent questions Smoke's involvement with the Union in its briefs, the evidence is not disputed that Smoke engaged in union activities beginning on 9 March 1987 and that Respondent was aware that Smoke was working for the Union. Plant Manager Gallis admitted that Smoke was one of the employees that met with him and told him of the Union's campaign on 9 March. Also the evidence stands unrebutted that Supervisor Leroy Hobbs approached Ray Pruett and Smoke and spoke about union solicitation in the plant on the morning of 9 March. It is undisputed that Supervisor Schwalbach and Plant Manager Gallis passed through the break area on 9 March as Smoke was soliciting union cards before work.

There is little controversy regarding the events that led to Smoke's discharge. On Monday, 30 March, although Smoke felt ill while at work, he completed the workday. Ray Pruett testified that he noticed that Smoke looked ill as they rode home together after work. Smoke admitted to Pruett that he was "feeling bad."

On 31 March Smoke phoned the plant "around" 8 a.m. and said that he "would not be in, and that [he] was going to the doctor to find out what my problem was." Respondent offered no probative evidence to dispute

[2] I do not credit the testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses Bruce LaFogg and Dorothy Miller to the extent their testimony cast doubt on the existence of the 3-day absentee rule. Both Ray Pruett and George Smoke admitted the existence of the 3-day rule.

Smoke's testimony that he phoned in on 31 March.[3] Nor is it disputed that Smoke was ill or that he visited a Dr. Kulkarn on that day. Moreover, it is not disputed that on 3 April, Smoke furnished Respondent with a statement from Dr. Kulkarn showing that he visited the doctor on 31 March.

Plant Manager Gallis originally testified that Smoke should have talked to his supervisor when he phoned in. Later in his testimony, Gallis admitted that employees were not required to talk to their supervisors. The written rule requires only that employees "must call the office." Moreover, the record shows that employees routinely reported to Respondent's receptionists. Therefore, Smoke's testimony that he reported his absence to the woman that answered the phone for Respondent on 31 March shows that he complied with the phone-in requirement of Respondent's 3-day rule.

George Smoke admitted that he did not phone in on 1 April. Smoke's wife told him she would phone in, but she failed to make the call.

Smoke testified that he phoned between 10 and 11 on 2 April and told the receptionist that he would not be in that day. Again there was no direct evidence disputing Smoke's testimony. Supervisor Schwalbach, however, testified that on 3 April he investigated Smoke's claim and discovered that all the women that Schwalbach felt could have received Smoke's call on 2 April denied receiving a call from Smoke.

According to the testimony of Plant Manager Gallis, Supervisor Schwalbach came to him at 9 a.m. on 2 April and told him that George Smoke had missed 3 days without phoning in. Gallis testified the matter was cut and dry and he told Schwalbach to terminate Smoke. Gallis admitted that he conducted no investigation other than his interview with Supervisor Schwalbach.

Smoke's termination report was signed by Schwalbach on 2 April 1987. The plant manager testified that Schwalbach had the "paper already filled out" when he and Schwalbach talked at 9 a.m. on 2 April.

On 3 April George Smoke was phoned by Ray Pruett. Pruett told Smoke that Respondent was getting ready to terminate him. Smoke then phoned Supervisor Jim Schwalbach. Schwalbach admitted that Smoke phoned him between 8:30 and 9:30 a.m. on 3 April.

Both Smoke and Schwalbach testified during that phone conversation that Schwalbach told Smoke that Smoke was being terminated because he had missed 3 consecutive days without calling in. Nevertheless, a significant dispute in testimony involves one element of the Smoke-Schwalbach phone call on the morning of 3 April. According to Smoke, among other things, he told Schwalbach "that I had called in, and that I had talked to the receptionist." Schwalbach's a testimony differs from Smoke's in that Schwalbach understood Smoke to say that "he did call in on Thursday, April 1."

[3] Supervisor Schwalbach testified that he was unaware of Smoke calling in on either 31 March or 2 April. However, Smoke did not contend that he talked to Schwalbach, and Schwalbach admitted that he did not investigate whether Smoke phoned on 31 March. Schwalbach testified Smoke told him that he phoned in on 2 April, but that Smoke said nothing to him about phoning in on 31 March.

The significance of the above dispute relates to Schwalbach's actions after talking to Smoke. According to Schwalbach he then conducted an investigation. However, because Smoke mentioned only 2 April as a date he phoned in, Schwalbach specifically limited his investigation to the question whether Smoke phoned in on 2 April. Schwalbach admittedly did not investigate whether Smoke had phoned in on 31 March or 1 April. According to Schwalbach, his investigation failed to support Smoke's contention that he had phoned in on 2 April.

On 3 April Smoke's termination paper reached the office of General Manager Tim Garvey. Garvey testified that he called Jim Schwalbach because Schwalbach had signed Smoke's termination paper. Schwalbach told Garvey that he had talked to Smoke and that Smoke claimed he had phoned in on 2 April. However, Schwalbach told Garvey that "he had checked out the story, and he could find no indication of the fact that [Smoke] had called." Garvey told Schwalbach he would have to notify Smoke that he was terminated.

C. Discussion

Despite Respondent's argument to the contrary, I find George Smoke was a credible witness. His testimony was supported by the testimony of Raymond Pruett who also impressed me as credible. The demeanor of both George Smoke and Ray Pruett convinced me that they testified truthfully. Pruett's testimony was in substantial accord with the testimony of all other witnesses. Only Pruett's (and Smoke's) testimony regarding comments by Leroy Hobbs was seriously disputed.

George Smoke's testimony illustrated candor. For example, Smoke admitted that Respondent was not phoned on the day of his second consecutive absence. Smoke testified before anyone else concerning his actions regarding the call-in rule when he missed work on 31 March and 1 and 2 April. Despite Smoke's admission of the existence of the call-in rule, Smoke admitted that on 1 April his wife failed to phone Respondent even though she told Smoke she would make the call. Moreover, Smoke's testimony accords with that of witnesses for both the General Counsel and Respondent. His testimony finds support in the testimony of Plant Manager Gallis, Supervisors Schwalbach and Hobbs, and employee Ray Pruett except as noted below.

Regarding Smoke's disagreement with Supervisor Schwalbach, the dispute involves only a segment of their early morning phone conversation on 3 April. As to his disagreement with Supervisor Hobbs, both Smoke and Pruett recalled that Hobbs said they could not pass out union cards on company premises or property. Hobbs testified that he said they could not pass out union cards "after the whistle blew, or during working time."

Respondent attacked Smoke's credibility regarding testimony that he told Supervisor Schwalbach of his 31 March visit to a doctor. However, the evidence is unrebutted that Smoke did visit Dr. Kulkarn on 31 March. A note from Dr. Kalkarn was given to a foreman of Respondent's on 3 April. The note, which is in evidence, indicates, according to Smoke, that he had a type of flu.

Respondent also argues that Smoke was not at home when Supervisor Schwalbach phoned back on 3 April. That testimony is rebutted by Smoke who testified it is incredible that Smoke was asleep in view of his imminent discharge, I do not find that contention incredible considering Smoke's illness.

Also Respondent argues that Smoke's reaction to his final discharge is incredible. However, Smoke's resigned attitude is not disputed. In fact Smoke's testimony regarding his action when he came to the plant later on 3 April are in accord with the testimony of Supervisor Schwalbach. That reaction does not appear strange considering Smoke's illiness. Moreover, the charge itself, which was signed by the Union on the following Monday, 6 April, shows that Smoke was in fact upset to the extent of immediately contacting the Union about his discharge.

Schwalbach's testimony regarding Smoke's discharge was not impressive. Schwalbach recalled that he submitted Smoke's termination papers on 3 April. However, the termination document itself and testimony of Plant Manager Gallis show that Schwalbach prepared the termination report on 2 April. Gallis testified that he talked with Schwalbach about discharging Smoke on the third day of Smoke's absences without calling in. The third day was 2 April. Gallis recalled they talked right at 9 a.m. Gallis' testimony squares with the testimony of Smoke. On 3 April Schwalbach admittedly talked with Smoke between 8:30 and 9:30. During that conversation he told Smoke he had already sent in Smoke's termination papers. On 2 April, according to Gallis, Schwalbach had Smoke's termination paper with him and Schwalbach said that Smoke had not phoned in on that date.

Gallis' testimony appears to be correct. Smoke said he called in between 10 and 11 on 2 April. If so, Gallis' testimony that Schwalbach told Gallis, at 9 a.m., that Smoke had not called in that day would be in accord with Smoke's testimony.

On the other hand if the facts are as related by Schwalbach, then he wrote up the termination and talked with Plant Manager Gallis on 3 April. Under that scenario Schwalbach would have told Gallis at 9 o'clock that Smoke had not phoned in on that date. Schwalbach, however, admitted that Smoke did phone in between 8:30 and 9:30 a.m. on 3 April. If Smoke had phoned in before Schwalbach talked with Gallis, it stands to reason that Schwalbach would not have misrepresented to his own supervisor that Smoke had not called that day. If, on the other hand, Smoke phoned shortly after Schwalbach's 9 a.m. talk with Gallis, the time would certainly have impressed Schwalbach. Obviously, Schwalbach would have recalled that Smoke phoned just a short time after Schwalbach told his boss that Smoke had not called. Therefore, Schwalbach's own testimony illustrates that he was not correct when he testified that he began to process Smoke's termination on 3 April. The testimony of Gallis and General Manager Garvey illustrates that Schwalbach discussed Smoke's termination with Gallis on 2 April and with Garvey on 3 April.

Because of their demeanor and the entire record, I credit the testimony of George Smoke and Ray Pruett.

D. Findings

1. No solicitation

The credited testimony shows that Supervisor Leroy Hobbs stated on 9 March, in the presence of employees Ray Pruett and George Smoke, that he wanted to offer Pruett friendly advise about not passing out union cards on company property.

In an on the-record discussion regardng a motion to dismiss, I commented that I did not feel that Hobbs' comments, constituted a threat of unspecified reprisals. On reflection, however, it is clear that Hobbs was telling the employees not to pass out cards at the plant. Obviously such a comment includes a broad admonition that incorporates both working and nonworking time.

Moreover, immediately after Hobbs' comment, Hobbs attended Plant Manager Gallis' meeting with Smoke, Pruett, and three other employees. During that meeting nothing was said to remedy any wrong impressions from Hobbs' earlier comments, and Plant Manager Gallis testified that he told the employees they "would be in trouble" if they decided not, among other things, to "abide with all rules" (See G.C. Exh. 3, Gallis' memorandum dated 9 March 1987).

Because of the above I find, in agreement with the General Counsel, that Hobbs did implicitly threaten employees with unspecified reprisals even though he began his comments by offering "friendly advise." Additionally, in that conversation Hobbs verbally promulgated a overly broad no-solicitation rule by prohibiting solicitation on company property.

Regarding the no-solicitation rule announced by Plant Manager Gallis, employees Bruce LaFogg, Dorothy Miller, and George Smoke testified they were unaware of the enforcement of a no-solicitation rule before 9 March and that employees and supervisors actually engaged in solicitation, including punchcards, Tupperware, and football pools during worktime and breaktime in the plant. Although Supervisor Leroy Hobbs testified that he chased employee Tommie Lutlow out of his department because Lutlow was soliciting Tupperware on an occasion in 1986, Hobbs admitted that he solicited football pools and asked his secretary to solicit for his son during break and nonworking time. Hobbs also admitted that other employees have come to him and solicited things during worktime. Hobbs testified, "I have not said anything to them." Orval Kent Food Co., 278 NLRB 402 (1986).

Because of the above evidence and Plant Manager Gallis' admission that the no-solicitation rule was removed after the 1986 union campaign, I find that Respondent promulgated and maintained a no-solicitation rule on 9 March 1987 to discourage its employees union activities. Harry M. Stevens Services, 277 NLRB 276 (1985). Moreover, the credited testimony of Pruett and Smoke proves that Respondent, through Plant Manager Gallis, threatened employees with discharge if they violated its illegal no-solicitation rule.

2. George Smoke

The credited evidence shows that Respondent terminated George Smoke on 2 April because of Smoke's union activities. On 9 March Respondent learned that Smoke was one of five employees enegaged in union organizing activities. Moreover, earlier on 9 March Respondent became aware that Smoke was directly involved with the leading union advocate, Ray Pruett. Pruett demonstrated his leading role when he acted as spokesman at the 9 March meeting with Plant Manager Gallis. Before that meeting Smoke and Pruett had solicited for the Union on Respondent's back landing and they were cautioned by Supervisor Leroy Hobbs near Plant Manager Gallis' office. Immediately after the meeting in Gallis' office, Smoke and Pruett solicited union cards in the breakroom.

Respondent, through Plant Manager Gallis, admitted its opposition to the Union. That opposition was further demonstrated by Respondent's illegal activities regarding no-solicitation.

The testimony of Plant Manager Gallis illustrated Respondent's eagerness to terminate Smoke. At 9 a.m. on 2 April, Supervisor Jim Schwalbach presented Gallis with an opportunity to terminate one of the leading union pushers. At that time Schwalbach told Gallis that Smoke had missed 3 consecutive days without calling. In fact, 2 April was Smoke's third day of absence. Neither Schwalbach nor anyone else had conducted an investigation to see if Smoke had phoned anyone other than Schwalbach. Although Schwalbach testified that he conducted an investigation on 3 April, he admittedly never conducted a full investigation involving all 3 days of absence. No effort was made to determine what had happened to Smoke. At the direction of Gallis, Smoke was terminated on 2 April.

By the above, the General Counsel has established a prima facie case that Smoke was illegally terminated.

Regarding the question whether Smoke would have been terminated in the absence of union activities, the record includes documentation of nine employees, including Smoke, who was discharged in 1986 and 1987 for violation of Respondent's 3-day rule.

Record documents show there were approximately 100 employees in Respondent's bargaining unit in the spring of 1987.

Although, as mentioned above, nine employees were terminated under the 3-day rule, there was no showing that any of those employees, other than Smoke, contended that they did not violate the rule. Of those nine, three of the documents, other than Smoke's, indicate only that the employee missed 3 consecutive days without reporting. Regarding others, Rob Lockhart's termination shows that he was absent on Thursday, 5/28; Friday, 5/29; Saturday, 5/30; and Monday, 6/1, and that he was discharged on 6/1/87. Sharpe Green's termination record states, "left work station and absent 3-days without notification." Randy Winters' termination record states "absent over three days without notification" (emphasis added). Gregg Zachary's record states 3-day out and > Gregg went to Doctor's office and tried to get Dr. to give him an excuse from work for the week. Gregg said that he was playing in a state tournament and did not want to chance hurting his knee. The Doctor told him he was able to work. The Doctor's office then called us and told us what Gregg had asked.

Doug Scarbrough's termination record includes the comment "on pay 10 day absent 4."

The above record shows that several, perhaps all, the employees discharged under the 3-day rule were tendered greater latitude than Smoke. Lockhart, Green, Winters, Zachary, and Scarbrough were not discharged until Respondent had justification that exceeded that afforded Smoke.

Of primary import, however, is the record evidence that shows that George Smoke did not violate Respondent's 3-day rule. Smoke's credited testimony shows that he personally phoned in on 31 March. That testimony stands unrebutted. Even if I should credit Jim Schwalbach's testimony that Smoke only mentioned phoning in on 2 April, it would remain that Smoke claimed both before and during the hearing that he also called in on 31 March. Nevertheless, no evidence was offered to rebut Smoke's testimony in that regard. I must assume that if Respondent had called its receptionists, one of them would have corroborated Smoke's testimony that he called in on 31 March 1987. Therefore, at best, Smoke had missed only 2 consecutive days without calling in when Respondent discharged him on 2 April 1987.

Moreover, even if I should credit Schwalbach that he did not terminate Smoke until 3 April, the record would show that Smoke did not violate the 3-day rule. Even Schwalbach admitted that Smoke phoned in as early as 8:30 a.m. on 3 April 1987. Therefore, even assuming the very best case for Respondent, it appears that Smoke missed no more than 2 days, 1 and 2 April 1987, without calling in by 9 a.m.

Respondent also argues that it had a reasonable belief that Smoke missed 3 consecutive days without calling in. The credited evidence shows that Respondent had no such belief. Respondent failed to produce any evidence that Smoke did not call in on 31 March. In order to establish reasonable belief it is necessary to show that Respondent actually believed that Smoke failed to comply with the 3-day rule. As shown above it was admitted that Smoke could have complied with the rule if he phoned the receptionist on 31 March. However, Respondent never checked with the receptionist to see if Smoke called in on 31 March. It is beyond belief that Respondent would not have checked out Smoke's story at some point. In the absence of some showing that Smoke did not call in on 31 March, I must conclude that Respondent did not have reasonable belief that Smoke missed that day without calling in. All I have before me in the record on Respondent's side of the ledger is a showing that Jim Schwalbach and Nick Gallis agreed to discharge Smoke at their earliest opportunity—9 a.m., on 2 April 1987. At that time Respondent did not know whether Smoke had phoned in on 31 March and 1 April. It knew only that Smoke had not talked with Schwalbach even though he was not at work on 31 March and 1 April and had not reported by 9 a.m., on 2 April. Neither Schwalbach nor Gallis, at that time or at any time subsequently, made any effort to see if Smoke had talked with anyone else on 31 March or 1 April. That evidence shows nothing more than an eagerness to terminate George Smoke. It does not illustrate a reasonable belief that Smoke had violated the 3-day rule. Central Management Co., 284 NLRB 825 (1987).

I find that Respondent terminated George Smoke because of his union activity and Respondent failed to prove that Smoke would have been terminated in the absence of union activities.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Hussmann Corporation is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. International Molders and Allied Workers Union, AFL–CIO–CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. by promulgating and enforcing a no-solicitaion rule on 9 March 1987 in order to discourage its employees from supporting or assisting the Union, by threatening its employees with discharge for violating its illegal no-solicitation rule, by promulgating a no-solicitation rule prohibiting union solicitation on company property, and by threatening employees with unspecified reprisals if they engaged in union solicitation on company property, Respondent engage in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By discharging employee George Smoke on 2 April 1987, Respondent has engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall order it to cease and desist therefrom, and to take certain affirmative aciton designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent has illegaly terminated its employee George Smoke in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall order Respondent to offer Smoke immediate and full reinstatement to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges, and to make Smoke whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of the discrimination aganst him. Backpay shall be computed in the manner described in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[4]

[4] Under New Horizons for the Retarded, interest is computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest accrued before 1 January 1987 (the effective date of the amendment) shall be computed as in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

The Respondent, Hussmann Corporation, Mt. Meigs, Alabama, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging and otherwise discriminating against employees because of their union and other protected concerted activities.

(b) Interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, by promulgating and enforcing a no-solicitation rule to discourage its employees from supporting or assisting the Union, by threatening its employees with discharge for violating its illegal no-solicitation rule, by promulgating a no-solicitation rule prohibiting union solicitation on company property and by threatening employees with unspecified reprisals if they engage in union solicitation on company property.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer immediate and full reinstatement to George Smoke to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights or privileges, and make Smoke whole for any loss he may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against him in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Remove from George Smoke's personnel file any reference to its termination of him, and notify Smoke in writing that this has been done and that the evidence of his unlawful termination will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against him.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Montgomery, Alabama facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 15, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[5] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[6] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT promulgate or enforce a rule against solicitation in order to discourage our employees from supporting or assisting International Molders and Allied Workers Union, AFL–CIO–CLC or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees with discharge for violating our illegal no-solicitation rule.

WE WILL NOT promulgate a no-solicitation rule prohibiting union solicitation on company property.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees with unspecified reprisals if they engage in union solicitation on company property.

WE WILL NOT discharge our employees because they engage in union activities or other concerted activities protected under the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL abolish our no-solicitation rule which was promulgated in order to discourage our employees from supporting or assisting the Union, and WE WILL abolish our rule prohibiting employees from engaging in union solicitation on company property.

WE WILL offer immediate and full reinstatement to George Smoke to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights or privileges.

WE WILL make George Smoke whole for any loss of earning he may have suffered by reason of our discrimination against him with interest.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On November 10, 1986, Administrative Law Judge J. Pargen Robertson issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions, supporting briefs, and answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions, to modify the remedy,[1] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[2]

The General Counsel excepts to the judge's refusal to allow the complaint to be amended to include an additional 8(a)(1) and (3) allegation concerning employee Don Kelley's discharge on August 19, 1985. Kelley was named as an alleged discriminatee, along with eight other employees,[3] in a charge filed September 30, 1985 (Case 10–CA–21246). This charge was withdrawn November 14, 1985. On January 6, 1986, the charge in the instant case was filed alleging that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by terminating the employment of all the employees named in the September charge with the exception of Kelley. This charge was amended March 3, 1986, to include seven additional employees who were also laid off August 15, 1985. Kelley's name was not included in this amended charge. On May 6, 1986, the Charging Party, by telegram, requested that the charge be amended further to include Kelley's name.

The General Counsel moved at the hearing to amend the complaint to include an allegation concerning Kelley's discharge.[4] The judge first granted the General Counsel's motion to amend but then denied it after reviewing the parties' arguments during a recess in the hearing. The judge relied on Winer Motors,[5] prohibiting the revival of withdrawn charges outside the 6-month limitations period, to find the allegation concerning Kelley's discharge barred by Section 10(b). Apparently the judge interpreted Winer Motors as prohibiting the revival outside the 10(b) period of any allegation contained in a withdrawn charge, no matter how closely related it is to another timely filed charge that is still pending. Thus, he refused to take any evidence on the circumstances surrounding Kelley's discharge to determine whether that allegation was closely related to the allegations in the pending timely charge, stating that Kelley's "separate discharge" was not sufficient "to trigger the 'relate back' doctrine." In his decision, the judge denied the General Counsel's posthearing request that he reconsider this ruling on the motion to amend.

In her exceptions, the General Counsel argues that the motion to amend the complaint should have been granted because Kelley's discharge is closely related to the allegations in the timely filed January charge. The General Counsel contends that this is not an attempt to resurrect the dead allegations of the withdrawn September charge outside the 10(b) period, but rather an attempt to add closely related allegations to the January charge which has been pending and viable at all times since it was filed.

Contrary to the judge, we would allow the General Counsel to litigate the allegation that employee Kelley's discharge violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1). Even though Kelley's discharge occurred more than 6 months before the General Counsel's motion to amend the complaint, we would not find the amendment barred under Section 10(b) as the judge did, because the discharge occurred within 6 months of a timely filed charge and the alleged violation appears to be closely related to the allegations of that charge. Furthermore, unlike the judge, we do not find the withdrawal of an earlier timely charge concerning Kelley's discharge relevant in

[1] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[2] The Respondent's exceptions state, and we agree, that the figure representing the Respondent's weekly sales bookings for the week ending August 2, 1985, should read $92,157 and not $95,157 as it appears in the table of weekly sales bookings in the judge's decision. It follows, therefore, that the total figure should read $235,548 and not $238,548 for the 3-week period covering August 2, 1985. However, this error does not affect the validity of judge's ultimate conclusion regarding the August 15 layoffs.

The General Counsel has requested that the Order include a visitatorial clause. We find no need for such remedial provision in the circumstances of this case. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

Finally, we have modified the judge's recommended Order to include a notification paragraph and have attached a new notice to our Decision and Order because the judge failed to include an expunction provision in the recommended notice attached to his decision.

[3] Seven of the other alleged discriminatees were laid off August 15, 1985. They are Robert Plemons, Bobby McFalls, Brenda F. Harte, Fred W. Harte, Marguerite Price, Diana Lowe, and Michael C. Parris. The eighth, Diane Hartman, was discharged September 20, 1985.

[4] The record does not indicate whether the General Counsel took any other action in response to the Charging Party's attempt to amend the charge.

deciding whether the discharge allegation is closely related to the charge in this case. Neither Winer Motors nor Ducane Heating Corp.[6] applies here, because neither case involved an attempt to add closely related allegations to a pending charge. Rather, each involved an attempt to reinstate the dead allegations themselves without reference to any other pending timely charge.[7] Instead, we would apply the traditional Board test to determine if the untimely allegation is factually and legally related to the allegations of the timely charge, without regard to whether another charge encompassing the untimely allegation has been withdrawn or dismissed.

On the record here, it appears that Kelley's discharge may be sufficiently intertwined with the other layoff and discharge allegations of this charge to be considered closely related under the traditional Board test. Because the judge did not permit the General Counsel to present any evidence about the circumstances surrounding Kelley's discharge, however, it is not possible to be sure. Therefore, we will remand that allegation to the judge for further evidence and findings both on the merits and on whether all the 8(a)(3) allegations are closely related.

Traditionally, the Board and the courts have allowed the General Counsel to add complaint allegations outside the 6-month 10(b) period if they are closely related to the allegations of the timely filed charge. The most frequently cited test for finding allegations closely related is set forth in Dinion Coil:[8]

> (1) A complaint, as distinguished from a charge, need not be filed and served within the six months, and may therefore be amended after the six months. (2) If a charge was filed and served within six months after the violations alleged in the charge, the complaint (or amended complaint), although filed after the six months, may allege violations not alleged in the charge if (a) they are closely related to the violations named in the charge, and (b) occurred within six months before the filing of the charge.

In deciding whether complaint amendments are closely related to allegations in the charge, the Board and the courts have looked at whether the amendments are factually and legally related to the charge. In National Licorice[9] the Supreme Court held that various complaint allegations were related to the charge when the violations alleged in the complaint were "of the same class of violations as those set up in the charge and were continuations of them in pursuance of the same objects." The Second Circuit has said that "the complaint issued by the Board must deal with the same subject matter and sequence of events . . . although the specific events stated in the complaint may precede or follow those stated in the 'charge.'"[10] Finally, the Board has found complaint allegations closely related when they "arise from the same factual situation, are of the same class as, and clearly related to, the [allegations] . . . set forth in the charge."[11]

When applying this "closely related" test, neither the Board nor the courts have mentioned the existence of another withdrawn or dismissed charge as a factor considered determinative or even relevant. They have only looked at whether there is a timely charge now pending that would support the new untimely allegation. We see no reason to depart from these well-established precedents.

In his dissent, Chairman Stephens relies on procedural due process and fairness concerns to find that the charge here did not put the Respondent on notice that it would have to defend against an allegation concerning Kelley's discharge. He finds the allegation concerning Kelley's discharge is barred by Section 10(b) because the withdrawal of an earlier charge alleging the unlawfulness of this discharge misled the Respondent into thinking it would not be held accountable for any illegality concerning the discharge after the 6-month 10(b) period expired. Even though he finds that Kelley's discharge is closely related to the allegations of a timely charge that was still pending after the 10(b) period ended, he concludes this second charge did not put the Respondent on notice that it would have to defend against an allegation that Kelley's discharge was unlawful. It is not the function of the charge, however, to give notice to a respondent of the specific claims made against him. Rather,

[7] In Ducane, Member Dennis specifically noted that the Board had no reason to pass on the question of whether another pending timely charge might have supported the dismissed allegations under a "closely related" theory, because of the way that case was litigated and briefed. In enforcing the Board's decision on this point, the Second Circuit stated that the additional complaint allegations "are all concerned with similar unfair labor practices designed to further the Company's common objective . . . represent 'closely related' parallel conduct toward other employees . . . and constitute 'the same class of violations as those set up in the charge.'" (Citing NLRB v. Fant Milling Co., 360 U.S. 301 (1959), and National Licorice, supra.)

that is the function of the complaint.[12] Denial of due process is usually claimed in cases when the complaint has never been amended to include allegations that have been litigated and found to be violations.[13] Here, although the initial complaint did not allege that Kelley's discharge was unlawful, the General Counsel moved to amend the complaint on the first day of the hearing to add an allegation concerning Kelley's discharge. In Dinion Coil,[14] the Second Circuit specifically rejected an argument that making a complaint amendment during the hearing was a denial of due process, absent some showing of surprise that would have hampered presentation of the respondent's defense at the hearing.[15] There is no such showing in this case.

The First Circuit has stated that the test for allowing allegations that have never been alleged in a complaint to be litigated and decided is "one of fairness under the circumstances of each case—whether the employer knew what conduct was in issue and had a fair opportunity to present his defense."[16] The Respondent here cannot claim surprise because it knew on the first day of the trial that Kelley's discharge was in issue and this was well before it would have had to present its defense on this issue. Furthermore, the Respondent here cannot claim it had insufficient time to prepare its defense or was denied an opportunity to present its case, as the judge refused to allow the General Counsel to amend the complaint or present evidence concerning Kelley's discharge, so no defense was necessary. By allowing the complaint amendment, we are remanding the case to the judge. Thus, both parties will now have the time to prepare and the opportunity to present their cases. That is all that is required to establish procedural due process.[17]

Chairman Stephens also finds that the Respondent here would be prejudiced if we allowed the complaint amendment because it was misled into believing it would not have to defend against this allegation by the withdrawal of the first charge and by the failure to allege Kelley's discharge in the second charge. He notes that these events might have induced the Respondent not to preserve evidence relevant to Kelley's discharge. If an untimely complaint amendment is indeed factually and legally related to the allegations of a timely charge, however, a reasonable respondent would necessarily have preserved evidence relevant to all of these interrelated events. Thus, a decision whether or not the complaint amendment here is closely related to the second charge would also resolve the question of prejudice without any independent inquiry whether this particular Respondent was actually prejudiced.

Furthermore, when there is a timely charge pending giving us the authority to proceed on closely related events, we cannot be concerned solely with a respondent's right to rest easy when 6 months have passed about what claims it might have to defend, because we also have a duty to protect certain public rights. As the Supreme Court stated in Fant Milling[18]

> The Board was created not to adjudicate private controversies but to advance the public interest in eliminating obstructions to interstate commerce. . . .
> Once its jurisdiction is invoked the Board must be left free to make full inquiry under its broad investigatory power in order properly to discharge the duty of protecting public rights which Congress has imposed upon it. There can be no justification for confining [12] It is well settled that it is the complaint, not the charge, that is supposed to give notice to a respondent of the specific claims made against it. The Second Circuit stated in Douds v. Longshoremen, 241 F.2d 278, 283–284 (2d Cir. 1957):

> The complaint, much like a pleading in a proceeding before a court, is designed to notify the adverse party of the claims that are to be adjudicated so that he may prepare his case, and to set a standard of relevance which shall govern the proceedings at the hearing.

The "charge" has a lesser function. It is not designed to give notice to the person complained of or to limit the hearing or to restrict the scope of the final order. It serves in the function of drawing the Board's attention to a cause for economic disturbance.

The Supreme Court agreed with this view in NLRB v. Fant Milling Co., 360 U.S. 301, 307–308 (1959), when Justice Stewart stated

> A charge filed with the Labor Board is not to be measured by the standards applicable to a pleading in a private lawsuit. Its purpose is merely to set in motion the machinery of an inquiry. . . . The responsibility of making that inquiry, and of framing the issues in the case is one that Congress has imposed upon the Board, not the charging party. To confine the Board in its inquiry and in framing the complaint to the specific matters alleged in the charge would reduce the statutory machinery to a vehicle for the vindication of private rights. This would be alien to the basic purpose of the Act.

See also Texas Industries v. NLRB, 336 F.2d 128, 132 (5th Cir. 1964), "[T]he charge is not a formal pleading, and its function is not to give notice to the respondent of the exact nature of the charges against him. . . . This is the function of the complaint."

[15] Moreover, in NLRB v. Atlas Linen Supply, supra, 322 F.2d at 220, the Sixth Circuit stated that if the complaint was never amended, but the issue had been fully litigated, the respondent could not "be heard to complain of lack of opportunity to meet the charges against it, even though the complaint be found lacking, for a complaint may be amended to conform to proof adduced on the hearing."

[17] See, e.g., NLRB v. Complas Industries, supra, 714 F.2d at 734, when the Seventh Circuit found a denial of due process because no adjournment was provided to allow the respondent a meaningful opportunity to meet the amended claim and the amendment occurred during a 1-day trial. The court, however, stated that if the General Counsel's evidence on the amendment had made out a prima facie case it would have remanded to provide the respondent with an opportunity to offer a valid explanation of its actions. such an inquiry to the precise particularizations of a charge.

Previous cases have generally not considered the existence of an earlier withdrawn or dismissed charge concerning the untimely allegation to have any bearing on the application of the "closely related" test.[19] Perhaps this is because before Ducane issued, the Board had interpreted the Act as allowing the General Counsel "virtually unlimited" discretion to reinstate dismissed charges outside the 10(b) period,[20] so there was no reason for the General Counsel to use the "closely related" test when the dismissed charge itself could be reinstated. Regarding withdrawn charges, the Board and the courts have traditionally found that they ceased to exist on withdrawal,[21] so there was no reason even to acknowledge a withdrawn charge when applying the "closely related" test to a later timely charge covering the same matters. Although Winer Motors and Ducane provide little guidance here, Koppers Co.,[22] which is cited in both Winer Motors and Ducane, is instructive. In Koppers, 163 NLRB at 517, the Board stated

> The practical effect of the proviso to Section 10(b) is that, absent the existence of a properly served charge on file, a party is assured that on any given day his liability under the Act is extinguished for any activities occurring more than 6 months prior thereto. [Emphasis added.]

When there is a pending timely charge on file, however, a respondent has no such right to assume his liability is extinguished; nor can he claim a lack of notice, at least about closely related allegations.

In deciding whether allegations are closely related, we will apply the traditional Board test described above to determine if the untimely allegation is factually and legally related to the allegations of the timely charge without regard to whether another charge encompassing the untimely allegation has been withdrawn or dismissed. A decision whether certain untimely allegations can be added to a complaint as closely related to a pending timely charge should be entirely separate from a decision whether a withdrawn or dismissed charge containing these untimely allegations can be reinstated outside the 10(b) period. Under the "closely related" test, there is no reason why a person who has never filed a timely charge concerning a particular allegation should be in a better position than a person who has attempted to preserve his rights by filing a timely charge that is later withdrawn or dismissed.

In applying the traditional "closely related" test in this case, we will look at the following factors. First, we shall look at whether the otherwise untimely allegations are of the same class as the violations alleged in the pending timely charge. This means that the allegations must all involve the same legal theory and usually the same section of the Act (e.g., 8(a)(3) reprisals against union activity). Second, we shall look at whether the otherwise untimely allegations arise from the same factual situation or sequence of events as the allegations in the pending timely charge. This means that the allegations must involve similar conduct, usually during the same time period with a similar object (e.g., terminations during the same few months directed at stopping the same union organizing campaign). Finally, we may look at whether a respondent would raise the same or similar defenses to both allegations, and thus whether a reasonable respondent would have preserved similar evidence and prepared a similar case in defending against the otherwise untimely allegations as it would in defending against the allegations in the timely pending charge.

Here, the facts show that Kelley's discharge occurred within 6 months before the filing of the timely charge in this case. Further, the untimely allegation concerning Kelley's discharge is of the same class as the other layoff and discharge allegations in the timely charge because they all involve retaliation against union activities in violation of Section 8(a)(3). The record does not establish, however, whether Kelley's discharge arose from the same factual situation or sequence of events as the other layoffs and discharge alleged in the timely charge or whether the Respondent would have preserved similar evidence and prepared a similar case in defending against that allegation.

All we know about Kelley's termination is the date it occurred (3 days after the layoffs and about 1 month before the other discharge) and that it was called a discharge. Although it appears that Kel-

[19] See, e.g., Soule Glass v. NLRB, supra, 652 F.2d at 1083. There, the First Circuit dismissed a unilateral change violation on due process grounds because there was no complaint allegation specifically stating such a claim and the other unilateral change allegation in the complaint could not fairly be read to give notice of this different type of unilateral change being unlawful. The court noted in passing that this additional 8(a)(5) violation had previously been specifically alleged in a charge, but the Regional Director had refused to issue complaint on it; however, the court apparently did not consider the earlier dismissal of this particular allegation relevant in deciding whether to allow the Board's finding of a violation to stand, as it did not rely on this point, but rather went on to discuss due process and rule on the merits. ley's discharge involves similar conduct during the same time period as the other discharge and layoffs, it is difficult to tell from this record if Kelley's discharge had the same object as the other discharge and layoffs or if the Respondent would have preserved similar evidence and prepared a similar case in defending against that allegation. Thus, there is no evidence about the circumstances surrounding Kelley's discharge, such as the reason given, what supervisor made the decision, the factual basis for the decision, and any statements made about him or his discharge by the Respondent. Further, although the record reveals that Kelley was one of two employees who initially contacted the Union, there is no evidence whether the Respondent knew of his union activities or expressed any animus toward them. Finally, there is no evidence about any asserted justification for Kelley's discharge, whether the Respondent would have asserted similar defenses to all the allegations, or whether a reasonable respondent would have preserved evidence necessary to these defenses.

On this record, we cannot determine whether the allegation concerning Kelley's discharge is closely related to the discharge and layoff allegations of the timely charge. Because there is no evidence about the circumstances surrounding Kelley's discharge or about any asserted justification for the discharge on which to base such a determination, we will allow litigation on the merits of that allegation to decide whether it is closely related to the other allegations. Only if we find that the allegations are closely related will we proceed to a decision on the merits of the otherwise untimely allegation.

This does not mean that we would always allow litigation on the merits of an untimely allegation that the General Counsel claims is closely related to the allegations of a timely filed charge. In some cases there may be enough information in the pleadings and the parties' position statements to determine whether the allegations are closely related. In other cases, the General Counsel may make an offer of proof that provides more evidence on which to base a decision. However, we have no such information here.

Accordingly, we will remand the allegation concerning Kelley's discharge to the judge for the purpose of hearing evidence and making findings both on the merits and on whether all the discharge and layoff allegations are closely related.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Redd-I, Inc., Chattanooga, Tennessee, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified:

1. Insert the following as paragraph 2(e).

"(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the allegation in this proceeding concerning the discharge of Don Kelley be remanded to Administrative Law Judge J. Pargen Robertson for the purpose of holding a hearing to obtain evidence and make findings both on the merits and on whether all of the discharge and layoff allegations are closely related.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the judge shall prepare and serve on the parties a supplemental decision containing findings of fact and conclusions of law in light of the Board's remand. Following service of the supplemental decision on the parties, the provisions of Section 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations shall be applicable.

CHAIRMAN STEPHENS, dissenting in part.

I disagree with the majority that under the circumstances of this case the "relation back" doctrine may warrant adding employee Kelley's discharge more than 6 months after the discharge occurred.[1] I would affirm the dismissal of the allegations regarding Kelley's discharge because, under the circumstances here, I do not believe that the Respondent was given timely notice during the 10(b) period that it might be called on to defend that discharge as part of an overall scheme to defeat the Union's campaign by a strategy of laying-off all suspected of being union supporters.

At the outset, I need to make clear my view of the latitude we possess in applying the 10(b) bar. Section 10(b) is a statute of limitations that must be applied to achieve its intended objectives; but it is not strictly "jurisdictional." Were it an inflexible limitation on jurisdiction, it would not be waivable; yet it is settled that this is a defense that will be deemed waived if not timely asserted.[2] Further, I

[1] I agree that Winer Motors, 265 NLRB 1457 (1982), and Ducane Heating Corp., 273 NLRB 1389 (1985), do not bar any application on the relation back doctrine. Indeed, it is noteworthy in this regard that Member Dennis, a member of the three-member panel in Ducane, expressly noted that, because of the way in which that case was litigated and briefed, the Board had no occasion to pass on the question whether proceeding on the allegations that the Board there dismissed might have been justified on a theory that they were "closely related" to a timely filed charge. 273 NLRB at 1391 fn. 9.

[2] Zipes v. Trans World Airlines, 455 U.S. 385, 395 fn. 11 (1982); Flex Plastics, 262 NLRB 651, 656 fn. 26 (1982), enfd. on other grounds 726 F.2d 272 (6th Cir. 1984); NLRB v. Penn Corp., 630 F.2d 561, 563 (8th Cir. 1979); *Shumate v. agree that it is subject to equitable tolling on grounds such as fraudulent concealment.[3] Thus, in applying the 10(b) limitation, we must determine simply whether it is essential to bar litigation of a particular allegation in order to effectuate the basic policy of protecting respondents with clean hands from being forced to defend against a claim of which they had not been given even the most general notice within a period of 6 months after the charging party knew or should have known of the claim.

The relation back doctrine, which is well established in Board law and accepted by the courts,[4] is one way of balancing the interest in permitting litigation of alleged violations of our statute that have been called to our attention against the interest in avoiding the sort of prejudice to a respondent that the 10(b) limitation is intended to prevent. Under that doctrine, we permit a belatedly raised allegation to be litigated so long as it relates to a charge that was timely filed. This doctrine, which has a partial counterpart in Rule 15(c) of the Rules of Civil Procedure,[5] also has support in the common understanding of the function of a "charge" in our proceedings because the 10(b) bar applies to the filing of an unfair labor practice charge rather than to the General Counsel's subsequent issuance of a complaint. As the Supreme Court made clear long ago in NLRB v. Fant Milling Co., 360 U.S. 301, 307 (1959), unfair labor practice charges may be read broadly and are "not to be measured by the standards applicable to pleading in a private lawsuit." Thus, a respondent cannot reasonably expect that all the particulars of the complaint that might ultimately issue against it will necessarily be included in the charge that starts up the Board's investigative machinery. Hence, if a respondent is charged with violating Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discriminatorily laying off employees to defeat a union and by interfering with the employees' Section 7 rights by those "and other acts," it can reasonably assume that contemporaneous unfair labor practices related to the employees' union activities might also be included in a subsequent complaint if the General Counsel decided to issue one. Clark Equipment Co., 278 NLRB 498 (1986); NLRB v. Complas Industries, supra, 714 F.2d at 733.

Although I recognize this significant difference between a charge and a complaint in our statutory scheme, I cannot agree with my colleagues that a charge has no notice function whatsoever. If it had no such function, there would be no reason for us to place the limitations of the relation back doctrine on subsequent amendments to a charge. It would be enough that a charge had started up our machinery against a particular respondent, and a respondent's protest against facing a totally new type of charge could be answered by saying that this was all part of the same proceeding against it and that the complaint would adequately apprise it of the particulars of this totally new charge. Of course, the relation back restriction means that the public interest in adjudicating and remedying unfair labor practices may be frustrated in some instances. But as the Supreme Court explained in Machinists Local 1424 (Bryan Mfg.) v. NLRB, 362 U.S. 411, 428 (1960), Congress saw fit to balance the interest in protecting respondents from stale charges against the interest in vindicating employee rights protected by the Act, and the resulting adjustment in Section 10(b) does not give absolute ascendancy to either interest.

In balancing the interest at issue here, I do not assume that simply because a particular charge was dismissed or withdrawn and not refiled within the 10(b) period, its allegations can never be included in an unfair labor practice complaint, no matter how closely it relates to another, timely filed charge. Rather, I would make two inquiries. First, I would consider whether the "relation back" doctrine would permit belated addition of that particular allegation if it had never been filed in the first place during the 10(b) period. If the answer to that is in the affirmative, then I would consider whether the original filing and withdrawal of the charge would necessarily have misled the respondent into believing that it would not be faced with that allegation in a Board proceeding and therefore might have induced the respondent not to preserve evidence generally relevant to the events concerned in that charge. In short, as in the administration of F.R.Civ. P. 15(c), it is a question of fairness. Williams v. U.S., 405 F.2d 234, 236–238 (5th Cir. 1968).

[4] See, e.g., Algreco Sportswear Co., 271 NLRB 499, 514–515 (1984); NLRB v. Complas Industries, 714 F.2d 729, 732–733 (7th Cir. 1983); Gocat, Inc., 257 NLRB 270, 271 (1981); NLRB v. Dinion Coil Co., 201 F.2d 484, 491 (2d Cir. 1952).

[5] In applying Fed.R.Civ.P 15(c) to determine whether a new plaintiff may be added to a civil action after the statute of limitations has run, the courts have applied a two-pronged test under which they consider whether the new plaintiff's claim arises out of the same transaction as the one sued on and whether the defendant had fair notice from the original complaint of the existence of the belatedly added claim. Leachman v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 694 F.2d 1301 (D.C. Cir. 1983); Williams v. U.S., 405 F.2d 234 (5th Cir. 1968); Paskuly v. Marshall Field & Co., 494 F.Supp. 687 (N.D. Ill. 1980), affd. 646 F.2d 1210 (7th Cir. 1981). The parallel is not exact, however. There is greater room for relation back in Board proceedings because, as noted above, our limitations period relates to charges, which have traditionally been given a broader reading than would be given formal court pleadings. Although the Board clearly lacks "carte blanche authority to expand the charge as it might please, or to ignore the charge altogether," it is free to add, as related claims, whatever allegations of violations might reasonably be found in an investigation of the events referenced in the unfair labor practice charge. NLRB v. Complas Industries, supra, 714 F.2d at 733 fn. 3.

In the present case, I would find that if the charge concerning Kelley's discharge had not been filed within the 10(b) period and then withdrawn, it might have been fairly added later on as a charge "related to" the 8(a)(3) charge that was filed on January 6, 1986. But given the particular circumstances here, I believe that the withdrawal of the charge relating to Kelley would reasonably have led the Respondent to believe, at the end of the 10(b) period, that there was no possibility that it would be called on to defend against an allegation that Kelley's discharge violated the Act.

Several facts in the course of events here are significant to me. Although the General Counsel may be correct in alleging that the Respondent was engaged in an overall scheme to rid itself of the Union's supporters, the fact remains that Kelley's discharge occurred as a separate event between the August 15 mass layoff of 14 employees and the September discharge of another employee. Hence, when the charging party withdrew its September unfair labor practice charge, which had named nine employees—i.e., Kelley, seven of the employees laid off August 15, and another who was discharged in September—and when that withdrawal was followed by the filing of a new charge on January 6 naming all those employees except Kelley, the clear implications were (1) that none of these specific discharges had escaped the notice of the charging party, (2) that the August 15 layoffs and the discharge occurring in September were regarded as unlawful, and (3) that Kelley's was not regarded as unlawful. The Respondent would have no reason, therefore, to seek to preserve evidence for future litigation concerning Kelley's discharge; and forcing it to litigate that discharge by virtue of the belated attempt to amend would contravene the policies underlying Section 10(b).

Had Kelley been one among those terminated on August 15, however, his omission in the January charge might have appeared to be simply a clerical error. In any event, the Respondent would, as a result of the charge, have been induced to preserve evidence relating to events of that day. Indeed, that is why we do not regard as barred the March amendment of the charge to include the eight employees (not named in earlier charges), laid off on August 15. Even if Kelley's discharge had not been part of that mass layoff, but was arguably related as part of an overall discriminatory scheme, the January charge might have placed the Respondent on notice to defend against that discharge as a related allegation if it had not been misled by the specific withdrawal of the earlier charge regarding Kelley. Our relation back rule properly operates to allow for the litigation of matters related to a timely filed charge, because a prudent respondent will collect and preserve evidence about such matters. Under the circumstances here, however, the January charge simply did not constitute timely notice concerning Kelley.

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT interrogate our employees about their activities on behalf of Sheet Metal Workers International Association, or any other labor organization, or because of any other concerted protected activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees with discharge because they engaged in union or protected activities.

WE WILL NOT solicit our employees to engage in surveillance of other employees' union activities and report those activities back to management.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees with layoff because they engage in union or protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees that we will close our plant because of our employees' union or other protected activities.

WE WILL NOT discharge our employees because they engage in union activities.

WE WILL NOT lay off our employees because of our employees' union activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer immediate and full reinstatement to Diane Hartman, Marguerite Price, Diana Lowe, Mike Parris, Fred Harte, Robert Plemmons, Debbie Crabtree, Theresa Pursley, Brenda Harte, Jim Harvey, Wendell Whitley, Bobby McFalls, Boyd Webb, Donna Lambert, and Donnie Keahey to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions without prejudice to the employees' seniority or other rights and privileges.

WE WILL make Diane Hartman, Marguerite Price, Diana Lowe, Mike Parris, Fred Harte, Robert Plemmons, Debbie Crabtree, Theresa Pursley, Brenda Harte, Jim Harvey, Wendell Whitley, Bobby McFalls, Boyd Webb, Donna Lambert, and

Donnie Keahey whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of our discrimination against them with interest.

WE WILL remove from our files any references to the discharge of Diane Hartman on September 20, 1985, or the layoff of employees Marguerite Price, Diana Lowe, Mike Parris, Fred Harte, Robert Plemmons, Debbie Crabtree, Theresa Pursley, Brenda Harte, Jim Harvey, Wendell Whitley, Bobby McFalls, Boyd Webb, Donna Lambert, and Donnie Keahey on August 15, 1985, and notify each of them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of their unlawful discharge or layoff will not be used against them in any way.

REDD-I, INC.

Richard P. Prowell, for the General Counsel.
William G. Trumpeter, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

J. PARGEN ROBERTSON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard in Chattanooga, Tennessee, on 8 and 9 May 1986. The complaint alleges that Respondent engaged in several actions in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and that Respondent laid off 14 employees and discharged an employee in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3). The charge was filed on 6 January 1986 and was amended on 3 March and 6 May 1986. The complaint issued on 21 February and was amended on 8 May 1986. Respondent admitted the commerce allegations, the jurisdictional allegation, that the Charging Party is a labor organization, and the supervisory allegations of the complaint. However, Respondent denied that the alleged supervisors acted on behalf of Respondent or as agents of Respondent in all cases and under all circumstances. Because of the above, and the entire record, I find that at material times Respondent is and has been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) and that Sheet Metal Workers International Association is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. I also find that the supervisors alleged in the complaint were agents of Respondent at times material to these proceedings. To the extent the issues involved the alleged supervisors, their actions were shown to have been conducted during the existence of employer-employee relationship.

At the hearing, Respondent objected on the basis of Section 10(b) of the Act to the General Counsel's motion to amend the complaint to allege three additional violations of Section 8(a)(1) through interrogations of employees and a threat to discharge employees, and an additional 8(a)(1) and (3) allegation regarding employee Don Kelley's discharge on 19 August 1985. I agree with Respondent and denied the General Counsel's motion to amend regarding the alleged discharge of Don Kelley. The General Counsel has requested that I reconsider and reverse my ruling in that regard. Jurisprudence supports Respondent's position. I deny the General Counsel's request for reconsideration. Winer Motors, 265 NLRB 1457 (1982); Howard Mfg. Co., 231 NLRB 731 (1977); NLRB v. Gaynor News Co., 197 F.2d 719 (2d Cir. 1952).

However, Respondent's motion that I should deny the General Counsel's motion to amend the complaint to allege additional 8(a)(1) violations was not granted during the hearing. The 21 February 1986 complaint was based on a 6 January 1986 charge that generally alleged actions violative of Section 8(a)(1). That charge and its amendments involved activities during a union organizing campaign during the late summer of 1985. The complaint amendments of additional 8(a)(1) allegations were allegedly part and parcel of that same campaign. The record evidence supports the General Counsel in that regard. Therefore, I deny Respondent's motion to exclude the additional 8(a)(1) allegations as amended during the hearing. That amendment does not violate the provisions of Section 10(b) of the Act.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The complaint allegations involve a union organizing campaign at Respondent's facility in the summer of 1985. Diane Hartman testified that she and some other employees were contacted by Organizer Jack Gregg of the Sheet Metal Workers International Association (Union) in late July 1985.

On 9 August the employees held the first union organizing meeting with Organizer Gregg. Hartman testified that one-third of Respondent's employees signed authorization cards within 3 days after the 9 August meeting.

A. 13 or 14 August 1985

According to employee Diane Hartman, a day or two before a 15 August 1985 layoff Supervisor Jimmy Dover talked to employee Buddy Fuller about the upcoming layoff. Hartman testified that she overheard Fuller ask Dover if Dover thought Fuller would be one of the people that would be laid off. Dover replied "We have a list of people that had signed union cards and they would be the first ones to go."

Conclusions

Fuller testified that he did not recall talking to Dover about the 15 August layoff, or that he talked to Dover before 15 August about the Union. Fuller said that he did not know about the Union until after 15 August.

However, on cross Fuller demonstrated difficulty in recalling events before 15 August. For example, Fuller testified that he was not sure which supervisor he worked under on 15 August.

Jimmy Dover denied talking to Fuller on 14 August. Dover testified that he first learned of the employees' union activity during a 15 August supervisors' meeting. In that regard Dover's testimony does not square with that of former Supervisor Charles Songer. Songer, who was called by the General Counsel in rebuttal, testified that during the 15 August supervisors' meeting all the supervisors said they had heard about the Union. Songer recalled that it was well known on 15 August that the employees were involved in a union organizing campaign.

I am convinced that Buddy Fuller did not truthfully recall that he did not talk to Jimmy Dover about the Union before 15 August. Fuller, by specifying on two occasions that he did not talk to Dover about the Union before the 15 August layoff, left the impression that he and Dover discussed the Union after that date. Fuller admitted that he and Dover talked about "everything" including "hunting, football, baseball, and softball." Fuller's testimony on cross illustrated that his recollection was not so precise as to permit him to pinpoint that he did not discuss the Union on the day before the 15 August layoff. Moreover, I am convinced that the union activity was discussed among employees before 15 August. Former Supervisor Songer testified that all the supervisors knew about the union activities before 15 August and former employee Greg Floyd testified that the union organization was a routine topic of discussions among the employees. Floyd recalled that union organization was generally discussed as early as June 1985. Floyd said he did not know of talk of the Sheet Metal Workers Union in June, but there was talk of "just union" and "if we could get a union in."

As shown below, I do not credit the testimony of Jimmy Dover. I do credit the testimony of Diane Hartman regarding the Dover-Fuller conversation. Hartman appeared to testify condidly regarding that conversation. The usual nature of her testimony and inclusion in Hartman's testimony of two other witnesses, tends to buttress its validity. The timing of the Dover-Fuller conversation is consistent with affidavit testimony of President Kenneth Redd. Redd testified, "I believe that the plant manager spread the work on 8–13–85 that there was going to be a layoff."

I find in agreement with the General Counsel that Dover's comments constituted a threat to discharge employees because of their union activities in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

B. 14 August 1985

Respondent's president and part owner, Kenneth Redd, admitted that he was told about the union organizing activity on 14 August. Redd's bookkeeper, Joyce Davis, told Redd of the union activity. Davis told Redd that employees Diane Hartman, Diana Lowe, and Mickie Sewell were involved in the union campaign.

C. 15 August 1986

On 15 August, around noon, Kenneth Redd told Plant Manager Charles Campbell of the employees' union organizing activities. According to both Redd and Campbell, Campbell expressed surprise. Redd testified that Campbell asked who was involved in the union activity. Although Redd admitted though that employees Hartman, Lowe, and Sewell were involved, he testified that he told Campbell that he did not know who was involved.

At the end of the shift on 15 August, Respondent notified 14 unit employees that they were being laid off due to slack work.

Kenneth Redd testified that he returned to work on 13 August from a 3-week vacation. According to Redd, he immediately reviewed the production figures, the "payables and receivables" from July and the first week of August (a partial week including 2 August), and sales bookings that had come into the plant since he left on vacation on 22 July. Redd testified that the records showed him that during his vacation, "(1) Our production was tremendously low; (2) we really were not picking up orders from backlog into the plant; (3) I knew immediately, just looking at these figures we had lost a lot of money in July." Redd asked Plant Manager Campbell about production being down. Campbell replied there were insufficient orders to keep each department busy. Redd and Campbell walked through the plant and confirmed, according to their testimony. that there were not enough orders to keep everyone busy.

After checking with his accountant, Redd told Plant Manager Campbell that he felt they needed to "lay off approximately 15 employees to get the payroll to the level that we needed to be at."[1] The General Counsel alleges that Respondent laid off the employees on 15 August in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3).

Conclusions

Record evidence substantially supports the General Counsel's allegation that Respondent's 15 August layoff was conducted because of the employees' union activities. That support regards the timing of the layoffs, coming 2 days after Kenneth Redd learned of the employees' organizing efforts; the threat by Supervisor Dover that the union card signers would be the "first ones to go"; and the 16 August comments of Plant Manager Campbell to employees Alder and Floyd that he had laid off employees who were trying to get a union in (see below).

The General Counsel also argues that by 12 August one-third of Respondent's employees had signed union authorization cards and on 15 August all but four of those employees had been laid off. As to that point the record is unclear. What the record does show is found in the testimony of Diane Hartman under cross-examination. Hartman's testimony in that regard refers to her affidavit, which was not introduced. An examination of Hartman's testimony shows that it could reflect, as the General Counsel argues, that all but three or four of all the employeees that signed union cards were laid off. However, the testimony shows that Hartman could have been talking about those employees that signed authorization cards at the "second" union meeting. If so, the record evidence does not show how many employees signed cards at that meeting. There is no other evidence that shows that all but three or four card signers were laid off on 15 August.

[1] The record shows 14 unit employees were laid off on 15 August 1985. Of those 14, 7 have since been recalled. Three were recalled on 16 September, one on 23 September, one on 29 October, one on 19 November, and one on 9 December 1985.

The total work force included 73 employees immediately before the 15 August layoff.

In fact, the figures show otherwise. Hartman's testimony that one-third of the employee work force signed cards would place the total number of card signers at approximately 24 or 25. Since Respondent laid off some 14 unit employees on 15 August, there would be a minimum balance of 10 or 11 card signers that were not laid off.

Nevertheless, the proven elements of timing and actual threats from the plant manager and a supervisor illustrate that the layoff was called by Respondent because of the employees' union activities. Regarding that allegation, I find a prima facie case has been established.

Additionally, the threats by Campbell and Dover established that Respondent was under the impression that it was laying off some of the employees who were involved in union organizing efforts. It is not necessary for the General Counsel to show that Respondent was correct in that impression. Crucible, 228 NLRB 723 (1977); Birch Run Welding & Fabricating v. NLRB, 761 F.2d 1174 (6th Cir. 1985). In that regard, I am mindful of evidence showing that Diane Hartman was one of two leading union advocates and that Hartman was not laid off on 15 August. However, jurisprudence has clearly established that it is not necessary in order to establish a case of illegal termination to show that an employer terminated all or even the leading union advocate. Birch Run Welding & Fabricating v. NLRB, supra. In fact, as shown below, Respondent illegally discharged Diane Hartman on 20 December.

Therefore, I must now consider whether the record evidence proved that Respondent would have laid off 14 unit employees on 15 August in the absence of the employees' union activities. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981).

The decision to conduct the 15 August layoff was admittedly made by Kenneth Redd. Redd testified that he made that decision on 13 August, the day he returned from a 3-week vacation. According to Redd, he made the decision on the basis of records he had that extended through the week of 2 August (i.e., 2 weeks before the week of 13 August), Redd testified that those records included the production figures, the "payables and receivables," and sales bookings that came into the plant since he left for vacation on 22 July. Redd testified that on checking with Plant Manager Campbell on 13 August, he learned that "there was very little in orders . . . out in the plant to keep each department busy."

The issue presented by Redd's testimony is a difficult one from Respondent's standpoint. According to Kenneth Redd, the situation on 22 July 1985 was not one that prevented him from leaving on a 3-week vacation. In fact, the record failed to show that Redd felt it was necessary for him to either personally monitor the financial situation or to have someone else, such as his accountant or the plant manager, keep a close watch on the financial figures during his absence. There was no indication that Redd felt a layoff was under consideration when he left on 22 July. Nevertheless, according to Redd, Respondent's financial condition changed so drastically between 22 July and 13 August that Redd decided to hold the largest layoff in Respondent's history immediatley on his return from vacation. The records relied on by Redd, and the record evidence as a whole, must be considered in light of the context of Redd's decisions.

The record evidence regarding payables and receivables, production and income, fails to show a drastically changed situation during the period of Redd's vacation. The record is blank concerning specific production figures. As to income, the record shows income (rounded to the nearest thousand) of $372,000, in June, down to $188,000 in July, but back up to $358,000 in August. However, the record also shows that Respondent had a 2-week shutdown in July.[2]

Regarding payables and receivables, the figures show (rounded to the nearest thousand):

Week	Weekly Sales Bookings
8/02/85	$95,157
7/26/85	35,777
7/19/85	107,614
Total, 3 weeks sales bookings	$238,548
7/12/85	$55,657
7/05/85	42,278
6/28/85	48,999
Total, 3 weeks sales bookings	$146,934

However, Redd's testimony shows that he was most directly influenced and on 13 and 14 August by orders received during his vacation.

In consideration of that testimony by Redd, the critical question must involve what records existed, vis-a-vis sales bookings orders, when Redd left on vacation on 22 July as opposed to sales booking orders on hand when he returned on 13 August. Redd had sales bookings records available that extended 2 weeks before each critical date (i.e., 2 weeks before 22 July and 2 weeks before 13 August).

Those respective records show that during the week of 2 August Respondent's weekly sales bookings totaled $92,157. On 22 July when Redd left for vacation, the records for the week of 2 weeks before (i.e., the week of 12 July), show weekly sales bookings of $57,157. Regarding the 3 weeks of records that surfaced during Redd's vacation, the record evidence shows the following:

Week	Acct. Receivable	Acct. Payable	Cash Debit
7/12/85	$715,000	$260,000	$80,000
8/02/85	627,000	238,000	45,000

A comparison for the last 3 weekly records available for Redd's examination on 22 July shows:

[2] Normally Respondent shuts down for 1 week around 4 July. During 1985 that shutdown was extended to 2 weeks.

Because of the above, it is apparent that Respondent experienced a comparative sales bookings increase in excess of $90,000 during the 3 weeks of Redd's vacation. The comparison shows that a greater need for a layoff existed on 22 July than on 13 August. The record showed that no critical factors intervened during Redd's 22 July to 13 August vacation other then the employees' union organizing activities.

In making a determination regarding how Respondent would have reacted in the absence of union activities, it is not sufficient to question whether Respondent's business conditions justified a layoff. Respondent's accountant testified that Respondent was in poor financial condition and that a layoff was justified. The accountant testified that he recommended a layoff in June 1985.[3] In fact, Respondent did lay off eight employees on 20 June 1985. Previously Respondent had two earlier layoffs—one involving five employees in March 1983 and one of six employees in October 1984. During those periods the total work force was at least as large as the work force of 15 August 1985.

The record shows that Kenneth Redd made the decision to lay off 14 employees on 13 August, despite records showing improved sales during the time he was on vacation. According to Redd's testimony, sales bookings records were the last factors he considered before directing the layoff. Redd testified that he checked with Plant Manager Campbell and was told that orders were too low to keep the departments busy. Redd then directed Campbell to lay off approximately 15 employees. The record shows that on 22 July when Respondent was faced with a recommendation from its accountant to cut costs, and with decreasing sales bookings, Redd did not elect to conduct a layoff. Indeed, Redd left the situation without personal attention for a 3-week vacation. On 13 August, when faced with increased sales bookings, and an employee union organizing campaign, Redd decided to conduct the largest employee layoff in the history of the Company. See Purolator Armored, Inc. v. NLRB, 765 F.2d 1423 (11th Cir. 1985); Birch Run Welding & Fabricating v. NLRB, supra; Lemon Drop Inn, 752 F.2d 323 (8th Cir. 1985); Soil Engineering Co., 269 NLRB 55 (1984); Jenkins Index Co., 273 NLRB 736 (1984).

Several other factors are noteworthy in considering the layoff allegation. Respondent called several employees who testified that work was slow before the 15 August layoff. However, two of Respondent's supervisors, Will Overall and Jimmy Dover, and alleged discriminatee Diane Hartman, contradicted Respondent's contention that work was slack in all departments on 15 August. Overall testified that employee Sewell was assigned to work with Hartman immediately following the layoff because the department was behind in its work. Dover testified in a pretrial affidavit that his department had a good bit of work on 15 August 1985. Hartman testified that there was an increase in orders between the 4 July shutdown and the 15 August layoff.

[3] Respondent's accountant also testified that he talked with Redd shortly before Redd left for vacation in July, but that he did not talk to Redd while Redd was on vacation. The accountant was not sure whether he talked to Redd on 13, 14, or 15 August 1985.

Respondent also argued that Kenneth Redd did not learn of the employees' union activities until the morning after he directed the August layoff. However, that testimony was contradicted by credited evidence that Plant Manager Campbell and Supervisor Dover told employees that the layoff was called to get the union supporters.

Respondent also argued that the employees were selected for layoff by their respective supervisors rather than by Redd or Campbell. Although that testimony was supported by several current supervisors, it was rebutted in part by the testimony of former Supervisor Charles Songer. Songer testified that he was told that on the occasion of the 15 August layoff, his employees would be selected by Campbell and Redd rather than through the normal method of having the supervisors select employees for layoff. Songer testified that he was directed to prepare a list in order to permit Campbell and Redd to compare the supervisors' recommendations with their own. Songer's testimony was corroborated by Charles Campbell's handwritten layoff list. According to Songer, he recommended that employees Sims, Harte, and Dotson be laid off. According to Songer, however, Campbell rejected Songer's recommendations and instead laid off employees Parris (Paris), Plemmons, and Harte. Campbell's handwritten list shows all five employees mentioned in Songer's testimony, i.e., the three recommended by Songer included the two not laid off, Sims and Dotson, plus the three selected by Campbell, i.e., one of which had been recommended by Songer. Respondent's other records also support Songer by showing that Parris, Plemmons, and Fred Harte were laid off on 15 August, but that Dotson and Sims were not laid off. Therefore, it is apparent that although Campbell listed all the employees recommended by Songer by writing them on his list, he chose instead one employee recommended by Songer, Fred Harte, and two that were not recommended by Songer: Plemmons and Parris.

After Songer testified, Charles Campbell was recalled. At that time Campbell testified for the first time that he told the supervisors during their meeting of 15 August that unless they actually selected for layoff those employees that were contributing the least, he, Campbell, would select employees for layoff in the future. It is noteworthy that other than Campbell, none of the current supervisors that testified about the 15 August supervisors' meeting recalled the above mentioned comments by Campbell. All those supervisors testified before Charles Songer. None, other than Campbell, was recalled after Songer testified.

In view of the above, and on the basis of my observation of their demeanor, I credit the testimony of Charles Songer over that of Charles Campbell regarding what Songer was told concerning how his employees would be selected for the 15 August layoff.

Respondent also pointed to a comparison of the weekly sales bookings records during the layoffs of 20 June and 15 August. On both those occasions Respondent experienced a large volume of sales booking around the time of the layoffs. However, Kenneth Redd was admittedly unaware of those sales bookings when the layoffs occurred. It is noteworthy, however, that the figures available before those two layoffs showed sales bookings down 2 weeks before the decision to lay off on 20 June (i.e., those last available figures showed total sales bookings of only $47,532 if the last available figures were those for the week ending 31 May, or $58,771 if the last avaiable figures were those for the week ending 7 June),[4] as opposed to the last figures available before the decision was made to hold a layoff on 15 August. A comparison shows a substantially higher weekly sales bookings figure for the week ending 2 August—$92,157. Nevertheless, the layoff was called on 15 August and that layoff involved almost twice the number of employees laid off on 20 June.[5]

I am convinced because of the entire record that Respondent would not have conducted the 15 August layoff in the absence of its employees' union activities.

D. 15 August 1985

Former employees Paul Alder and Greg Floyd testified to a conversation with Plant Mananger Charles Campbell at Alder's home on the morning of 16 August. At that time both Alder and Floyd were working for Respondent P. Alder asked Campbell about a 15 August supervisors' meeting.[6] According to P. Alder and Floyd, Campbell replied that the employees were trying to get a union in, and he had laid them off. Campbell asked P. Alder and Floyd to find out who else was supporting the Union. Campbell identified Diane Hartman as a union supporter.

Campbell admitted that he talked with Alder and Floyd at P. Alder's home on 16 August. According to Campbell, it was Alder who brought up the Union, saying that he heard that someone was trying to organize a union. Campbell testified that he denied knowing who was trying to organize Respondent, but admitted to P. Alder and Floyd that Kenneth "Redd did tell us that someone out there in the plant was trying to organize a Union."

Both P. Alder and Floyd admitted that they resigned from Respondent's employment in November because they felt Alder's wife, who is also Floyd's mother-in-law and was an employee of Respondent, was being harassed at her work by Supervisor Jimmy Dover and because Plant Manager Campbell did nothing regarding harassment.

Conclusion

Despite their actions in resigning under circumstances that generated hard feelings, I am convinced that P. Alder and Floyd testified truthfully regarding their conversation with Campbell. In many respects their testimony was confirmed by Campbell. Campbell admitted that he was at Alder's home, that Alder and Floyd were present, that they talked about the supervisors' meeting on 15 August, and that that meeting included discussion of the employees' union activities. Other testimony, including Campbell's and Redd's testimony that Redd first told Campbell on 15 August that Redd had learned of the employees' union activities and that Campbell asked Redd who was involved, casts doubt on Campbell's version of his conversation with Alder and Floyd. Campbell allegedly had not heard which employees were involved with the Union when he talked with P. Alder and Floyd. Nevertheless, according to Campbell he initially expressed no interest in learning of employees' union involvement from Alder and Floyd. However, Campbell admitted that when Alder told him that he would let Campbell know anything he learned about the Union, Campbell replied, "I'll sure appreciate that."

Campbell admitted that he P. Adler, and Floyd were good friends. In the context of Campbell's first learning of the employees' union activities on 15 August and his admitted interest in which employees were involved, I find that his version of the 16 August conversation is not believable. Campbell's version reflects that he expressed little interest in P. Alder's comments about the Union. Campbell responded that he knew nothing about which employees were involved although he admitted that Kenneth Redd had said someone in the plant was trying to organize a union. According to Campbell, P. Alder told Campbell that he was surprised that anyone would work for a union "because of the way Mr. Redd treated everyone." Because of the context of their conversation and their close friendship, I find it more believable that Campbell would pursue the conversation in the manner alleged by P. Alder and Floyd.

Moreover, I was impressed by the demeanor of P. Alder and Floyd. Both responded forthrightly to questions regarding their resignation from Respondent and their feelings regarding the alleged harassment of Alder. Finally, I am convinced that Campbell mentioned that Diane Hartman was involved in the Union. Campbell did not deny that part of the conversation and, as shown above, Kenneth Redd admittedly learned of Hartman's involvement 2 days before the Campbell-Alder-Floyd conversation.

E. 5 September 1985

Diane Hartman testified that President Kenneth Redd held a meeting of all employees on 5 September. Hartman testified regarding Redd's comments to the employees:

> Mr. Redd discussed the Union. He said he had heard rumors of a Union. He had heard about Union cards being signed. He said he had discussed this with his lawyer, he had been going to the library studying on the matter. He was concerned about the uneasiness of the people. He told us, you know, before he would let someone come into his plant and tell him how to run his business, he would

---

[4] The record does not show when Respondent made the decision to hold a layoff on 20 June. If the decision was made during the week of 20 June, the last sales bookings records would be those for the week of 7 June. If the decision was make during the week before 20 June, the last sales bookings records would be for the week ending 31 May.

[5] Eight employees were laid off on 20 June 1985. One was recalled before the 15 August layoff—on 5 August 1985. Another was recalled shortly after the 15 August layoff—on 16 September 1985.

The total work force included 84 employees on 20 June and 73 employees on 15 August.

[6] Respondent's president, Kenneth Redd, did hold a supervisors' meeting on 15 August. During that meeting Redd discussed the union organizing campaign.

close the door, go back to Miami where there would be no problem and find him a job.

The General Counsel also cited affidavit testimony by Kenneth Redd regarding his 5 December speech to employees. Redd testified in that affidavit as follows, inter alia:

> I urged whoever was involved in the Union to contact someone regarding the number of jobs that had been lost due to Union activities elsewhere. I said that the Union, by law, could promise them anything and I could promise them nothing. As I concluded the meeting I told them that with the business problems that I had with this added on top of them that I didn't need the aggravation. I said I could just as easily go back to Miami, that I could get a job anywhere and I didn't need this job.

In his testimony at the hearing Kenneth Redd denied that he threatened to close the plant. However, Redd admitted saying that if the people did not stop fighting each other "there will be not company here," because the "bank will shut us down."

Conclusion

Redd's testimony revealed that his recollection of his 5 September speech was not complete. His testimony both at the hearing and in his affidavit is somewhat similar to that of Diane Hartman. I am convinced that Hartman testified accurately concerning Redd saying he would close the doors, go back to Miami where there would be no problem, and find a job. I also credit Redd's affidavit testimony that he urged the employees to contact someone "regarding the number of jobs that had been lost due to union activities elsewhere."

Redd's threat to close the doors and go back to Miami was directed against the employees' union activities and constitutes a clear violation of Section 8(a)(1). Redd's comments regarding lost jobs also constitutes a clear threat. Redd offered no further explanation other than the implication that many employees have lost their jobs because of their union activities. Both the above comments tend to coerce employees in their protected activities.

F. 11 September 1985

During September 1985, William (Will) Overall was made foreman of the Assembly and Wiring Department. Prior to Overall, the supervisor over Assembly was Janice Varner. As assembly and wiring foreman, overall was over some 14 employees. Of those 14, approximately 8 or 9, including alleged discriminatee Diane Hartman, were under Overall in Assembly. Shortly after becoming foreman, Overall held a meeting of the Assembly and Wiring employees. Diane Hartman testified about that meeting:

> Mr. Overall brought us into the meeting. He talked about him taking over the supervising job in our department. He said there would be changes made in the department on how order were run. He talked to us about rules that were to apply to us. We could not leave the department without his permission. He told us that the talking would be stopped. He told us that we would be given verbal warnings on our talking, that we would be given pink slips the second warning. The third warning we would be sent to the office and sent home.

Will Overall testified as follows regarding his meeting with the Assembly and Wiring employees:

> Q. Do you remember what you told them in that meeting?
> A. Yes.
> Q. What was that?
> A. About staying in their department. We're allowed to have coffee, go to the Coke machine, but I didn't want them cluttering up, abusive talking.
> Q. Abusive talking? What is abusive talking?
> A. Well, talking and you know, just stop working and just standing or talking, but if you can work and talk, this is okay.
> Q. Why did you hold this meeting?
> A. Well, I was new to some but not new to the department because I had had it before.

Former Assembly Foreman Janice Varner attended Overall's meeting. Varner testified:

> Q. Do you remember what he said?
> A. Well, he told them that he was going to be our supervisor, to cut down on the talking and not to go to other departments. In general, what I always told them.

Conclusions

On the basis of the entire record, I am convinced that Will Overall used strong expression in an effort to discourage work disruptions in the assembly and wiring departments. However, I am not convinced that Overall was actually forbidding all talking. Testimony of several employees indicated that Overall actually cautioned the employees against talking, which interfered with work. Diane Hartman's testimony that Overall threatened to progressively discipline continuous offenders was unrebutted.

Although I generally found Diane Hartman to be a credible witness, I am not convinced that she was correct in her testimony regarding the scope of Overall's no-talking rule. On the basis of the entire record, I am convinced that he prohibited talking that interfered with work and that he threatened to progressively discipline employees who violated that prohibition. There is no showing that Overall's prohibition in that regard differed from Respondent's previous policy.

I find that Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) by forbidding the assembly and wiring employees to talk because of the Union.

G. 16 September 1985

Former employee Theresa Pursley testified that after she was laid off on 15 August, she was recalled in September 1985. Pursley worked in the FHP department under Supervisor Jimmy Dover. On the day she recalled following the layoff, Pursley met with Supervisor Dover. According to Pursley:

> [Dover] asked me if I really needed the job and I told him, yes. He asked me if I had heard anything about the Union before I was laid off or if I knew anything about it. I told him that I had heard bits and pieces but nothing serious, you know, just that the Union was trying to come in. He said, well, we really need you to work for us and if you would please let me know of anything that's going on about the Union, your job may depend on this. So I agreed to it, but I never let him know anything bacause I never heard anything else about it.

Pursley testified that on several occasions after she returned to work, Dover asked her if she knew anybody that was involved with the Union.

Jimmy Dover denied that he had any discussion with Theresa Pursley regarding the Union and that he asked her to spy on others.

Conclusion

The testimony of Jimmy Dover conflicts with the testimony of three others—Diane Hartman, Brenda Harte, and Theresa Pursley. Additionally, on cross-examination Dover was shown his pretrial affidavit in which he testified that at the time of the 15 August layoff his department had a "good bit of work." Dover never explained the apprent conflict between his affidavit testimony and his testimony during the hearing that work was slow. Dover's testimony conflicted with that of Diane Hartman regarding a 14 August conversation with Buddy Fuller (see above), and with the testimony of Brenda Harte whether Harte volunteered to be laid off on 15 August. Harte testified contrary to Dover that she did not volunteer. Another witness for Respondent, Vickie Riness, testified that Harte actually said that if it came down between her and her husband, who also worked for Respondent, that Harte would rather it be her. At best, Riness' testimony shows that there was some ambiguity whether Harte would volunteer only to keep Harte's husband from being laid off. Dover, in his testimony, drew no such distinction and was, therefore, giving another version than that of Riness. In fact, both Brenda Harte and her husband, Fred Harte, were laid off on 15 August.

Because of the above, and my observation of Jimmy Dover, I am unable to credit his testimony. I credit the testimony of Pursley. Pursley impressed me as a candid witness. Pursley's testimony revealed that she was interrogated and threatened with discharge during her conversation with Dover. Pursley was not known as a union advocate. Therefore, I find that she was interrogated and threatened in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

H. 20 September 1985

On 20 September Diane Hartman was summarily discharged. Will Overall told Hartman that she was discharged because of talking.

Will Overall testified that it was his decision to discharge Diane Hartman. According to Overall, Hartman "wouldn't stop her talking, she left her department (on a number of times)."

Conclusions

Diane Hartman was, according to her testimony which I credit, one of two employees that first contacted the Union. Respondent's president admitted learning that Diane Hartman was one of three primary union pushers.

In view of the timing of her discharge, coming just over a month after Respondent first learned that Hartman was a union pusher; the animus Respondent illustrated against its employees' union activities as shown above; the credited evidence showing a comment by Plant Manager Campbell to effect that Hartman was a prime union pusher; and the summary manner of her discharge, I am convinced that the General Counsel proved, prima facie, that Respondent discharged Hartman becasue of her union activities.

Moreover, the record fails to show that Hartman would have been discharged in the absence of union activities. Will Overall testified that he had never discharged anyone other than Diane Hartman. Obviously, in light of that evidence, discharging an employee was a serious matter for Overall. Nevertheless, Overall did not point to a single specific event that precipitated Hartman's discharge. Overall did testify that Hartman told him that he was not going to run over the department. However, that comment was allegedly made 2 weeks before Hartman's discharge. Additionally, nothing was done or said on that occasion to indicate that Hartman was being cautioned or otherwise disciplined.

Simiarly, tesitmony that Hartman was noticed to have been absent from her duty station on the day of Overall's meeting drew no words of caution. Additionally, as in the case above, that incident occurred 2 weeks before Hartman was discharged.

Overall said that he was displeased with Hartman's conduct on several occasions during the 2 weeks he supervised her. Nevertheless, Overall said nothing to Hartman. Hartman was never disciplined by Overall until she was discharged.

When asked why he did not give Hartman a warning for any of her shortcomings, Overall replied, "I just didn't."

Credited evidence proved that it was Respondent's policy to progressively discipline its employees if they engaged in excessive talking. Hartman was treated differently. She received no prior disciplinary action for talking.

Respondent's attorney asked Will Overall about Respondent's policy for disobeying a supervisor and was told that an employee could be discharged for that infraction. Respondent's "policy" which was received in evidence, supports Overall's testimony in that regard. However, there was no showing of specifics whether and when Hartman disobeyed Overall. At no time was Hartman told that an act by her constituted disobedience.

I credit Hartman's testimony that she was told she was discharged for talking. Overall never denied making that comment. On the basis of that evidence, and on the record as a whole, I find that Hartman would not have been discharged absent her union activities. Other employees in Hartman's department were shown to have engaged in excessive talking. None of those other employees was discharged.

I find that Hartman was treated differently from other employees and in a manner that was uncharacteristic of Respondent's policy and practice. Hartman, unlike all others, was discharged for talking and, although Respondent's practice was to progressively discipline employees for talking. Hartman did not receive the benefit of Respondent's progressive disciplinary policy. Lemon Drop Inn, 752 F.2d 323 (8th Cir. 1985); Soil Engineering Co., 269 NLRB 55 (1984).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. Sheet Metal Workers International Association is a labor organization as defined in Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. Respondent, by interrogating its employees regarding their union activities, by soliciting employees to engage in surveillance of other employees' union activities, by threatening its employees with discharge, by threatening its employees with layoffs, and by threatening its employees that it would close its plant because of its employees' union activities, has engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.
4. Respondent, by laying off employees Marguerite Price, Diane Lowe, Mike Parris, Fred Harte, Robert Plemmons, Debbie Crabtree, Theresa Pursley, Brenday Harte, Jim Harvey, Wendell Whitley, Bobby McFalla, Boyd Webb, Donna Lambert, and Donnie Keahey on 15 August 1985 because of its employees' union activities, has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3).
5. Respondent, by discharging its employees Diane Hartman on 20 September 1985 because of her union activities, has engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.
6. The unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that the Respondent has illegally laid off employees Marguerite Price, Diana Lowe, Mike Parris, Fred Harte, Robert Plemmons, Debbie Crabtree, Theresa Pursley, Brenda Harte, Jim Harvey, Wendell Whitley, Bobby McFalls, Boyd Webb, Donna Lambert, and Donnie Keahey and has illegally discharged Diane Hartman in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall order Respondent to offer Marguerite Price, Diana Lowe, Mike Parris, Fred Harte, Robert Plemmons, Debbie Crabtree, Theresa Pursley, Brenda Harte, Jim Harvey, Wendell Whitley, Bobby McFalls, Boyd Webb, Donna Lambert, Donnie Keahey, and Diane Hartman immediate and full reinstatment to their former positions, or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and to make the abovenamed employees whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them. Backpay and interest shall be computed in the manner described in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[7]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[8]

ORDER

The Respondent, Redd-I, Inc., Chattanoga, Tennessee its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging, laying off, or otherwise discriminating against employees because of their union and other protected concerted activity.

(b) Coercively interrogating employees about the employees' union activities.

(c) Soliciting its employees to engage in surveillance of other employees' union activities.

(d) Threatening its employees with discharge because of their union activities.

(e) Threatening its employees with layoff because of their union activities.

(f) Threatening its employees that it will close its plant because of the employees' union activities.

(g) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer to employees Diane Hartman, Marquerite Price, Diana Lowe, Mike Parris, Fred Harte, Robert Plemmons, Debbie Crabtree, Theresa Pursley, Brenda Harte, Jim Harvey, Wendell Whitley, Bobby McFalls, Boyd Webb, Donna Lambert, and Donnie Keahey immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs, or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make each of them whole for any loss of earnings plus interest he or she may have suffered by reason of Respondent's discriminatory actions.

(b) Remove from its files any references to the discharge of Diane Hartman on 20 September 1985 or the layoff of employees Margueritte Price, Diana Lowe, Mike Parris, Fred Harte, Robert Plemmons, Debbie

[7] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[8] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Crabtree, Theresa Pursley, Brenda Harte, Jim Harvey, Wendell Whitley, Bobby McFalls, Boyd Webb, Donna Lambert, and Donnie Keahey on 15 August 1985, and notify each of them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of their unlawful discharge or layoff will not be used against them in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its facilities in Chattanoga, Tennessee, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[9] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 10, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[9] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER GRANTING MOTION

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On June 15, 1988, the Board issued its Decision and Order in Amazing Stores, 289 NLRB 163.

On July 15, 1988, the General Counsel filed a motion to clarify and modify the Board's Order.

On July 18, 1988, the Respondent filed a letter opposing the General Counsel's motion. The Respondent argues that Section 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations required the General Counsel to raise the issues presented in the motion in either exceptions or cross-exceptions to the administrative law judge's recommended Order and decision. Because they were not raised at that time, the Respondent claims the General Counsel has waived her right to raise them now. However, the Board possesses discretion to fashion remedies that will "effectuate the policies" of the National Labor Relations Act, Ladies Garment Workers Local 512 v. NLRB, 795 F.2d 705, 710 (9th Cir. 1986) (quoting NLRB v. J. H. Rutter-Rex Mfg. Co., 396 U.S. 258, 262–263 (1969)), and this discretion is broad when deciding what remedies to impose. Amalgamated Service & Allied Industries Joint Board v. NLRB, 815 F.2d 225, 232 (2d Cir. 1987) (quoting Phelps Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177, 198–199 (1941)); Schnadig Corp., 265 NLRB 147 (1982).

Having duly considered the matter, the Board grants the General Counsel's request to clarify and modify the Board's Order. Accordingly,

IT IS ORDERED that the General Counsel's motion to clarify and modify the Board's Order in Amazing Stores, 289 NLRB 163 (1988), is granted and that the following modifications be made to the Board's Order.

1. In paragraph 2(a) add "5645 N. 5th St., Academy Plaza, Academy and Red Lion Roads, and 139 W. Chelton Ave." after "7130 Frankford Ave.,".

2. In paragraphs 2(e) change "facility" to "facilities" and add "and its facility in Sharon Hill, Pennsylvania, and Allentown, Pennsylvania," after "Philadelphia, Pennsylvania."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

Upon charges filed by the Union September 30, 1986, January 30, 1987, February 24, 1987, and October 8, 1987,[1] the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a consolidated complaint in Cases 4–CA–16103, 4–CA–16357, 4–CA–16416, and 4–CA–16873 on November 30, 1987, against the Companies, the Respondent.[2] The consolidated complaint alleges that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5), (2), and (1) of the Act. Although properly served copies of the charges and complaints, the Respondent has failed to file an answer.

On January 4, 1988, the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On January 11, 1988, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Respondent filed a response.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides that the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed admitted if an answer is not filed within 14 days from service of the complaint, unless good cause is shown. The consolidated complaint states that unless an answer is filed within 14 days of service, "all of the allegations in the consolidated complaint shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and may be so found by the Board."

In its response to the Notice to Show Cause and request for permission to file an answer, the Respondent denies the commission of any unfair labor practices and asserts that it can produce evidence to that effect. With respect to the failure to contact the Regional Office concerning an answer or an extension of time to file an answer, the Respondent asserts that the "multiple charges and Orders, formed a mosaic which so confused Respondent that it was believed the matters were moot." In support of this assertion, the Respondent stated that the Acting Regional Director refused to issue a complaint on the charge in Case 4–CA–16357 alleging that Cullen Machining, Inc. is a single employer or alter ego of Sorensen Industries, Inc., and that because the Union did not file an appeal, the matter was closed. According to the Respondent, this amounted to a dismissal of the alter ego or single-employer portion of the case. The Respondent further stated that "for reasons never fully explained," the Regional Director "withdrew his dismissal of that aspect of the charge," and that the alter ego/single issue has survived to become part of the consolidated complaint.

The Respondent further argues that the Regional Director has been aware of its challenge to the unfair labor practice charges and that an answer filed now would be repetitious to information it earlier supplied the Regional Director (such as that which led the Regional Director to "dismiss" the single-employer/alter ego portion of the case). Thus, the Respondent argues, an answer filed now would not involve surprise to the General Counsel.

The Respondent also claims that good cause for failing to file an answer is shown by the fact that the Respondent, Sorensen Industries, Inc., filed a Chapter 11 bankruptcy petition on December 13, 1985, which was converted to a Chapter 7 petition on May 7, 1987, and Sorensen Industries, Inc., therefore, properly believed its liability under the National Labor Relations Act had ended. The Respondent further asserts that the Respondent, American Brass and Bronze, Inc., did not have notice of the alleged unfair labor practices before purchasing the assets of Sorensen Industries, Inc. on May 29, 1987. The bankruptcy court "simply directed" American Brass and Bronze, Inc. to resolve with the Union an itemized list of alleged pay and benefit discrepancies.

Finally, the Respondent argues that the Motion for Summary Judgment should be denied because the Party-in-Interest, Teamsters Local 384, has abandoned the bargaining unit at Cullen Machining and the Respondent is prepared to engage in settlement negotiations with the Charging Party, Steelworkers Local 5424.

We have reviewed each of the Respondent's contentions and, for reasons supplied below, conclude that none constitutes good cause for its failure to file a timely answer.

[1] The charges are in Cases 4–CA–16103, 4–CA–16357, 4–CA–16416, and 4–CA–16873 respectively. The charges in the first three cases were amended on October 8, 1987.

[2] A consolidated complaint was issued in Cases 4–CA–16103 and 4–CA–16416 on April 30, 1987. A second consolidated complaint in Cases 4–CA–16103, 4–CA–16416, and 4–CA–16357 issued on May 20, 1987.

First, we find no merit to the Respondent's contention that the multiple charges and orders created a situation so confusing as to explain its failure to file a timely answer or request an extension. The charges were timely filed and consolidated complaints were routine examples of Board procedure.[3]

Nor is there merit to the Respondent's assertion that its answer would be repetitious of information it has already provided the Regional Director during the investigation of the charges. To permit this to constitute good cause would effectively nullify the requirements of Section 120.20 for any respondent that cooperated at the investigatory stage.

Further, we reject Respondent Sorensen Industries, Inc.'s contention that the Board should deny the General Counsel's motion because it filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy on December 13, 1985 (converted to a Chapter 7 petition on May 18, 1987). It is well settled that the institution of bankruptcy proceedings does not deprive the Board of jurisdiction or authority to entertain and process an unfair labor practice case to its final disposition.[4] Board proceedings fall within the exception to the automatic stay provision for proceedings by a governmental unit to enforce its police or regulatory powers.[5] As for the Respondent's assertion that American Brass and Bronze, Inc. and its shareholders did not have notice of an outstanding unfair labor practices proceeding prior to its acquisition of Sorensen Industries, Inc., it is axiomatic that alter egos are each responsible for the unfair labor practices of the other without regard to any element of notice or knowledge.[6]

Finally, we deny the Respondent's request to hold in abeyance consideration of the present motion, pending settlement efforts by the Respondent. The possible settlement of a case does not provide an exemption from the requirement to file an answer. Thus settlement efforts are neither cause to deny a Motion for Summary Judgment nor to hold it in abeyance.[7]

For the above reasons, we find the Respondent's response does not constitute good cause for the failure to file a timely answer. Therefore, in accordance with Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, no good cause having been shown for the failure to file a timely answer, the allegations of the complaint are deemed to be admitted and the Board so finds. We, accordingly, grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment[8] and deny the Respondent's request to now file an answer.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, Sorensen Industries, Inc., a Pennsylvania corporation, was engaged in the operation of a foundry including a machine shop at 5th Street, Darby, Pennsylvania, with offices at 313 Elm Street, North Wales, Pennsylvania, and at Two North Ridge Avenue, Ambler, Pennsylvania, until June 30, 1987. During the past year, in the course and conduct of its operations, Sorensen Industries, Inc. sold and shipped products valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The Respondent, Cullen Machining, Inc., a New Jersey corporation, is engaged in the operation of a machine shop located at 313 Elm Street, North Wales, Pennsylvania. The Respondent, American Brass and Bronze, Inc., a Pennsylvania corporation, has been engaged in the operation of a foundry at 5th Street, Darby, Pennsylvania, since May 18, 1987.

At all times material, Sorensen Industries, Inc., Cullen Machining, Inc., and American Brass and Bronze, Inc. have been affiliated business operations with substantially common ownership; common management, supervision, and business purposes; with the same operations and equipment; and have occupied the same premises. By virtue of these facts, the Respondents, Sorensen Industries, Inc., Cullen Machining, Inc., and American Brass and Bronze, Inc., are and have been at all times

[3] The Respondent asserts that the allegation that Cullen Machining, Inc. is a single employer or alter ego of Sorensen Industries, Inc. was "dismissed" in Case 4–CA–16357 with no appeal by the Union. It further asserts that despite this dismissal the allegation was included in the consolidated complaint at issue here. We find nothing faulty in the treatment of this alter ego allegation. In view of the identity of interests of alter egos, the Board has liberally permitted the addition of an alter ego as a party (even at the backpay stage of a proceeding). See, e.g., BMD Sportswear Corp., 283 NLRB 142 fn. 1 (1987); Volk & Huxley, 280 NLRB 219 (1986), enfd. 817 F.2d 996 (2d Cir. 1987); Teckwal Corp., 263 NLRB 892 (1982).

[8] The General Counsel also requests that the Order include a provision for a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

material alter egos and a single employer within the meaning of the Act.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Sorensen Industries, Inc., Cullen Machining, Inc., and American Brass and Bronze, Inc. are an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

We further find that United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO, CLC (the International); Steelworkers Local 5424, its agent (the Local Union); and Teamsters Local 384 are each labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

At all times material, the Respondent, acting through Sorensen Industries, Inc., has recognized the International as the exclusive representative of the Respondent's employees in a unit referred to in article II of the most recent collective-bargaining agreement (the Agreement) between the International and Sorensen Industries, Inc. (The Agreement is effective from November 1985 to November 15, 1988.) The unit is, and has been, at all times material, appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

By virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act, the International is and has been, at all times material, the exclusive representative of the unit employees for the purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms of employment.

On July 31 the Respondent failed to abide by article XXIV of the Agreement by closing its machine shop in Darby, Pennsylvania, was closed.

From about July 31, 1986, to about November 17, 1986, the Respondent failed and refused to abide by the superseniority clause of article VII of the Agreement in connection with the Respondent's layoff of Local Union President Mike Calciano, an employee of Sorensen Industries, Inc., who was laid off when the machine shop in Darby, Pennsylvania, was closed.

On the following dates in 1986 the International, acting through Walter J. Kuchinski, an International staff representative, in writing, requested Sorensen Industries, Inc. to furnish it with certain information concerning the closing of Sorensen's machine shop necessary for, and relevant to, the International's performance of its function as the exclusive representative of the unit. On September 5, the International requested "information in writing concerning sales orders, shipping logs, all shipping information, destination of castings, etc." and "the whereabouts of the machines that were sold publicly" as well as information "whether or not, Mr. Taglianetti is financially sponsoring the owners and a machine shop in North Wales, Pennsylvania." On October 30, it requested "all documents that have information as to size, quantity, quality and anything else to determine our position in respect to contracting out," and on November 21, it requested "information for any castings that were machined after July 30, 1986 at the other machine shop(s)."

Since about September 5, 1986, and continuing to the present time, the Respondent has failed and refused to furnish the International the requested information described above.

Since about November 14, 1986, and continuing to the present time, the Respondent has been engaged in subcontracting to other firms, including Cullen Machining, Inc., the machine shop work performed in its Darby, Pennsylvania machine shop prior to July 31, 1986. The Respondent has engaged in this conduct without having afforded the Union an opportunity to negotiate and bargain, as the exclusive representative of the unit with respect to such acts and conduct, and the effects of such acts and conduct.

On February 2, 1987, the International, acting through Lynne Gerber-Saionz, Esquire, by letter, requested Sorensen Industries, Inc. to provide certain information referred to in a "Questionnaire" consisting of 14 pages attached thereto. This information is necessary for, and relevant to, the International's performance of its function as the exclusive representative of the unit. Since about February 2, 1987, and continuing to the present time, the Respondent has failed and refused to furnish the International the requested information.

By each of the acts and conduct described above, the Respondent has failed and refused, and is failing and refusing, to bargain collectively with the representative of its employees, and the Respondent thereby has been engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Sections 8(a)(1) and (5) and 8(d) of the Act.

Since about September 16, 1987, the Respondent, acting through Cullen Machining, Inc., granted recognition to and bargained with Teamsters Local 384 as the exclusive representative of the production and maintenance employees in the appropriate unit who were employed at Cullen Machining, Inc., notwithstanding the fact that Teamsters Local 384 did not represent an uncoerced majority of the production and maintenance employees in the unit employed. By these acts, the Respondent has rendered, and is rendering, unlawful assistance and support to a labor organization, and the Respondent thereby has been engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (2) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By failing to abide by article XXIV of the most recent collective-bargaining agreement with the Union (effective November 1985 to November 15, 1988) by closing its machine shop in Darby, Pennsylvania; by failing and refusing from about July 31 to about November 17, 1986, to abide by the superseniority clause of article VII of the collective-bargaining agreement in connection with the Respondent's layoff of Local Union President Mike Calciano, an employee of Sorensen Industries, Inc., who was laid off when the machine shop in Darby, Pennsylvania, was closed; by failing and refusing to furnish the International the information requested on September 5, October 30, November 21, 1986, and February 2, 1987, which is necessary and relevant to the International's performance of its function as the exclusive representative of the unit; by engaging in subcontracting to other firms, including Cullen Machining, Inc., the machine shop work performed in its Darby, Pennsylvania machine shop prior to July 31, 1986, without having afforded the Union an opportunity to negotiate and bargain as the exclusive representative of the unit, with respect to such acts and conduct, and the effects of such acts and conduct since November 14, 1986, and continuing to the present time; the Respondent has failed and refused, and is failing and refusing, to bargain collectively with the representative of its employees, and thereby engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5), Section 8(d), and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By acting through Cullen Machining, Inc., granting recognition to and bargaining since September 16, 1987, with Teamsters Local 384 as the exclusive representative of the production and maintenance employees in the appropriate unit who were employed at Cullen Machining, Inc., notwithstanding the fact that Teamsters Local 384 did not represent an uncoerced majority of the unit employees, the Respondent has rendered, and is rendering, unlawful assistance to a labor organization and thereby engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(2) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that Sorensen Industries, Inc., Cullen Machining, Inc., and American Brass and Bronze, Inc. are alter egos and a single employer and that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5), (2), and (1) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain other affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Thus, with respect to the violations of Section 8(a)(5), we shall order the Respondent to bargain on request, including concerning the decision to subcontract on November 14, 1986, the machine shop work performed in its Darby, Pennsylvania machine shop prior to July 31, 1986, and the effects of that decision; to abide by the superseniority provision of article VII and by article XXIV of its most recent collective-bargaining agreement with the Union; and to furnish the Union the information requested. We shall further order that unit employees, including Mike Calciano, be made whole for any loss of pay or other employment benefits suffered by reason of the unlawful subcontracting of unit work and the failure to abide by article XXIV and the superseniority clause of article VII of the collective-bargaining agreement. Backpay shall be computed in accordance with the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[9]

Further, with respect to the violations of Section 8(a)(2), we shall order the Respondent to withdraw and withhold recognition from Teamsters Local 384, as the exclusive bargaining representative of the unit of production and maintenance employees at Cullen Machining, Inc.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Sorensen Industries, Inc., Cullen Machining, Inc., and American Brass and Bronze, Inc., North Wales, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain with United Steelworkers of America, Local Union 5424, AFL–CIO, CLC as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit referred to in article II of its most recent collective-bargaining agreement with the Union (effective November 1985 to November 15, 1988); failing and refusing to abide by the superseniority clause of articles VII and XXIV of the collective-bargaining agreement; refusing to furnish the Union information that is relevant and necessary to its role as the exclusive bargaining representative of the unit employees; and subcontracting unit work without providing the Union an opportunity to bargain with respect to the subcontracting and its effects.

[9] 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

(b) Recognizing and bargaining with Teamsters Local 384 as the exclusive representative of the unit of production and maintenance employees who were employed at Cullen Machining, Inc.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit referred to in article II of its most recent collective-bargaining agreement with the Union on terms and conditions of employment.

(b) On request, bargain with the Union concerning the decision to subcontract on November 14, 1986, the machine shop work performed in its Darby, Pennsylvania machine shop prior to July 31, 1986, and the effects of that decision.

(c) On request, furnish the Union information that is relevant and necessary to its role as the exclusive bargaining representative of the unit employees.

(d) Abide by the superseniority clause of articles VII and XXIV of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

(e) Make whole unit employees, including Mike Calciano, for any loss of pay or other employment benefits they may have suffered by reason of the unlawful subcontracting of work and failure to abide by the collective-bargaining agreement, in conformity with the remedy section of the decision.

(f) Withdraw and withhold recognition from Teamsters Local 384 as the exclusive bargaining representative of the unit of production and maintenance employees at Cullen Machining, Inc. until the Union has been certified by the Board as their exclusive bargaining representative.

(g) Post at its facility in Darby , Pennsylvania, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[10] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 4, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(h) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with United Steelworkers of America, Local Union 5424, AFL–CIO, CLC as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit referred to in article II of our most recent collective-bargaining agreement with the Union (effective November 1985 to November 15, 1988); WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to abide by article XXIV of the collective-bargaining agreement by closing our machine shop in Darby, Pennsylvania, or the superseniority clause of article VII; WE WILL NOT refuse to furnish the Union information that is relevant and necessary to its role as the exclusive representative of the unit employees; and WE WILL NOT subcontract work performed by employees in the appropriate unit without providing the Union with prior notice or an opportunity to bargain with respect to the subcontracting and its effects.

WE WILL NOT recognize and bargain with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO, Local Union No. 384, as the exclusive representative of the unit of production and maintenance employees who were employed at Cullen Machining, Inc.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit referred to in article II of our most recent collective-bargaining agreement with the Union on terms and conditions of employment.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with the Union concerning the decision to subcontract the machine shop work performed in our Darby, Pennsylvania machine shop prior to July 31, 1986, and the effects of that decision.

WE WILL abide by the superseniority clause of articles VII and XXIV of our collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

WE WILL, on request, furnish the Union information that is relevant and necessary to its role as the exclusive bargaining representative of the unit employees.

WE WILL make whole those unit employees, including Mike Calciano, for any loss of pay or other employment benefits they may have suffered by reason of our unlawful subcontracting of work and failure to abide by the collective-bargaining agreement, with interest.

WE WILL withdraw and withhold recognition from Teamsters Local 384 as the exclusive bargaining representative of the unit of production and maintenance employees at Cullen Machining, Inc.

basis and on the basis that discipline is management's domain, he continued to deny District 65's request for arbitration on this article. None of the other contracts on which Respondent relied for preparation of this article omits arbitration as recourse for just-cause discipline or discharge.[41]

7. No strike—no lockout

Respondent's initial no-strike proposal prohibited "strike, walk out . . . or any other curtailment, restriction or interference with any of the operations of Prentice-Hall in any manner." The Union's liability would be for the actions of "its local and international representaives. trustees, stewards, delegates or committees." Failure to abide by the terms of this article would result in liquidated damages of $250,000 to be paid to Prentice-Hall, and would also permit the Company to either sue for damages and/or injunctive relief, or seek an award through the arbitration article of the agreement.

Liability would also extend to violations of this article committed by independent employees, whose actions would be deemed authorized by the Union, if the Union failed to curtail them after 24 hours' notice. A violation of this latter provision would carry $10,000 in damages for such failure and $10,000 for each day the violation continued, in addition to any liquidated, actual, or compensatory damages awarded under the clause described above.

The Union expressed its willingness to accept a no-strike clause on April 9. However, Senick stated that the $250,000 liquidated damage penalty and the $10,000 daily fine were unacceptable; nor could the Union agree to accept liability for independent acts of employees who may or may not be union members. Senick also emphasized, at this and at the May 27 meeting, that agreement on the no-strike clause would be tied to agreement on the arbitration article.

On August 12, the Union presented a written proposal to Respondent that precluded the Union from authorizing a strike or otherwise impeding Respondent's operations. It also imposed a simultaneous obligation on Respondent to refrain from both attempting or carrying out a lockout of the employees. Senick represented that this clause would protect Prentice-Hall and that the punitive provisions in the Company's clause were superfluous.

At the next meeting, held September 3, the Company presented the Union with an article which retained the tenor of the original but reduced the liquidated damages to $200,000 per violation and eliminated the $10,000 per diem fine described above. Liability for actions of stewards, trustees, et al., remained, regardless of whether the Union ratified their acts, and failure to terminate an employee strike within 24 hours of being notified would make the Union liable for liquidated damages. This proproposal also included a no-lockout clause and permitted the Company to sue for damages or injunctive relief without resorting first to arbitration.

Senick's immediate response was that the liquidated damages clause was punitive, and that he saw problems with being bound by the unauthorized acts of individuals. Kelly recommend they study this article.

When the parties met again on September 24, Senick described management's proposal as "absurd," specifically with regard to the $200,000 damage clause. The Union's proposal on that date, in addition to its original language prohibiting it from calling a strike, also obligated it to make "every reasonable effort to secure the return of strikers to work as soon as possible" in the event of an unauthorized strike. Failure by the Union to terminate a strike would entitle Respondent to discipline or discharge the individual employees. Senick also expressed difficulty in accepting liability for the actions of individuals beyond that imposed by normal agency rules.

Kelly's reply was that he did not find the Union's language entirely responsive to Respondent's concerns. At this and the October 5 meetings, he explained that the $200,000 was to compensate the Company for expenses incurred as a result of a strike. He asserted that most of the costs incurred would be up front and, therefore, the damages would be due the Company regardless of the length of the strike. He cited such things as security, replacement employees, transpotation for employees crossing the picket line, strike replacements, interruption of shipped goods, locating shippers willing to cross the picket line, lost profits, and management's time as monetary losses for which the Respondent wanted to be assured they would be compensated. Senick objected, noting that if there were a 3- or 4-hour strike the Union would bear tremendous liability.

Regarding the theory of liability that Respondent wished to impose on the Union, Kelly stated that the Union was liable for collective action even if they did not sponsor it and that he could not imagine a strike ever occurring "without union concurrence in some form."

Canoni told Senick's negotiating team that he had seen liquidated damage provisions in other contracts. At the hearing the New York Times Mailers' contract was cited as an example of one such agreement. On cross-examination, the General Counsel established that that unit had a history of wildcat strikes before the clause was negotiated. The April 9 notes reveal that there was no history of strike or lockouts in the CSD unit.

No agreement was ever reached on a clause.

8. Subcontracting

Subcontracting was discussed on five different occasions between February 26 and October 5. During the presentation of its first proposal, the Union explained that it sought only to protect the work regularly done by CSD and the unit employees' positions, but did not seek to interfere with Respondent's ability to run its business. The language of the Union's original proposal with its oral representation and by its terms would have prohibited subcontracting "of work or the type of work that is normally, historically, or appropriately performed by bargaining unit members." Whether a layoff was caused or prolonged by the Employer was a question of fact to be resolved by an arbitrator.

[41] This observation is in direct conflict with Kelly's statement at the bargaining table on July 8 that other contracts did allow for discipline without arbitration.

best copy available

Respondent's position on subcontracting remained exactly the same from its introduction on April 1, until negotiations terminated in November. Kelly maintained that the Company required the "absolute right to subcontract and contract any and all work" and that as an operational decision it should not be subject to an arbitrator's scrutiny.

Kelly also asserted that he did not see the connection between layoffs and subcontracting that Senick emphasized in the Union's proposal. He pointed out that a layoff might be the result of schedule changes, technological advancements, lack of capacity in the department, its customer dissatisfaction, more competitive bids on the outside, and lack of punctuality and absenteeism among the employees.

Senick's response was that the Union did not seek to prevent Respondent from continuing its historical practice of subcontracting, but wanted to protect the unit employees' jobs from being lost. He acknowledged that although Respondent had not previously laid off employees or prolonged a layoff by subcontracting unit work, he wanted to ensure against that contingency in the future. He emphasized repeatedly that this clause was important to the Union. Again, no agreement was reached by the time negotiations broke off on November 5.

9. Seniority

On several dates between February 12 and October 22 the seniority article was discussed and various proposals were exchanged by the parties.

At the February 12 meeting the Union acknowledged that "Prentice-Hall is a nice place to work" which employees come back to. The Union also explained that its general intent with respect to this clause was "to design a workable seniority system that recognizes the different skills involved." It envisioned seniority as being a measure of the employees' total length of accumulated service with Prentice-Hall within their individual departments. Senick explained how this system would apply in a few specific instances, and stated that it was similar to the design in the loose-leaf contract.[42] Senick also stated that the length of an employee's accumulated service would not include periods of layoff, termination, discharge, or leave of absence.

According to the company notes, Kelly specifically asked whether the clause would be subject to grievance and arbitration procedures. When Senick responded, "Absolutely," Kelly stated, "You know my answer on that clause."

The Union's proposal also required Prentice-Hall to "make every reasonable effort to place affected employees elsewhere in the unit" if there was a reduction in force, or failing that, to "make every reasonable attempt to place them elsewhere in the Company." Senick stated that this portion of the Union's proposal incorporated the Company's current practice. This characterization was not challenged by management at this meeting.

On February 26 this proposal was discussed again. Kelly attempted to clarify some of the exact language used in the Union's proposal, including "interruption of service." The Company's notes reflect that Senick stated that it included termination and resignation, but did not include leave of absence, layoff,[43] or leave for military service, and that he had not considered whether it would include time served in a nonunit position.

Regarding the phrase, "every reasonable attempt" to place an employee elsewhere in the unit and if no openings are available in the unit, then elsewhere in the Company,[44] Senick defined this language as requiring a good-faith attempt. Kelly found this language problematic because it could apply in every instance. Senick agreed to discuss it with the committee and expressed his feeling that it could be worked out. In response to another question Kelly was also told that application of this clause would be subject to grievance and arbitration.

Respondent included seniority language in its package of proposals and on April 1 its language was discussed and the Union also submitted its own response. Respondent's proposal defined seniority, tied seniority to vacation benefits, and listed 11 possible ways that an employee could lose seniority. The proposal was expressly excluded from the grievance and arbitration procedures.

The Union's proposed definition of seniority on April 1 was similar to Respondent's, the total accumulated length of service which would continue to accure during vacations, holidays, paid sick, and other periods during which the employee was receiving his salary, but included, in addition, leaves of absence in its definition. Under both the union and company proposals, seniority would also accrue to employees who were unit members but were transferred out of the unit for a period of time and then returned to the unit and would be measured by their entire accumulated service to Prentice-Hall.

The Union specified only 3 ways an employee could lose seniority, as compared to the 11 listed in Respondent's article. Resignation and discharge for cause were included by both parties. The Union's third basis for loss of seniority was failure to respond within 4 weeks after receipt of written notice of recall by registered mail. Prentice-Hall included a similar cause for losing seniority but gave the employee 48 hours to respond and/or 5 working days to return to work following tender or delivery of notice.

Respondent's proposal did not include any reference to the layoff and recall of employees which, according to Senick, the Union regarded as absolutely essential. The Union's April 1 proposal required that employees be laid off and recalled in the reverse order of their seniority except when a less senior employee has greater competence or ability to perform the remaining work. In addi-

[42] The looseleaf contract defined seniority as "total accumulated length of service by regular employees" and further provided that:

> Layoffs shall be by job classification and shall be determined by inverse order of seniority where factors of competence and ability to perform available remaining work are equal.

[43] A change from the position Senick expressed on February 12.

[44] The looseleaf contract states that "the Employer shall make every reasonable effort to place the affected employees elsewhere in the unit." There is no obligation to attempt to place employees outside the unit in that contract.

tion, the laid-off employee would be offered any other position for which he might be qualified.

Kelly gave Respondent's response to the Union on May 12. Two changes had been made from the original. It now included the Union's language on seniority continuing to accrue during periods when the employee is receiving his salary and deleted "leave of absence with pay of more than six (6) months" as a way an employee would lose seniority.

Senick stated that the proposal was unacceptable. He raised specific objections to many of the possible ways that an employee could lose his seniority. He specifically referred again to any breach of rules as a ground for employees to lose seniority and to the exclusion of the article from grievance and arbitration, which he termed "unacceptable." Kelly responded that in extenuating circumstances he could rely on the Company's right to waive strict performance of any contract provision to avoid the consequences of the loss of seniority clause.

Senick characterized layoff and recall as "the heart of seniority" and noted the absence of any language in Respondent's article addressing that issue. He observed that Prentice-Hall concerned itself with vacation eligibility, but not with job security. Kelly pointed out that Senick had stated that Prentice-Hall is a good place to work and that the Company had no history of layoffs.

At the May 27 meeting, Senick introduced a proposal that incorporated Respondent's first paragraph verbatim, thus eliminating leave of absence as time counted toward seniority. The Union had also added a clause permitting the loss of seniority for layoffs exceeding 12 consecutive months and reduced from 4 weeks to 2 weeks the length of time allowed for an employee to respond to a notice of recall. In all other respects the Union's clause remained unchanged.

Senick repeated his request that language on layoff and recall be included in future proposals from Respondent. A discussion followed during which Senick attempted to clarify the application of such language to hypothetical situations. Senick also renewed his objection to the list of ways employees could lose seniority, which he termed punitive.

On June 4 Kelly gave the union bargaining team Respondent's newest proposal on seniority. It now had only five ways for an employee to lose seniority. Like the Union, these included resignation and discharge for cause. In addition, it included layoff of more than 4 months or the length of seniority, whichever is less;[45] failure to notify Prentice-Hall of intent to return to work after a layoff within 48 hours of receipt of notice and/or failure to return to work within 5 days of such notice; and disciplinary action taken pursuant to the rules and corrective discipline article. The remainder of the seniority article remained unchanged, including its exclusion from the grievance and arbitration provisions.

In response to the Union's request for layoff and recall language, Kelly explained that those decisions are based on a number of factors and that only management could balance those factors. Furthermore, company notes reflect that Kelly asserted:

> The Company has no history of layoffs, and you have no reason to suspect our motives here. It's not a compelling factor to block our agreement here. The primary objective should be to reach agreement. It would only add unnecessary language. This kind of language could turn into a real problem. It is only another attempt by District 65 to put in loose language so it can try to obtain to [sic] the arbitration process what it fails to obtain from negotiations. . . . Your language would lead to arbitration. . . . It should be based on competence, ability and the needs of the Company and other factors.

On numerous occasions Senick had referred to the exclusion of this clause from grievance and arbitration by Prentice-Hall. The company notes on June 4 reflect the following discussions as having occurred immediately following Kelly's above-quoted comments:

> M.S. There are many other provisions where you put they were not subject to the arbitration clause. We wouldn't mind seeing language here.
> J.K. You are open to that? Would you seriously consider it?
> M.S. Yes.[46]

At the June 11 meeting, Kelly presented for the first time a seniority proposal that included a layoff and recall provision, which was not subject to arbitration,[47] and which listed seniority as one of the factors to be considered during the decision-making process. Prentice-Hall deleted the language in a separate paragraph excluding the entire article from grievance and arbitration.[48] Although Senick testified that it was still too subjective, the company notes indicate that he initially viewed this language as a big step forward. There appeared to be little discussion of it at this meeting.

After considering the proposal, Senick stated at the June 24 negotiations session that this article was really no different than the Company's earlier proposal and that without arbitration, it was meaningless. Kelly maintained that layoff was too subjective for arbitration and would lead to frivolous grievances, and that its language reflected the discussion they had had at the table. Senick offered to return with other language.

[45] Four months represented an increase from 30 days in its earlier proposal.

[46] It is clear that Senick's strategy was to induce Respondent to formulate language on layoff and recall tied to seniority. However, in subsequent discussions it became apparent that he never intended to agree to a proposal on layoff and recall which was not subject to arbitration.

[47] Canoni testified that Respondent used bargaining agreements between other parties as prototypes for formulating its own proposals for the CSD negotiations. Several of these contracts were introduced into evidence. In at least two of them the clause on employee recall was not subject to arbitration, and one of these also excluded recall from the grievance procedure. (See R. Exhs. 15, 16.) However, in these other agreements the order in which the employees were to be laid off was either arbitrable or negotiable to the point of impasse.

[48] However, the clause permitting Respondent to take action including loss of seniority under the rules and corrective discipline article remained nonarbitrable to the end under that article notwithstanding the modification made here.

The Union gave its next proposal to Respondent on July 8. Some of the language on layoff and recall had been modified and the clause now listed criteria for the Employer to consider in the decision-making process that were similar to those listed in Prentice-Hall's article. No discussion of this language took place on that date.

Respondent made a few changes in its language that it presented on July 16. It deleted the language reducing seniority for any disciplinary action against an employee under the rules and corrective discipline clause. However, loss of seniority as a disciplinary action still existed within the rules and corrective discipline clause.[49]

Arbitrability of the layoff and recall decision was the focus of the balance of this day's discussion. Kelly maintained that management's judgment on layoff and recall had to be paramount. Senick questioned the scope of the Union's recourse in the event of a management decision made in an arbitrary fashion. Kelly asserted that a regular grievance "could take care of that" but offered to consider language placing the burden of proving arbitrariness on the Union in the event of arbitration.

At the July 23 bargaining session, Senick presented what would be the Union's final proposal. The chief differences remaining[50] were between the parties' layoff and recall clauses; arbitrability of the decision as applied in individual cases, and the inclusion by the Union of a requirement that the Employer attempt to reassign the affected employees either elsewhere in the unit or, failing that, elsewhere in the Company. Senick reiterated that reasonable actions would be upheld by an arbitrator.

In its July 12 proposal Respondent included language regarding the placement of laid-off employees elsewhere in the unit or Company within Respondent's sole discretion. This language was as Kelly pointed out, similar to the clause found in both parties' proposals concerning promotions and transfers from and returns to the unit. Senick viewed this change as minimal and restated his position on arbitration.

Thereafter no new proposals were offered. On September 24 and October 5 and 22 there were discussions on seniority of various duration but no substantive progress was made. During the October 22 meeting Senick expressed the Union's desire to have external review of Respondent's decisions and noted that such review is customary in labor relations.[51] Kelly refused to make the entire clause subject to arbitration and stated that he "might entertain" language limiting the scope of arbitration. It is evident, however, from the foregoing facts that Kelly viewed layoff and recall as a decision for management only and that even though the Union had proposed specific criteria to guide an arbitrator on review, Respondent's position remained unchanged.

10. Wages

The Union initially proposed increased starting salaries, on average approximately 25 percent for each job classification, an immediate 32-percent increase, a minimum 15-percent increase upon promotion, and a yearly cost-of-living increase.[52] The Union explained that these rates were competitive with those of similar jobs in other shops in the New York-New Jersey area. Kelly responded that the department was operating at a loss and that the parties were "very far apart" on wages.

Senick also asked if the employees would be given the 3-percent increase received by many other company employees as a result of the wage study commissioned by human resources.[53] Kelly told the Union that Respondent was precluded from increasing wages unilaterally, but that Respondent was willing to discuss it. However, the employees would continue to undergo annual review and to receive increases pursuant to that process. Senick's view was that Respondent was unilaterally withholding an existing benefit. On February 4 the Union filed charges with the NLRB alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (5) of the Act. These charges were subsequently administratively dismissed by the Region.[54] Kelly acknowledged on cross-examination that CSD would have been included in the wage study had they not been represented by the Union.

The Company turned over its entire economic package on May 12. The wage proposal listed starting salaries and established an annual merit review system for determining if an employee would be granted an increase. This proposal was not subject to arbitration.

In January the Company had provided the Union with its current wage rates for both individual employees and for each job category. (R. Exh. 4.) In both cases the wages were expressed as annual salaries. Their first wage proposal to the Union however was expressed in terms of an hourly rate, and the Union subsequently converted its proposal into an hourly rate as well.

In order to get a clear idea of what the Company was proposing in response to the Union's demands as compared to what the employees were receiving without the Union, conversion of the annual salary into an hourly rate was deemed necessary. The results reveal that Respondent's initial wage proposal was somewhat less than [49] See discussion sec. II,D,9, infra.

[50] The only other difference that remained was very minor. The Union would have an employee lose seniority "following a layoff of more than six months or the employee's seniority, whichever is less" while the employer would have the same result after only 4 months of layoff.

[51] The bargaining notes for October 22 show Kelly stating that "some of '65's' contract layoff is not subject to arbitration, for instance Harper and Row." Canoni testified that reliance was placed in part on the Harper and Row contract for the concept that the decision to lay off was not subject to arbitration. In fact, although the Harper and Row agreement excluded the decision from arbitration, it also provided that the layoff procedures, including the seniority provisions requiring layoff in inverse order of seniority and recall in order of seniority were specifically made subject to arbitration.

[52] The cost-of-living component was not expressly stated in the Union's wage proposal. Rather it was raised at the bargaining table and Senick acknowledged that cost-of-living increases keep the wages at the same relative level of earning power. Cost-of-living which was never expressly included was also never expressly removed from the bargaining table. According to Senick "it died on the table." However, Kelly testified that he assumed it remained on the table throughout the negotiations.

[53] This study was carried out by "Sibson" and was frequently referred to by that title by the parties.

[54] During negotiations, sometimes with reference to the Union's claim that the Sibson increase should be applied to unit employees, Kelly asserted that the Union had a proclivity for filing frivolous grievances even when Respondent had expressed a willingness to work the problem out. Yet, as this section reveals, the Respondent never offered to grant the 3-percent across-the-board increase to these employees in spite of its willingness to "discuss" it.

the starting annual salary already paid in those positions based on a 35-hour paid workweek, 52 weeks per year.[55] The difference ranged between 1 cent and 5 cents per hour less under the contract proposal.

Discussion of the Employer's proposal and the Union's counterproposal occurred on June 4. The Union had decreased the increase in starting salaries from 25 percent to 19 percent, the across-the-board increase from 32 percent to 25 percent, and continued the 15-percent minimum guaranteed increase on promotion. Kelly commented that a 25-percent increase was "ridiculous," but he agreed to look at it. Senick encouraged Respondent to look at the actual salary level, not the percentage increase. He asserted that the Union's proposal was really "not very much money" and that the numerous employees who had left Prentice-Hall in recent months to assume positions elsewhere were "making considerably more than here."

On several occasions during the negotiations the parties discussed the decrease in the unit's employee complement due to employee quitting. On May 5 Respondent informed the Union that the night supervisor had resigned and, depending on the results of its efforts to replace him and to fill the other vacancies, Respondent was considering closing down the night shift. By the June 24 meeting Respondent had hired 3 employees for the day shift but the night shift was down to 7 or 8 employees from 18 or 20. Kelly informed the Union that there had been a slippage on productivity and in scheduling on the night shift and that Respondent was still considering the option of closing it down. On both May 5 and June 24, Senick expressed his hope that Respondent would continue to operate a night shift.

In early October Respondent was still interviewing potential employees and by November 5 a new employee had been hired on the night shift. Respondent had been operating with 35 employees since April,[56] compared to the 50 employees who had formed the unit when the bargaining first began.

On June 24 Kelly turned over Respondent's next proposal which included two new clauses. One clause pertained to promotions which would trigger a review and a possible wage increase not to exceed 10 percent.[57] The second clause limited an employee entitled to two wage increases in the same pay period to only the greater of the two increases, not both. According to Kelly this clause was added "to deal with the problem of merit and promotion increases being given at the same time." The proposal also included some increases in the wages for some job classifications. In all other respects the proposal remained the same.

A discussion concerning annual wage increases followed. Kelly stated that the fixed annual increase sought by the Union was not in Respondent's best interest at this time.[58] Senick asserted that Respondent presently had a guaranteed minimum increase and that he could not understand Respondent's reluctance to agree to continue this practice with the CSD employees. Kelly asserted that Respondent's wage system included "a merit annual review which is open-ended to favor the productive employee." Senick pointed out that there was no performance appraisal system against which employees would be measured and that Respondent's proposal left any and all wage increases in the sole discretion of Prentice-Hall. Kelly confirmed that this was Respondent's offer.

The Union presented a revised proposal on July 8. The wage increase was divided into two steps; an 8-percent increase on signing the contract and an additional 7 percent months later. Senick asserted that this wage request was "not out of line with the way Sibson was administered elsewhere in the Company" and its implementation would bring salaries up to a competitive level.[59] Kelly alleged that the Union had already "tried the Sibson ploy and lost at the Board."[60] He also maintained that Respondent's proposal was competitive.

On July 16 Kelly characterized the Union's previous proposal as "a step backwards" because of the compounding effect of the 2-step increase. He gave the Union Respondent's counterproposal which provided a guaranteed 5-percent increase only to those employees who received any merit increase, but still did not offer a guaranteed increase across the board. It adopted the Union's language granting employees receiving promotions "the minimum salary for that classification or a 10-percent increase, whichever is larger." Also the prohibition against pyramiding increases for merit and promotions within a single pay period were removed. The article was still subject only to grievance, without recourse to arbitration and the actual wage levels remained the same as those in the earlier proposal.

Senick requested information relied on by Respondent in formulating its wage proposal including wage surveys used to determine wage patterns in the area, the results of the Sibson wage study with respect to the CSD unit, and information on employees performing similar work elsewhere in the Company. Respondent answered this request by letter dated September 24 (R. Exh. 8). In it Kelly provided the requested information and informed the Union that the Sibson study had not included CSD.[61]

Senick also inquired what the total cost of Respondent's proposal was and whether there were current minimums and maximums on salary increases. Kelly responded that the cost of Respondent's proposal was "[f]ive percent overall maybe," and that there was currently "[u]nder the guidelines that did and do exist" a maximum 12-percent increase and a minimum increase "in the four [55] A 35-hour workweek was what Respondent offered initially and I have assumed that it would not have offered a shorter workweek than it already received from the employees.

[56] As noted previously, the CSD unit was comprised of 35 employees at the time of this litigation. See sec. II,B, fn. 3, supra.

[57] LLSD contained a guaranteed minimum 10-percent wage increase on promotion to a higher job classification.

[58] LLSD contained a guaranteed 5-percent annual increase in addition to any merit increase given at the Employer's discretion.

[59] The Union had previously given Respondent information on wages of other companies where employees were more well paid.

[60] See discussion at sec. II,B,10, supra.

[61] There was no attempt at the hearing to show that there existed such a disparity between the wage levels in the information provided and those proposed in the bargaining as to evidence bad faith.

to five percent range." This last statement by Kelly tends to contradict his earlier position that Prentice-Hall relied solely on a merit review system for its nonunion employees. (See discussion from June 24, above.)

On September 3 Senick gave Respondent a wage proposal notwithstanding his having not yet received the wage information he had requested on July 16. He later admitted that this proposal was "a shot in the dark" made in an attempt "to move things along." In substance this proposal called for an 8-percent increase on current wages from the date the contract is implemented and a 9-percent annual increase exclusive of any additional merit increases given by the Employer.[62]

Respondent's proposal of October 22 increased the minimum salaries in some job catagories between 10 and 25 cents an hour. Still, by Kelly's own admission at trial (Tr. 1094), only 7 of the 36 employees, who were earning less than this proposed new minimum, would have received an increase. Respondent also proposed language allowing it to pay a shift differential at its own discretion. Senick's initial response before studying the proposal was that the minimum on wages was looked at much closer. He also reiterated the need for across-the-board increases.

After reviewing Respondent's proposal, Senick gave the Union's reaction and counterproposal on November 5. He acknowledged again that they were close on minimums, but apart on both initial across-the-board increases and guaranteed annual increases.

Kelly asserted that the Union failed to take into account the raises given to CSD employees during the course of negotiations. Senick responded that the average increases given in April and July had been less than 6 percent and that from his preliminary information on October increases it appeared that those were in the same range.[63] He asserted that these increases were low compared to those previously given in CSD and to those given during the last several months to nonunion employees, which included some increases of 14 percent. In response to those comments, Kelly stated that the guidelines governing CSD were those that were in effect in September 1980, while those governing other employees had changed and therefore what occurred outside the unit had no relationship to CSD. He likened Senick's attempt to compare CSD's salary increases to nonunion employees "to compar[ing] apples to oranges."

The chief difference between the parties by this date was, as Kelly pointed out, that Prentice-Hall's wage proposal was a merit system and the Union wanted a guaranteed minimum raise plus merit. Senick asserted, both at the negotiations and at the hearing, that the Union's proposal reflected what happened, in practice, at Prentice-Hall. Furthermore, Respondent's wage proposal was not subject to arbitration, limiting employee or union recourse to protest an arbitrary grant of a less than 5-percent merit increases to the filing of a grievance (Tr. 1099).[64] Senick testified, "I also told the company that I couldn't agree to a wage proposal that wasn't subject to arbitration because it meant that I couldn't enforce the wage proposal, which was absolutely no good to me." (Tr. 135.)

Canoni offered several specific examples: he pointed out that the Brandeis University contract with nonprofessional library employees had no automatic wage increase and was not subject to grievance and arbitration. However, Canoni failed to note several other features included in that wage package and not offered by Prentice-Hall. Brandeis University included a review procedure for evaluating employees and granted employees receiving less-than-satisfactory rating a second review 3 months after the first one. In addition, the contract had a performance evaluation review appeal procedure whereby employees could question their supervisor's evaluation by going to, in succession, their department head, the university librarian or their designee, and the dean of the faculty.

Canoni also pointed to the Winthrop Publishing, Inc. agreement with District 65 which contained merit review of employees. However, also unlike the Prentice-Hall proposal, it granted a minimum 6-percent increase, or the amount necessary to achieve the minimum scale for the employee's job and experience level, whichever was greater.

According to Canoni, the Boston University contract with District 65 did not include a guaranteed wage increase or recourse to grievance and arbitration provisions. Contrary to Canoni's reading of this contract, this article granted salary increases in both the first and second years of the agreement (the term if the agreement was September 6, 1979, to June 30, 1981) with additional merit increases permitted at the Employer's discretion without recourse to grievance and arbitration.

In the bargaining agreement between Allyn and Bacon, Inc. (a former subsidiary of Prentice-Hall) and Local 925, Service Employees International Union, AFL–CIO there was a merit increase system with the possibility of no merit increase and no recourse to arbitration. In response to my questioning, Canoni also testified that there was an across-the-board increase in that agreement as well and that no similar offer was made in the CSD negotiations. It was this type of proposal that Senick repeatedly sought to have included in the CSD agreement.

Finally, both LLSD unit contracts had wage articles that were subject to arbitration and Kelly did not propose their exclusion in the negotiations leading to the second LLSD contract.

11. Union shop and dues checkoff

When Senick introduced the union-shop clause he emphasized its importance to the Union. He stated that the [62] By this date Senick had decreased the minimum starting salaries to only a 5-percent increase over the preunion starting salaries.

[63] These dates were for annual reviews of employees whose employment anniversaries fell within those quarters.

[64] Since, as earlier noted, Respondent was insisting on language in its arbitration clause making grievances the "sole and exclusive" means for the settlement of all dispute, see sec. II,D,4, par. 9, supra, Kelly's later reference on re-direct examination to the possibility of a lawsuit to assert union claims of breach of the wage article (Tr. 1262) must be completely discounted.

committee had developed a consensus within the shop that was overwhelmingly in favor of this proposal. Union negotiation committee member Richard Piper explained that the union shop would prevent favoritism and friction among the employees because "all employees must be treated the same in a Union Shop." He stated further that if he paid dues, he wanted others to pay them also, and that the shop steward would be stronger and fewer disputes would go to arbitration. Senick added that all employees underwriting the cost of the Union would obviate the need for further organizing.

Kelly did not perceive any advantage for Respondent to have a union shop. He asserted that "[n]either a majority of the unit wants a union shop or the union." He also stated that the contract would govern all unit employees regardless of whether they were union members and that the root of what the Union wanted was the employees' dues. Kelly also asked a number of questions concerning the application of the article to specific circumstances in an effort to ascertain "where we might agree and where we don't agree."

At the June 4 meeting, Senick asked if Respondent planned an answer to the union-shop clause. Kelly responded, "We have more technical objections on checkoff. Our objections to the Union Shop are much more on the basis of principle." Specifically, he asserted that the Union had not obtained a majority of the employees' votes at the outset, only a majority of the employees who voted, and that there had been high turnover within the unit.

Senick's argument that a union shop was what the employees wanted so that they would have strength did not provide Kelly with the "compelling reason to persuade us that the union shop clause is in our best interest."[85]

No further discussions of this clause were conducted before the negotiations broke off.

12. Complete agreement (past practices and other benefits)

The Union included a clause in its original proposal that would require the Company to continue all practices and policies not expressly altered by the contract. Kelly's approach was, "[I]f something is not in the contract, it doesn't exist." He saw the Union's proposal as problematic because it did not spell out the intent of the parties and because of the potential expense of such general language "based on District 65's past record of filing grievances."

The Employer responded with an article entitled "Complete Agreement" whereby no past benefits or practices would extend beyond the contract execution date. The contract would be deemed to express "the full understanding of the parties as to all of the terms and conditions of employment for all employees in the bargaining unit." In a second paragraph (29.1) the parties waived the right to bargain for the life of the agreement as to any subject matter not specifically referred to or covered.

The first looseleaf editor contract also had a complete agreement article. It incorporated by reference the "policies or benefits set forth in the current issue of 'You and Your Company' [YAYCO] applicable to all regular full time P/H employees" except as modified by the bargaining agreement. This provision was excluded from the grievance and arbitration provisions. In addition, the clause also stated that the parties had bargained fully concerning all terms and conditions of employment. In this last respect it was similar to the language proposed in the CSD negotiations.

The second looseleaf editor contract contained separate clauses entitled "Complete Agreement" and "Other Practices." The complete agreement language was similar to that proposed in the CSD negotiations except that it did not include the restrictive language governing past practices, policies, and benefits. The other practices clause incorporated the provisions in YAYCO to substantially the same extent as YAYCO had been incorporated in the first looseleaf editor contract.

Kelly expressly rejected the Union's offer of July 8 to incorporate YAYCO by reference in the CSD agreement. He insisted that each provision be specified if it was to be considered an employee benefit or right and again raised the Union's record of frivolous arbitration as the rationale for his position. Yet, in spite of the fact that the grievances over job description which the Union had filed in the LLSD unit resulted in arbitrations costing the Employer in excess of $50,000 (Tr. 732)—a cost which Kelly attributed in large measure to the ambiguity in language of the first LLSD agreement—the second LLSD agreement continued to incorporate the employee benefits in YAYCO by reference.

When pressed to explain this apparent discrepancy in approach in company dealings with the attorney-editors on the one hand, as opposed to its dealings with composition service employees on the other, Kelly at first was evasive and confusing, and finally relied on a union grievance filed in the LLSD unit concerning an IRA plan benefit which he later conceded was not filed until April 1982, 5 months after CSD unit negotiations had ceased (Tr. 1085–1092).

On October 15, Senick presented a list of subjects the Union wanted included in the CSD contract and which were contained in the current YAYCO.[86] On October 22 the Company introduced a proposal on "Other Benefits" that expanded on the specific benefits from YAYCO that the Union had sought to be included in the agreement,[87] and exempted the entire article from grievance and arbitration. This article was initialed without modification.

The complete agreement proposal was not discussed again, however, Senick stated on October 22 that the Union would agree to something like this, but that it would wait until the end of negotiations to see what the entire contract said before doing so.

[85] No provision for union shop was included in the first LLSD contract, however, dues checkoff was provided for in the second LLSD agreement.

[86] Respondent had supplied Senick with a revised version of YAYCO in late June.

[87] These included such benefits as food and refreshment services, parking, check cashing, book discounts, and the like.

13. Credit union checkoff

The Union proposed that the Employer deduct from an employee's wages an amount authorized by the employee and transmit those funds directly to the District 65 credit union. When Senick first presented this clause on February 26 he explained that out-of-state members could use the credit union only if there was such an automatic deduction. He stated further that he believed this requirement was imposed by New York banking law, but Krawczyk corrected his statement on July 8 when she explained that checkoff for out-of-state employees was a union rule designed to expedite enforcement.

At the July 16 meeting, Kelly rejected the Union's proposal on the grounds that in his view the credit union was union business "properly done by the union on it[s] own time and location." He reiterated this position on October 22.[68]

Senick questioned Kelly's approach because there was a similar provision in the LLSD contract. Kelly responded, "I don't see the relevance in that."

On cross-examination Kelly testified that checkoff was an "administrative headache" to the payroll department because it had to be done manually for a limited number of employees.[69] However, credit union checkoff remained a part of the second LLSD contract which was signed even as the CSD negotiations continued.

14. Holiday for part-time employees

The Union sought to have paid holidays granted to the approximately 20 part-time unit employees on a pro rata basis. Respondent offered to pay part-time employees who had worked a minimum of 900 hours in the preceding calendar year for up to five holidays per year, provided the employee worked "both his scheduled work day before or [sic] his scheduled work day after the holiday, unless unavoidably absent for a reason acceptable to Prentice-Hall."[70]

Respondent explained that the situations of part-time employees is different from that of full-time employees. Kelly asserted that part-time employees enjoy greater scheduling flexibility, more informal working conditions, and the option to apply for full-time employment if they want full-time benefits. In addition, if they work a minimum number of hours, they receive the same medical insurance coverage as full-time workers because the insurance carrier makes no distinction between full- and part-time employees. Kelly further explained that Respondent had a different investment in full-time employees than in part-time employees.

The parties differences on this article were never reconciled.

15. Term of agreement

Senick twice attempted to establish the term of the bargaining agreement being negotiated. He informed Respondent on September 24 and October 22 that the Union's position was that they were discussing a 12-month proposal. Kelly maintained that Respondent had not proposed any time period and that their position remained open.

E. An Overview of the Bargaining Sessions: Their Format, Number, Frequency, Length and Pace, and the Circumstances of their Ultimate Termination

The first bargaining session was held at 6 p.m.[71] on January 22. This meeting was well attended with 5 persons representing Respondent and 14 representing the Union.[72] After submitting the bulk of the Union's contract proposals, a brief caucus followed[73] and the parties agreed on February 12 for their next meeting.

The February 12 meeting was attended by 4 representatives for Respondent and 15 representatives for the Union. The meeting began at 6:22 p.m. because the Union held a caucus first. Senick stated that the purpose of this meeting was to review the union contract proposals and to get Respondent's reaction to the various articles. At 9 p.m., after discussing several articles, Senick suggested the meeting continue until 9:30 p.m., but Bernice Krawczyk wanted to conclude the discussions at 9 o'clock and vetoed Senick's suggestion.

Before this meeting ended Senick noted that Thursday nights were good for meeting and opined that they should "try to set dates. Many dates." Kelly agreed to "schedule a couple of sessions, but let's not get too far ahead of ourselves." Meetings were scheduled for February 26 and March 5.

The third bargaining session was held on February 26, as scheduled, and concluded at 9 p.m. at Senick's request. The next session took place on March 12, the March 5 date having been canceled because of snow. Respondent was represented at each of these sessions by its entire five-person committee. The Union was represented by nine and eight persons at each meeting, respectively.

The Union completed its presentation of proposals on March 12. Kelly suggested the next meeting be held 3 weeks hence, on April 1, to allow Respondent an opportunity to draft its proposals, submit them to the Company's executive committee, and deliver copies to the Union in advance of the next meeting.

On April 1 Respondent's full committee met with Senick and nine other individuals who formed the union committee. Senick stated that he had met with the employees once since he received Respondent's proposals and the Union's impression was that the parties were "far apart" in their approach and on most items. Senick caucused with his committee for approximately 1 hour.

[68] This view of what constitutes union business as distinguished from employee matters typified Kelly's view of the union-employee relationship. See discussion sec. II,D,4, par. 31, supra.

[69] In this regard Kelly stated he considered checkoff to be an "economic item," but he never conveyed this belief to the Union (Tr. 1113).

[70] This "wrap around" language was agreed on in the holiday article governing full-time employees.

[71] All bargaining sessions commenced at or around 6 p.m. unless otherwise noted.

[72] The bargaining parties are described in greater detail in sec. II,C, supra.

[73] Caucuses were held on a regular basis throughout the negotiations. The notes do not always indicate which side requested these breaks but Kelly testified that several were caused by Respondent.

When they reconvened Senick gave Respondent several counterproposals. He also inquired about articles that were in the Union's proposed contract, but for which there were no specific articles in Respondent's proposed agreement.

In response Kelly offered Respondent's view of what the contract would be.

> Our position is, if it's not in the contract, it doesn't exist.[74] Our purpose is to avoid reliance on casual language. We would like to put the contract to bed during negotiations, not continue to argue about what we said after it's signed. If you look carefully at our proposals, you will see that many of these areas of concern have been covered.

Senick noted a difference in approach between the parties to the past practices clause and some preliminary discussion of other clauses followed. Before the meeting ended the parties agreed to meet on April 9. Kelly also informed the Union that the Company was seeking employees for both the day and evening shifts. Senick and his committee remained to meet among themselves after informing Respondent that its presence would not be required. The meeting concluded at 7:30 p.m.

The April 9 meeting was attended by Respondent's five-member committee and nine representatives for the Union. During the course of discussing the recognition clause Kelly raised the previously withdrawn unfair labor practice charge as a reason organizing activity should be limited on Prentice-Hall's premises. Senick changed the subject and turned the discussion toward the various clauses he found objectionable.

A number of items were discussed before the Union called for a caucus at 7:35 p.m. At 8:45 p.m. they reconvened until 9:10 p.m. Before the session ended Senick offered to meet the following evening or the following Tuesday. Neither date was convenient for Kelly who suggested they meet on April 21. Senick agreed.

During the April 21 session various clauses were discussed and a 5-minute caucus was held at the Union's request. Toward the end of this session Senick asked about the Company's economic proposals and expressed his eagerness to conclude the agreement after so many months. Kelly offered to come back with language on several articles, but stated that because two or more members of Respondent's committee would be out of town for the next 2 weeks, they would not be able to meet until the week of May 11. Senick objected to this delay. He argued that as chief spokesperson only Kelly's presence was required. Kelly responded that his committee's preference was not to meet without a majority of the committee present. He added, "there's a lot to get done and a lot to consider, we wouldn't want to rush through." Senick reluctantly agreed to meet on May 12 and requested another session the following week. May 27 was agreed on.

On May 12 and 27 the meetings were held as scheduled. Respondent's entire committee met with Senick and several other individuals on behalf of the Union. (There were seven and four persons in addition to Senick at each meeting, respectively). Many proposals were discussed and a caucus was requested by Senick during each meeting. On May 12 Respondent gave the Union its economic package.

The negotiators met for the 10th and 11th times on June 4 and 11. At Senick's request the June 4 session began at 6:20 p.m. to allow time for him and his five committee members to meet. On June 11 Senick and three others represented the Union's position. A half-hour caucus was held during each of these sessions.[75]

Senick was accompanied by six individuals at the next two meetings, held June 24 and July 7.[76] On June 24 the meeting followed the usual format of the parties' trading proposals, discussing their positions, and holding a caucus (this one at Senick's request) at some point during the evening. On July 7 Senick delayed the start of the meeting by 35 minutes in order to meet with his committee. Fifteen minutes after calling for a caucus at 8 p.m., Senick went to Respondent's caucus room to deliver a proposal, to arrange for two future meetings, and to indicate to Respondent that there would be no need to reconvene that evening.

July 16 and 23 were the 14th and 15th sessions. Respondent's full committee attended on both dates. Senick was accompanied by Krawczyk and two others on July 16 and by only the two other individuals on July 23.[77] These sessions proceeded in the usual manner.

At the end of the July 23 meeting, Senick announced that he would like to perpetuate the momentum he felt they had developed and begin wrapping up the negotiations. He stated, "We have significant movement in these back-to-back sessions. If we could meet regularly we could get the same accomplished in the future."[78] Further meetings were scheduled before their session concluded at 9:10 p.m.

The August 12 meeting followed the usual format. A caucus was held before the meeting ended at 8:25 p.m.[79]

The 17th and 18th meetings, held September 3[80] and 24, were attended by four of Respondent's five negotiators and by only Senick and one other person for the Union. Senick opened the September 3 meeting by announcing that after a week in Maine he had "come back and taken a new perspective on these negotiations." This meeting ended at 6:50 p.m. when the parties broke for a caucus and agreed to meet again on September 24.[81] On

---

[74] This statement had been made by Kelly on other occasions during the negotiations.

[75] The notes do not indicate who called the caucus on June 4, and the one on June 11 was held at Senick's request.

[76] Among those accompanying Senick was Bernice Krawczyk.

[77] The union committee remained small at successive negotiations sessions. Caucuses were held at each of these sessions but the notes do not indicate who called them.

[78] For a summary of the progress made over the course of the negotiations, as evidenced by agreement on specific articles, see sec. II,D,1, fn. 8, supra.

[79] The notes do not disclose who called this caucus.

[80] A session had been scheduled for August 19 but was canceled by Senick (Tr. 168).

[81] There is no indication who called this caucus.

September 24 a half-hour caucus was held during the course of the meeting. That session concluded at 7:40 p.m. with the scheduling of two future meeting dates.

The final three negotiation sessions were held on October 5 and 22 and November 5.[82] The Union's committee was slightly larger at these sessions than it had been at the previous two. At the close of the November 5 meeting the parties scheduled another session for November 19.

The November 19 session never occurred. According to Kelly, Senick telephoned him on November 17 to cancel the November 19 date and reschedule the meeting for November 25. Kelly testified further that he told Senick that he would get back to him. Kelly did, in fact, send a letter to Senick dated November 18. (R. Exh. 9.)

Senick testified that he received a letter from Kelly advising him that the Company had received a petition from the employees indicating that they did not want the Union, and that the Company had filed an RM petition with the NLRB Regional Office.[83] I credit Senick's testimony over Kelly's assertion that Senick changed the date of the November 19 meeting because it is inconsistent with the text of the letter mailed by Kelly to Senick which concludes as follows: "Accordingly, our scheduled meeting for Thursday, November 19th should be considered canceled." When I repeatedly pressed Kelly to account for the discrepancy, he could offer no explanation (Tr. 829–830).

In the November 18, 1981 letter Kelly states "On the basis of [the] petition and other objective evidence,[84] and yesterday's expiration of District 65's certification year, Prentice-Hall has a good-faith doubt that District 65 continues to represent a majority of the employees in that bargaining unit." Kelly then refers to the Company's filing of the RM petition and declines to bargain further.

The Union's charge in this case preceded this letter by 13 days, having been filed on November 5, 1981, prior to the last meeting held between the parties the evening of that day. Prior to filing of the charge, Senick had learned of some dissatisfaction among unit employees with the Union's inability to get a contract.

Regarding the frequency of meetings, a pattern developed early in which the Union, by Senick, generally sought more frequent meetings than the Respondent, with Kelly as spokesman, was willing to arrange. Thus, after the second meeting held on February 12, Senick testified he sought another session the following week but that the Company would only agree to meet in 2 weeks. The notes show Kelly responding to Senick's request to set many dates, "[L]et's not get too far ahead of ourselves." The problem arising at the close of the April 21 session has already been discussed, including Senick's unsuccessful request for a meeting in the week of May 19. Senick's July 23 request for more frequent meetings after "the sixth or seventh month of bargaining" as confirmed by the notes of that session was also rejected. At the close of the October 5 session, Senick's request for a meeting the following week was not fulfilled, and the next meeting took place on October 22. Again, the Company rejected a meeting the following week and met for the last time on November 5. To the extent Kelly has disputed any of the union requests or the attribution to him of negative responses during his testimony, I credit Senick, particularly in light of the discussions of this matter contained in the Respondent's bargaining notes, my discrediting of Kelly's testimony regarding the cancellation of the November 19 session, and the corroborative testimony of Mariella Signoretto, an employee-member of the Union's negotiating committee (Tr. 1290–1292 and Tr. 1393).

In contrast to the slow pace of session dictated by the Respondent for the composition services unit, bargaining for the second LLSD contract proceeded weekly in the beginning and twice a week thereafter, Kelly's denial to the contrary notwithstanding.

F. Credibility

In the immediately preceding section of this decision with the timing of the bargaining sessions, I discredited Kelly's denials that he was responsible for cancellation or delays in meeting. It remains to consider a more serious matter involving the credibility of both Kelly and Respondent's counsel, Madigan, when the former, in testimony, and the latter, in cross-examination of Senick and in direct examination of Kelly, sought to establish that Senick in the course of the bargaining sessions had not objected to Respondent's proposals excluding various provisions from arbitration, refusing to make layoff and recall subject to seniority, the broad management-rights clause including the "precedence" language and no-strike clause assessing individual liability and liquidated damages, or the clause making grievances the sole and exclusive means for the settlement of all disputes. Time after time, Senick was confronted with his pretrial affidavit which failed to discuss his objections to these matters at particular bargaining sessions. Thus, Senick was forced to agree he had not referred in his affidavit to his concern with the exclusion of matters from arbitration at the May 12 session (Tr. 402–403). Similarly, Kelly on direct examination denied that Senick at the April 9 session had ever stated in "words or substance" that he could not agree to corrective discipline unless it was tied to arbitration (Tr. 746). These are only two examples of many instances where Respondent attempted to show union acquiescence at the bargaining table to Respondent's proposals which the General Counsel claimed in argument made at the hearing constitute evidence of bad-faith bargaining. Other examples appear at Appendix 2 to the General Counsel's brief. In each of the examples cited, as well as the others, the Respondent's bargaining notes of [82] There is no indication who called any of the three caucuses held at each of these meetings.

[83] The petition filed on October 18 in Case 22-RM-588 was acted on by the Acting Regional Director for Region 22 who dismissed the petition on January 19, 1982, "without prejudice to reinstatement, if appropriate, on the final disposition" of the unfair labor practice case at bar. A copy of the petition, introduced into evidence by Respondent (R. Exh. 12) contains 14 legible signatures and evidence of 5 or 6 others that are illegible. The petition states that the undersigned employees desire the decertification of the Union. In his letter, Kelly refers to this petition as having been signed "by over 50 percent of the employees in the [CSD] bargaining unit." Since April 1981, Respondent had been operating with a complement of 35 employees.

[84] Kelly never clarified this phrase. During the course of bargaining he referred occasionally to the high turnover among unit employees.

the sessions that subsequently were produced on demand and became the agreed factual, albeit incomplete, record of what transpired at the meetings,[85] establishes that Senick repeatedly, and at the meetings as to which he and Kelly were questioned, raised the appropriate objections. Thus, on May 12, the notes quote Senick as saying, "On 13.4 your exclusion [sic] that article [seniority] is not subject to grievance arbitration is unacceptable. Frankly, I don't see any changes."

And, on April 9, Senick is quoted as follows:

> With regard to 4.6 [of Rules and Discipline] it is not what we want. The only adequate protection for employees is to have a just cause clause with recourse to the grievance and arbitration mechanisms. . . . With regard to 4.8, we're not interested without essential grievance and arbitration protection.

The earlier presentation of the areas in disputes in this decision is replete with numerous references to Senick's objections to Respondent proposals severely limiting arbitration, precluding any means of contract enforcement for disputes subject to grievance procedures, giving precedence in arbitration to management rights in conflicts with other contract clauses, and its liquidated damages and extensive individual liability in the event of a strike in violation of the no-strike clause (See, e.g., sec. II,D,3,4,6,7,9, supra).

Respondent's chief witness, Kelly, as well as its counsel, Madigan and Canoni, who also participated in the negotiations and had reviewed Prentice-Hall's own bargaining notes prior to the hearing, were or should have been aware that Senick had indeed raised appropriate objections to these major differences cited, among others. Thus, one may reasonably have a great degree of skepticism when weighing Kelly's or counsels' assertions that they could have, in good faith, sought to impugn and indeed impeach[86] Senick's testimony by reliance on the theory of failure to include such matter in his affidavit or by virtue of Kelly's negative response to questions couched repeatedly in the language of whether Senick had raised objections either in word or substance. Kelly is thoroughly discredited by virtue of his firm denials to such inquiries which Respondent's own document show to be patently false, and counsel had no business asserting claims that they knew to be unsupported by material prepared by and in Respondent's possession and reviewed by them prior to the hearing. (Tr. 1359.) As both counsel were active participants in the negotiation process,[87] their position in this matter may also shed light on the issue of the merits of Respondent's defense that it, indeed, sought in good faith to reach agreement and, thus, did not engage in a refusal to bargain in violation of the Act.

One other significant credibility issue is raised by Kelly's denial, under oath at the July 16 session, that he "in words or substance" asked whether the Union was "willing to forgo the right to union activity at the Company in order to reach agreement." (Tr. 784.) Canoni also denied he heard that (Tr. 1345–1346). Senick testified that at this session the parties again got into a discussion on the issue of union activities on the company premises. According to Senick he told Kelly he thought it was an illegal clause and that the Union could not agree to waive the employees' Section 7 rights to engage in union activities. Senick believed Kelly replied that "the employees had no absolute right to the union activities and that we should ask them . . . if they were willing to give up those rights or not to get some agreement." (Tr. 153.)

At the July 23 session, the notes shown Kelly agree with Senick's assertion that "the primary difference [on the grievance procedure article] is the on-premises requirements." Senick also stated the committee could not abridge employee statutory rights. Kelly asked if this position was in the self-interest of the Union or to establish an effective grievance mechanism. Senick asserted a majority of the employees wanted this and the discussion concludes. Having in mind Kelly's statement at the June 4 session that "the union did not obtain a majority of the employees in the unit," the fact that the parties were in locked positions on this issue by July and not until the last session on November 5 did the Company finally offer to limit the prohibition of union activities to a "work area" rather than the "premises" in the union stewards article where the prohibition had, since August 12, been lodged,[88] and in consideration of having generally discredited Kelly as a reliable witness on certainly the confrontations involving the most serious differences between the parties expressed at the various sessions, I conclude that Kelly did insist on a poll of the unit employees to seek a waiver of the exercise of a Section 7 right in order to reach agreement on the grievance article. Senick proved to be a generally reliable witness whose testimony was corroborated to a very high degree by the bargaining notes, and where, as in this instance, it does not appear in the July 16 notes but does not conflict with them, I am prepared to credit Senick that such an interchange took place as he has sworn, but that it took place at either the July 16 or 23 session.

Analysis and Conclusions

In Chevron Chemical Co., 261 NLRB 44, 46 (1982), the Board has described the standard governing the duty to bargain in the following language:

> [I]n ascertaining whether the duty to bargain in good faith has been complied with, it must be remembered that Section 8(d) does not "compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession . . . ." Thus, the Board does not,

[85] See sec. II,D,1, fn. 8, supra.

[86] On the record, Canoni claimed the omissions from Senick's affidavit warranted his impeachment and buttressed Respondent's claim that the Union had not objected to the contract proposals which now formed the heart of the General Counsel's case of bargaining in bad faith (see Tr. 622, 663–664).

[87] Both are also named as agents of Respondent who are alleged to have negotiated with the Union in bad faith in an amendment of the complaint offered and received in evidence in response to Respondent's pretrial motion for a bill of particulars (Tr. 8).

"either directly or indirectly, compel consessions or otherwise sit in judgment upon the substantive terms of collective-bargaining agreements." NLRB v. American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. 395, 404 (1952).[6] On the other hand, as stated by the Supreme Court, "[T]he Board has been afforded flexibility to determine . . . whether a party's conduct at the bargaining table evidences a real desire to come into agreement . . . . And specifically we do not mean to question in any way the Board's powers to determine the latter questions, drawing inferences from the conduct of the parties as a whole." NLRB v. Insurance Agents' International Union, AFL-CIO [Prudential Insurance Co.], 361 U.S. 477, 498 (1960). The Board does, of course, with court sanction, consider the content of bargaining proposals as part of its review when making a determination as to the good faith of parties negotiating a contract.[7] [6] But see fn. 10, infra.

[7] See, e.g., Seattle-First National Bank v. NLRB, 638 F.2d 1221, 1225–1226 (9th Cir. 1981); Pease Company v. NLRB, 666 F.2d 1044 (6th Cir. 1981).

In Chevron, supra at fn. 10, the Board noted that unusually harsh, vindictive, or unreasonable proposals may be deemed so predictably unacceptable as to warrant the evidentiary conclusion that they have been proffered in bad faith, citing Pease Co. v. NLRB., supra at fn. 4, and cases cited with approval, but rejected the application of that principle to the proposals at issue in Chevron.

In the same decision the Board also recognized that the search to determine whether there has been compliance with the standard must often be based on circumstantial evidence and entails an examination of the whole record:

> Determining whether parties have complied with the duty to bargain in good faith usually requires examination of their motive or state of mind during the bargaining process, and is generally based on circumstantial evidence, since a charged party is unlikely to admit overtly having acted with bad intent. Hence, in determining whether the duty to bargain in good faith has been breached, particularly in the context of a "surface bargaining" allegation, we look to whether the parties' conduct evidences a real desire to reach an agreement—a determination made by examination of the record as a whole, including the course of negotiations as well as contract proposals. [Chevron, supra at 645.]

An analysis of the record must start with the simple fact that the Union was certified as exclusive bargaining representative following an election in which it received a majority of the votes cast. That status cannot be undermined by the claim, advanced by Kelly in discussions regarding the union-shop and dues-checkoff demands, that the Union did not represent the majority of the employees in CSD because they received only 25 votes out of the total complement of 50 employees. Put another way, the Union, in winning the election by 1 vote had the same legally recognized status as a union that had won by 20 votes. And the Union was entitled to the same duty to negotiate regardless of the size of its plurality among all employees or the extent of its majority among those employees who chose to cast a ballot.

Over a period of 11 months, a series of 21 meetings were held, during which time tentative agreement was reached on over 20 bargaining subjects, but at the end, the parties remained far apart on 15 other items. Many of these 15 items were central to the Union's role as exclusive representative and collective-bargaining agent for the unit employees in determining jointly with the employer the terms and conditions of their employment. In a significant number of these subjects the Respondent's proposals undermined the Union's role and made evident an intention of denying to the Union any effective voice in jointly determining the terms of employment or in enforcing the terms and conditions of employment on which the parties had already tentatively agreed or which were embodied in the proposals that Respondent had made or modified in response to union demand. Thus, only after a series of meetings and toward the end of lengthy bargaining was the Union able to obtain the reluctant "concession" that disciplinary action against employees would only be taken for just cause—a well-recognized and well-defined standard. Yet, Respondent's concession was illusory. This was so because the final arbiter of the application of that standard to a particular disciplinary act was to be the Company itself; company conduct was not to be subject to third-party review. Furthermore, because a disciplinary act was grievable, under the Respondent's sole recourse proposal, the Union was limited to grieving an incident and could neither, in view of the Board no-strike article and the sole recourse language, engage in self-help or a contract action to enforce the just-cause standard or correct an alleged breach of it. As Kelly explained on the witness stand, the Union could not bring a lawsuit disputing a Respondent's disciplinary action (Tr. 1290).

In its brief, Respondent suggests that the sole recourse language nonetheless permitted breach of contract actions for all disputes not subject to arbitration. The plain meaning of Respondent's proposal ("the procedures set forth here and in Article 5, grievances shall serve as the seol and exclusive means for the settlement of all disputes that may arise between them") belies that claim. When coupled with Kelly's clear testimony on this point the matter is free from doubt. Contrary to Respondent's attempt in its brief also to portray Senick as understanding and sympathetic towards its strained, after the fact, interpretation of the sole recourse clause, the Union's chief negotiator protested early, on receipt of the company proposal, that "many of the clauses would be unenforceable. I would have no means of resolving disputes between us." (See sec. II,D,4, fn. 25 supra.) Senick's comment at the October 5 session cannot be taken as agreement to Respondent's posthearing reinterpretation. (See sec. II,D,4, supra.) Even if it was, that does not change the legal effect and impact of Respondent's proposals on the arbitration and rules and corrective discipline articles that were finally never agreed to for the reasons stated above, among others.

Not only was the Union limited to grieving disciplinary decisions but it could not be assured that even relatively minor rules, infractions, or alleged unsatisfactory performance would be subject to the progressive discipline procedure. Thus, employees were not assured of notice by warnings or evaluative review which would provide them with reasonable time to improve their performance before being subject to discharge or other severe discipline not itself subject to any effective union review or recourse.

What has been said about the impact of the sole recourse language affected, of course, not only disciplinary acts but all matters made grievable under the proposed agreement. I do not believe any terms or conditions of employment were excluded from the grievance procedure, but a significant number were excused from arbitration; among them, profit sharing, other benefits, wages, rules and corrective discipline, seniority, medical and life insurance, and subcontracting.

Respondent's rejoiner to the Union's demand for arbitration as a last resort for disputes arising in these areas does not withstand close scrutiny. The so-called frivolous and costly arbitrations under the first LLSD contract did not cause Prentice-Hall to seek the exclusion of, e.g., seniority or discharge disputes from ultimate resolution through arbitration in the second LLSD contact. Neither did the costly nature of the arbitrations cause Respondent to seek a tightening of the time limits for processing grievances to arbitration under that agreement. See sec. II,D,4, fn. 15, supra. Furthermore, there was no evidence that as to disciplinary actions by the Employer, the Union, representing these employees, would act in an irrational or abusive manner. And it was the exclusion of arbitration from the rules and corrective disciplines article that was central to the Union's expressed concerns, not promotion or upgrading—the issues arbitrated under LLSD I.

In its brief, Respondent refers to the fact that the management-rights article was made subject to binding arbitration. Therefore, it argues, the Union could seek an outside award restricting the application of that article to conduct alleged to breach another clause. In answer, first, that other clause itself had to be arbitrable, because the Union would grieve a breach of another clause and the Company would interpose the management-rights article in its defense and, as already noted, at least seven articles governing certain benefits and working conditions were not, including, in particular, seniority and corrective discipline. See Florida Machine & Foundry Co., 174 NLRB 1156 (1969), remanded 441 F.2d 1005 (D.C. Cir. 1970), supplemental decision 190 NLRB 563 (1971), enfd. sub nom. Steelworkers v. NLRB, 78 LRRM 2895 (D.C. Cir. 1971). Second, the broad range of management rights diminished and restricted the areas over which the parties had a joint role. Third, the precedence language on which Respondent insisted to the end makes clear that the broad and specific range of matters over which the Company exercised unilateral control, including a whole host of personnel decisions, among others, affecting the operation of its business, would and must prevail in any conflict with another clause, not only where, as asserted by Respondent in its brief (R. Br. 66), the clause was unsupported by specific conflicting language. Certainly, no argument would be persuasive to an arbitrator based on an interpretation of another clause that did not in haec verba establish the claim as against a specific management right.

Respondent's further assertion that it would not be able to enjoin a strike protesting nonarbitrable grievances under Boys Markets v. Retail Clerks Local 770, 398 U.S. 235 (1970), and Buffalo Forge Co. v. Steelworkers, 428 U.S. 397 (1976), is small comfort[] when the Union would surely face the strong likelihood of success against it in a damage action under Section 301 of the Act alleging breach of the express and broad no-strike commitment, Ryder Truck Lines v. Teamsters Local 480, 727 F.2d 594 (6th Cir. 1984), cert. denied 469 U.S. 825 (1984). Just as in Ryder, the no-strike pledge would have been given, if the parties had agreed to Respondent's last proposal made on October 5, in exchange for the Company's no-lockout pledge, and not in exchange for the onerous, narrow, and slanted grievance and arbitration procedure. That being the case, just as in Ryder, the no-strike clause clearly applied to disputes over nonarbitrable, as well as aribtrable, matters. Thus, strikes to protest discharges, disciplinary acts, personnel actions in which seniority was disregarded as well as arbitrary wage decisions affecting one or all employees would violate the no-strike clause and subject the Union not only to suit but to the punitive and extensive liquidated damage provisions insisted on by Respondent and, as noted at sec. II,D,7, par. 5, supra, without the necessity of first bringing the matter to arbitration.

The conclusion is almost self-evident from the foregoing that the conjunction of Respondent's grievance, arbitration, management rights, rules and corrective discipline, no-strike, and seniority proposals established such a disparity between the rights the Respondent would enjoy, as against the disabilities the Union and employees would suffer because of the lack of effective monitoring and enforcement of even the limited benefits and rights granted by Respondent, that the agreement proposed by Respondent lacked mutuality and was not mutually enforceable.

As observed by the Board in San Isabel Electric Services, 225 NLRB 1073, 1079 at fn. 7 (1976):

> We have consistently found bad-faith bargaining in cases in which an employer has insisted on a broad management rights clause and a no-strike clause during negotiations, while, at the same time, refusing to agree to an effective grievance and arbitration procedure. See generally, Kayser-Roth Hosiery Company, Inc., 176 NLRB 999 (1969); ITT Henze Valve Services, Controls, and Instruments Divi- sion, ITT, 166 NLRB 592 (1967); East Texas Steel Castings Company, Inc., 154 NLRB 1080 (1965); "M" System, Inc., Mobile Home Division Mid-States Corporation, 129 NLRB 527 (1960).

[] It is also decidedly unclear whether the principle of Boys Market would apply where Respondent's last no-strike proposal made on October 5 provides an agreement by the Union that Prentice-Hall may sue, inter alia, for injunctive relief. Would not this language constitute a waiver of the rights the Union could assert under Boys Market and Buffalo Forge with respect to a strike over a nonarbitrable subject?

In Continental Insurance Co. v. NLRB, 495 F.2d 44 (2d Cir. 1974), the court recognized that in addition to other indications of bad faith, some of the employer's proposals made "it impossible for the Union to reach a collective-bargaining agreement without virtually surrendering its right to represent the employees in disputes over working conditions . . . . " Id. at 48. Particularly apt was the court's highlighting of the employer's insistence on a no-strike clause coupled with a limited opportunity for arbitration of disputes. The court stated that "[t]he Board was fully justified in concluding that the proposal was not made in good faith." Id. at 49. Also, just as in the instant case, the Company insisted on union agreement not to organize (or represent) other company employees. See also American Parts System, 232 NLRB 41, 47–48 (1977), in which the Board, quoting from San Isabel, supra at 1080, stated:

> The Company's proposed contract in effect "would strip the Union of any effective method of representing its members" further excluding it "from any participation in decisions affecting important conditions of employment . . . thus exposing [the company's] bad faith."

When the onerous demand made here, not present in either San Isabel or Continental Insurance Co., prohibiting union and employee recourse to the courts to redress all contractual matters on which Respondent had the last word under the grievance procedure, is added to the other restrictive and punitive demands on which San Isabel and Continental essentially relied, it is clear that Respondent made throughout the course of bargaining such unusually harsh, vindictive, and unreasonable proposals to warrant the evidentiary conclusion that they were offered in bad faith, in violation of the duty to bargain under Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[90] See NLRB v. Wright Motors, 603 F.2d 604 (7th Cir. 1979); see also A-1 King Size Sandwiches, 265 NLRB 850 (1982), and Kayser-Roth Hosiery Co., 176 NLRB 999 (1969).[91]

In fact, the employees would have been better off without the Union than with the contract Prentice-Hall proposed. Without the Union, the employees could peacefully strike over any alleged unfair employer policy directed to them or any unjust personnel decision without fear of damage liability of any sort.

Without the Union, a disciplined employee could seek to assert under New Jersey law in an appropriate case falling within the public policy exception, claim to wrongful discharge—a claim probably foreclosed by the sole and exclusive means contract language on which Respondent insisted. The public policy exception to the employment-at-will principle was applied by the Supreme Court of New Jersey to a retaliatory discharge in Lally v. Copygraphics, 85 N.J. 668, 428 A.2d 1317 (1981), in which the plaintiff alleged a wrongful discharge arising from her filing of a compensation claim. Until Respondent deleted its 6-month-old demand prohibiting the exercise of Section 7 rights by employees on its premises, the employees and the Union would have been unable to retain their full organizational rights under the Act without any restriction whatsoever.[92] That Respondent finally transferred this restriction to the stewards' article and then, at the last meeting, agreed to permit the union steward to perform his duties in a nonwork area is not evidence of good-faith bargaining, but rather evidence of the lengths to which Prentice-Hall was prepared to go to stretch out and unduly prolong the bargaining process to the point where employees would predictably lose interest and a decertification petition could be timely filed. Such a demand, including the insistence on a poll of unit employees to seek a waiver of the exercise of such rights, was unlawful and the Union could not legitimately waive these basic organizational rights under the Act. NLRB v. Magnavox Co. of Tennessee, 415 U.S. 322, 325 (1974). Kelly's justification for such a waiver of basic rights, that the unit should be limited "to unit business" and that permitting such activity will lead to the filing of charges, is no justification at all, indeed there could be none. Just as in Romo Paper Products Corp., 220 NLRB 519, 526 (1975), "as long as the Respondent insisted on these demands it adopted a position so demonstrably antithetical to the bargaining principle as to constitute a defiant breach of Section 8(a)(5)."

The employees also would have been at last equally well off without the Union as to those among the 23 agreed items that merely provided the existing YAYCO benefits granted unilaterally to all nonunion employees. Even to achieve parity with nonunion employees, numerous bargaining sessions were held before Prentice-Hall would finally agree to provide YAYCO benefits, e.g., in the areas of profit sharing, leave of absence, holidays, severance pay, and vacations (this last agreement not having been reached until October 22 after the exchange of eight written proposals). Furthermore in a number of areas the Company, without adequate explanation, refused to offer benefits provided the LLSD employees. For example, without any restriction on the time for jury duty imposed on the 15 percent of nonattorney-editors in the LLSD unit, Prentice-Hall insisted on such limits for the composition service employees. Also credit union checkoff was rejected for these employees as was arbitral review of seniority decisions, at the same time these were agreed to in the second LLSD unit contract. As to the other benefits article, there was some prevarication, but finally, no justification, for Prentice-Hall's refusal to incorporate the YAYCO benefits by reference as it had in the LLSD agreements. See sec. II,D,12, supra. Requiring the Union to list these other benefits seriatim before agreement about their retention could be reached was another cause of the stretch out in bargaining which prolonged it to the end of the certification year. Another area where the duration of bargaining, covering almost every session held from their submission in April to October or November, showing the length to which the Company was prepared to go in setting up road blocks to meaningful agreement, was regarding both the arbitration and grievances articles. Their history is recounted at sec. II,D,4 and 5, supra, respectively. Although agreement was reached on one of the two grievances, the Company's proposals in certain procedural and even substantive areas where agreement would normally have been considered easily achievable excessively prolonged the negotiation process to the point when employee unrest and dissatisfaction with the Union could have been predicted.

[90] Although there is no evidence or claim of independent 8(a)(1) or (3) conduct in this proceeding, I note that this Employer has been found to have violated those sections of the Act by conduct engaged in the period immediately prior to, and overlapping the beginning of, negotiations in this proceeding regarding certain clerical employees employed at its West Nyack, New Jersey facility where the same charging union had engaged in organizing activities in mid- to late-1979. Prentice-Hall, Inc., 258 NLRB 1340 (1981).

[91] "Viewed together, these three interrelated demands—broad freedom to act unilaterally in the treatment of employees, denial of an amicable and definite method for final resolution of the predictable and recurring disputes in the administration of the contract and the surrender of the employees' statutory right to act in concert—pervasively indicate a pervasive intent to deny the employees the right to an effective collective voice in their economic destinies." Kayser-Roth Hosiery Co., id. at 1003.

[92] For 2 months after making its bargaining proposals on April 1, Respondent would have even prohibited steward-employer grievance meetings any where or time on its premises.

Regarding wages, the Company's unwillingness to propose even a guaranteed minimum 5-percent increase in the face of persuasive evidence that such an increase conformed with existing companywide practice, see section II,D,10, supra, its exclusion of the article from arbitration, as well as its failure to provide the Union with any input into or even notice of an appraisal review system where the contracts Respondent claimed to rely on for preparation of its wage proposal all included either minimum increases or review and appeal review mechanism for denial of increases, buttresses the conclusion I have reached that the Union was effectively excluded from consulting or participating in setting or reviewing the terms and conditions of employment of unit employees.

This last point illustrates another tactic engaged in by Respondent, evidencing its lack of good faith. In a number of instances, including the foregoing—another arising in the area of its no-strike proposal, section II,D,7, supra, and a third appearing regarding seniority as governing order of layoff, section II,D,9, and section II,D,9 at fn. 51, supra—Respondent misinformed the Union that the contracts it had relied on to draft its proposals had provisions that fully supported the postition it was taking in the composition services bargaining.

It is no doubt true that Respondent made concessions in various proposals over the course of bargaining, that indeed 23 items were initialed and set aside, and that its movement in certain areas induced positive reactions from Senick at various times in the bargaining. Yet, certain of the concessions were of the nature of belated recognitions of the validity of fair and timeworn standards and procedures—for example the "just cause" standard for discipline of employees and the adoption of the provision relating to jointly sharing the costs of arbitration, compliance with time limits on processing of grievances and for selection of an arbitrator, which did not represent real movement toward agreement on the Company's part. As noted by the court in NLRB v. Herman Sausage Co., 275 F.2d 229, 232 (5th Cir. 1960), and as I find existed here "one must recognize as well that bad faith is prohibited though done with sophistication and finesse. Consequently, to sit at a bargaining table, or . . . to make concessions here and there, could be the very means by which to conceal a purposeful strategy to make bargaining futile or fail."

The Company was no doubt bargaining from a position of strength. It is relatively large and had substantial resources, not least of which is the experience of the members of its bargaining team, including its chief negotiator Kelly and lead counsel Canoni. The Union, having won the election by a paper-thin margin, and employing a relatively inexperienced negotiator operating with little organizational support, represented a unit constituting a very small percentage of Respondent's work force, in a work area in which 95 percent of the work it performs had been historically subcontracted outside the Company. Thus, the economic and practical realities gave the Company enormous advantages in striking a bargain that reflected these factors.[93]

What the facts show, however, is that the Company used its strengths to impose terms that it knew left the Union with almost no voice in the employment decisions affecting employees and with no effective consultative role in these matters.

Instead of recognizing the real nature of the legal issue presented by the history of the bargaining between the parties as analyzed here, Respondent's chief negotiator and counsel sought to dwell at the hearing on a fraudulent factual issue concerning whether during the course of bargaining, and at appropriate times, the Union's negotiator raised timely objections and voiced concern regarding the Company's proposals in key areas restricting the union participation in the establishment of working conditions and treatment of employees, resolution of disputes in the administration of the contract and the exercise of employee rights to protest, act in concert, and pursue claims in other forums. I conclude that the Respondent's agents' emphasis on an issue they knew lacked credibility in light of the later production of its bargaining notes, reinforces the conclusion I have reached based on the totality of the circumstances including these discredited tactics, that Prentice-Hall engaged in a course of conduct from the outset of bargaining, which manifested an unwillingness and lack of desire "to reach ultimate agreement, to enter into a collective-bargaining contract" NLRB v. Insurance Agents, 361 U.S. 477, 485 (1960).

It also follows from what has already been concluded, that Respondent's withdrawal of recognition from the Union as exclusive bargaining representative in the certified unit, by its letter of November 18, 1981, at a time when it had not fulfilled its bargaining duty toward the Union, constitutes an independent violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Respondent's assertion of a good-fatih doubt in that letter, based at least in part on a petition signed by an apparent majority of unit employees, is rendered a nullity by its pattern of bad-faith bargaining. Of course, Respondent's prior unlawful course of conduct completely taints the signature petition as well as the decertification petition filed in Case 22-RM-588, previously dismissed by the Acting Regional Director.

[93] The bargaining on the subcontracting clause reflected this disparity, as did the periodic company references to employee turnover and its difficulties in restaffing the unit. Although the bargaining on subcontracting may not have risen to the level of a refusal to bargain, the Company's inflexibility on providing any protection for existing employees jobs, if only procedural in nature, reflects on employer motivation. So, too, the various delays in bargaining sessions which I have found attributable, without justification, to Respondent although not forming the basis of the decision I reach here, reflects as well on employer motivation.

It remains for other defenses raised by Respondent in its brief to be considered. In section II,D,15, and in the Analysis and Conclusions section; paragraphs 22-24, supra, Respondent first asserts that Kelly never indicated that Prentice-Hall's position on management rights or arbitration was a final position. At the last meeting, on November 5, in response to Senick's inquiry, Kelly responded that he would consider union proposals on arbitration, just cause, or seniority. Respondent further points to Senick's acknowledgement that no final position had been taken on any matter by Prentice-Hall. With these open items and the seven items agreed on in the last three sessions and two in the last session alone, bargaining had not been completed. In Alkahn Silk Label Co., 193 NLRB 167, 172 (1971), cited in support of this theory, in contrast to the case at bar, by the fourth, if not the third, of a series of postsettlement meetings, the employer had made a wage offer slightly higher than the union's last preceding wage proposal, and tentative agreement had been reached on articles for a contract except for three noneconomic items of arbitration, checkoff, and union security. After the union had indicated its unwillingness to sign without some form of either union security or checkoff, and some form of arbitration and had made revised proposals in these areas at the last meeting, respondent indicated its willingness to bargain further on these matters. It did so by its vice president's stating there was merit to the union's latest arbitration proposal and he was willing to discuss the possibility of agreeing to it. It was the union's failure to follow up on this offer to further negotiate that led to the conclusion of the administrative law judge, affirmed by the Board, that bargaining had not yet been completed and the postsettlement complaint alleging a refusal to bargain was dismissed.

Regarding management rights, at the last meeting, when Senick said if the precedence language (incorporated since June 11 in the Company's written proposal) was deleted from the arbitration article, then the parties would be close on both arbitration and management rights, Kelly's response was, "We will look at this and consider it." Thus, 10 meetings after first proposing the limitation on an arbitrator's discretion and first stating that this provision "is very important to us" and first learning that this provision was a "problem" for the Union, Respondent claims that Kelly's words mean that movement is possible. I cannot agree, not with the lengthy bargaining history on this clause presented on this record. See also my finding at section II,D,4, fn. 27 that the breach was profound as early as June 11. Kelly's response, consistent with other statements by him which also held out false hope of movement, is just another instance of the surface bargaining in which Respondent engaged. Following this meeting, Kelly canceled one scheduled for November 19 and refused to meet again on any bargaining subjects.

At the last meeting, Kelly's response to Senick's inquiry about making just cause subject to arbitral review, "Not at this stage. It falls under an area we feel is best served by management's sole review" hardly shows an openness or willingness to consider change. Kelly's later comment that "we will consider proposals you have in the matter" of arbitration and just cause or on seniority does not show any movement in light of its consistent longstanding opposition to third-party arbitral review in these areas. In essence, Respondent was paying lip service to the bargaining principle without making any meaningful effort to reach agreement. Alkahn Silk, supra, is thus clearly distinguishable on the facts. Neither is it necessary for the General Counsel to establish that an impasse was reached on any of these subjects, so long as Respondent insisted, until it ceased to bargain, on demands which are antithetical to the bargaining principle, Romo Paper Products Corp., supra.

Respondent also claims in its brief (R. Br. 66) that in Gehnrich & Gehnrich, Inc., 258 NLRB 528 (1981), the Board rejected the argument that the making of a proposal discriminatory of rights of economic strikers, not insisted on and later withdrawn, and not implemented, was not unlawful. Thus, by implication, Respondent's proposal seeking the waiver of Section 7 on the premises of organizational rights, later withdrawn, was not unlawful.

In Gehnrich, unlike the instant proceeding, the administrative law judge and the Board, including the dissent, did not conclude that the employer was engaging in surface bargaining. Also, the demand in Gehnrich was not an unlawful one, concerning rights of strikers, which could be waived, see Gem City Ready Mix Co., 270 NLRB 1260 (1984), unlike the demand regarding basic organizational rights in the instant case, see Magnavox Co., supra.

Furthermore, unlike the situation in Gehnrich, Respondent maintained its unlawful demand consistently for 8 months, switching it from one article to another, and, only at the last meeting, just prior to the expiration of the certification year, withdrawing it. Such conduct here, in contrast to Gehnrich, cannot be weighed without also placing it in a context of other proposals and bargaining and trial tactics, indeed, the totality of Respondent's conduct, which demonstrates that it was seeking to avoid an agreement.

Regarding the string of citations appearing in Respondent's briefs (R. Br. 67-68), I would reject the conclusions in each of them as inapplicable to the facts at hand. In the final analysis, the ultimate finding of bad faith is based on the totality of the circumstances. NLRB v. Milgo Industrial, 567 F.2d 540, 545 (2d Cir. 1977). Those circumstances here are most closely related to the cases on which I have relied. When, in addition to a close analysis of the proposals Respondent made, its conduct and tactics in bargaining and at trial are also weighed, the conclusion is strong that this employer did not meet its obligation "to make some reasonable effort in some direction to compose his differences with the Union," the minimum requirement "if Section 8(a)(5) is to read as imposing any substantial obligation at all." NLRB v. Reed & Prince Mfg. Co., 205 F.2d 131, 135 (1st Cir. 1953).

Respondent also suggests that Aughenbaugh v. North American Refractories Co., 65 LRRM 2968, 2971 (Pa. Sup. Ct. 1967), would not preclude a breach of contract action filed by the union where the grievance article was said to provide an exclusive remedy (R. Br. 65). Aughenbaugh must be limited to its facts. Those show that the agreement provided that "Complaints arising under the provision will be subject for discussion by the Company and the Union only at the Union's request." That language was held not to spell out any element of finality; or in context, any inference of finality. In contrast, the "sole and exclusive means" language in the arbitration article surely spells out a finality; it directly precludes any other means of settling all disputes that may arise. The parties' discussions, in particular, the ones held on April 1 and June 4, show union recognition of the impact of this clause and no respondent attempt to allay the Union's misgivings. Finally, Kelly admitted the preclusion of court suit under the language at the hearing.

Finally, Respondent relies on the holding by the Board in Chevron to support its defense, claiming its facts closely parallel those in the case sub judice. Chevron is clearly distinguishable on the facts, unlike the arbitration, grievance, and management-rights proposals in Chevron. Prentice-Hall insisted on its precedence language to the end, excluded major terms and conditions of employment, including discharge and discipline, seniority and other benefits, from arbitration, and closed the circle by precluding union or employee suits even where grievances on all disputes arising between them could only end in the employer's unilateral review. Unlike the Chevron no-strike proposal, injunctive relief and substantial liquidated damages are obtainable and recoverable on immediate court suit without the necessity of exhaustion of the arbitration process, and Respondent insisted on union steward responsibility in a separate article irrespective of whether he actually participated in strike action. Further, unlike the fact in Chevron, the Respondent never proposed any across-the-board wage increase whatsoever and relied on other contracts, falsely, to preclude even evaluation procedures and review mechanisms to assist employees in improving and so, warranting, merit increase. Furthermore, far from ending up with improvements over the terms Respondent had agreed to in the LLSD units, Prentice-Hall, without reasonable explanation and, in at least one case with an explanation which was false, insisted on terms no better than and, in some cases, worse than those received by the LLSD employees. Finally, Respondent's unlawful demand for waiver of basic organizational rights has no counterpart in the Chevron case. Neither did its bargaining tactics throughout the period covered by the sessions designed to unduly prolong the process without any real attempt to come to agreement, nor its conduct at the hearing, relying knowingly and heavily on claimed but false union acquiescence in its proposals.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Union is the certified bargaining representative for Respondent's employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time advertising production coordinators, camera operators, compositors, pasteup artists, system operators, quality control personnel, control clerks and proofreaders employed by the Employer in its Composition Services Department at its Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey facility but excluding all managerial employees, confidential employees, casual employees, professional employees, watchmen, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

2. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by bargaining in bad faith with no intention of entering into any final or binding collective-bargaining agreement and by withdrawing its recognition of the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described in paragraph 1.

3. The unfair labor practices found affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.[94]

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in the unfair labor practices set forth above, I recommend that it cease and desist from such conduct or like or related conduct and take affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act. I shall also recommend that Respondent be ordered to bargain collectively in good faith, on request, with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the above unit; in the event that an understanding is reached, to embody such understanding in a signed agreement; and to post the attached notice.

In order to ensure that the employees will be accorded the statutorily prescribed services of their elected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, I shall recommend that the initial year of certification begin on the date that Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Union as the bargaining representative in the appropriate unit. Southern Paper Box Co., 193 NLRB 881, 883 (1971).[95]

[94] Respondent's motion to correct typographical errors in the record is granted. Copies of that motion have been incorporated into the official record of this case.

[95] Although I am precluded from concluding that Respondent unlawfully refused to bargain prior to the May 5, 1981 date alleged in the complaint (because the General Counsel does not allege a prior date and Sec. 10(b) of the Act would not permit it), nonetheless, I am confident in concluding that the Employer's totality of conduct both within and without the 10(b) period is such that the period of required bargaining will be 1 year with no setoff for the period of some 3-1/2 months from the commencement of bargaining not alleged as a violation of the bargaining obligation in the complaint. Cf. Glomac Plastics, 234 NLRB 1309 (1978), enfd. 592 F.2d 94 (2d Cir. 1979).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[96]

ORDER

The Respondent, Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively and in good faith concerning rates of pay, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment with District 65, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, AFL–CIO by bargaining with the Union in bad faith with no intention of entering into any final or binding collective-bargaining agreement and by withdrawing its recognition of the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time advertising production coordinators, camera operators, compositors, pasteup artists, system operators, quality control personnel, control clerks and proofreaders employed by the Employer in its Composition Services Department at its Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey facility but excluding all managerial employees, confidential employees, casual employees, professional employees, watchmen, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain collectively and in good faith concerning rates of pay, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment with the above-named Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the above-described unit, and embody in a signed agreement any understanding reached. The initial year of the Union's certification as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the above-designated unit will begin on the date Respondent commences bargaining in good faith with the Union as such representative.

(b) Post at its facility in Englewood Cliff, New Jersey, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[97] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 22, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[96] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[97] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively and in good faith concerning rates of pay, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment with District 65, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, AFL–CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of our employees in the unit described below:

> All full-time and regular part-time advertising production coordinators, camera operators, compositors, pasteup artists, system operators, quality control personnel, control clerks and proofreaders employed by the Employer in its Composition Services Department at its Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey facility but excluding all managerial employees, confidential employees, casual employees, professional employees, watchmen, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain collectively and in good faith concerning rates of pay, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment with the above Union as the exclusive representative of our employees in the appropriate bargaining unit as stated above, and embody any understanding reached in a signed agreement.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On December 14, 1984, the Board issued its Supplemental Decision and Order in this proceeding,[1] requiring the Respondent, inter alia, to pay backpay to unlawfully discharged discriminatees David and Susan Younce. On a petition for enforcement, the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit denied enforcement in relevant part.[2] The court found that the Younces had willfully failed to mitigate their losses because they "had deliberately refused to seek comparable and equivalent employment opportunities [in their former work as apartment caretakers] and that such work was in fact available at all relevant times."[3] In this regard, the court relied on uncontroverted evidence from the Respondent that apartment caretaker couple positions comparable to the Younces' former employment were available in the Detroit area monthly throughout the entire 6-1/2-year period covered by the backpay specification. Although the Younces had occasionally succeeded in obtaining other interim jobs while seeking a change in lifestyle, the court reasoned that a wrongdoing employer does not have to underwrite such activity indefinitely when comparable and equivalent job opportunities were so clearly available.

Accordingly, the court remanded this proceeding to the Board for recomputation of the backpay award, taking into account the court's willful loss finding. The court left to the Board the determination of "what would have been a reasonable time for the Younces to wait after rejecting the [invalid] offer of alternative employment made by Seligman" on November 11, 1976.[4] Subsequent to the court's remand, both the General Counsel and the Respondent have filed statements of position. The Respondent has also filed a response to the General Counsel's statement.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Having accepted the court's remand, and having duly considered the parties' statements of position, we accept the court's opinion as the law of the case. Contrary to the General Counsel, we view the court's finding of willful loss of earnings as comprehensive of the entire postdischarge period rather than just the time from the Younces' October 7, 1975 discharge until the spring of 1978, when they moved away from the Detroit, Michigan area of their former employment. It is clear from the court's opinion that the court was cognizant of evidence both that the Younces secured numerous interim jobs and that they made some inquiries about caretaking jobs after moving from upstate Michigan to Wisconsin in the summer of 1980. Consequently, although the court is not explicit on this point, we find that its decision to recompute the Younces' backpay award limits us to determining that initial period in which it may have been reasonable for the Younces to explore alternatives to their former profession and after which no further backpay is appropriate in light of their failure to seek available caretaking jobs.

The Respondent contends that the Younces are not entitled to any backpay because they have already received the equivalent of 6 weeks' gross backpay by remaining in their apartment for 6 months after their unlawful discharge without paying rent. The General Counsel has made no specific alternative contention concerning the definition of an initial reasonable period for the Younces to have refrained from seeking available caretaking positions. Under the particular circumstances of this case, including the law of the case as decided by the court, we find merit in the Respondent's view that 6 weeks encompassed whatever period the Younces could reasonably have allowed to pass before initiating a search for caretaking positions. Accordingly, we find that David and Susan Younce are not entitled to any further backpay.[5]

[5] The Respondent remains obligated, however, to remedy its unlawful discharge of the Younces by making a valid offer of reinstatement. Its failure to do so may result in backpay liability beyond the period covered by the backpay specification of this ligitation.

ORDER

On the basis of the opinion of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit and the entire record in this case, the National Labor Relations Board modifies its previous order so that no further backpay shall be due to discriminatees David and Susan Younce for the period covered by the backpay specification.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On July 19, 1985, Administrative Law Judge William F. Jacobs issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in response.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs[1] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] and to adopt the recommended Order.

The judge found and we agree that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging employees Thompson Della Cioppa, Manuel Gonzalez, and John Traynor for refusing to cross the picket line set up at a customer's place of business.

On January 30, 1985,[4] the Respondent's operations superintendent, David Spencer, assigned Della Cioppa and Gonzalez to work on a project at the Gulf refinery in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. Della Cioppa and Gonzalez were to work with other Gulf employees under Gulf Oil Supervisor Jerry Hansen. The two employees worked January 30 and 31, Wednesday and Thursday, without incident. They entered and exited the refinery through gate 51 in one of the Respondent's trucks, which was clearly marked with the Respondent's decal and logo. On January 31, Hansen informed Gonzalez that there might be picketing at gate 51. The next morning, Friday, February 1, Della Cioppa and Gonzalez entered the refinery through gate 24 in an unmarked car. That day Hansen told the two employees that there would definitely be a strike on the following Monday, February 4,[5] and that they should report to work through gate 24 in an unmarked car. Della Cioppa and Gonzalez were also advised to exit the refinery through gate 51, which had been assigned to the Union for primary picketing. When they left the refinery on February 1, Della Cioppa asked the guard if it would be all right for them to use gate 51 on the following Monday. The guard told them not to use the gate because there would be picketing at all gates and if they tried to go through the gate they would be beaten up.

On returning to the Respondent's facility, Della Cioppa and Gonzalez told Spencer and Operations Manager Raymond Toppin that if there were a strike on Monday they preferred not to cross the picket line. They also told Spencer and Toppin that they felt conditions were unsafe as they had heard that some employees of another company had been beaten up after leaving the refinery through gate 51. Spencer responded that as the strike was not scheduled to start until 7:30 a.m. on Monday, Della Cioppa and Gonzalez should report to the refinery at 7 a.m. in an unmarked vehicle. After this meeting, Della Cioppa and Gonzalez discussed the situation with other employees for about 2 hours and decided that if there were a picket line at the refinery on Monday they would not cross it for reasons of safety and business ethics.

On Monday, February 4, Della Cioppa and Gonzalez arrived at the refinery at 7:30 a.m. instead of at 7 a.m. as instructed by Spencer because they did not want to arrive before the pickets, enter the gate without obstruction, then later find themselves trapped behind the picket line on the way out. On arriving, the two employees found about 40 to 50 pickets at gate 51. A truck that was attempting to enter through that gate was surrounded by a crowd of pickets.

Della Cioppa and Gonzalez decided not to enter the site and made several trips around the refinery to assess the situation. They found pickets at all the gates. Gonzalez called Spencer and told him that they did not want to cross the picket line. Spencer instructed them to meet Hansen at gate 24. Gonzalez indicated that because he felt it would be unsafe and for business reasons he still did not want to cross the picket line. Della Cioppa and Gonzalez returned to the Respondent's facility.

Before Della Cioppa and Gonzalez arrived, Traynor was asked if he would cross the picket line to work at the refinery. Traynor told Spencer

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] In agreeing with the judge that the discrepancies in Della Cioppa's and Gonzalez' timesheets do not preclude a remedy here, we rely solely on the judge's finding that there is no evidence that the Respondent would have terminated these employees on the basis of this misconduct in the absence of their protected activity.

[4] Unless otherwise indicated all dates are in 1985.

[5] We correct the judge's inadvertent error that the date was July 4.

that he did not want to cross because he did not have enough facts as to who was striking and why.

On arriving at the Respondent's office, Della Cioppa and Gonzalez told the other technicians about the pickets and the violence involving the employees of another company. When Gonzalez was summoned to the phone to speak with the Respondent's regional general manager, he was told that if he refused to go to the refinery he would be laid off. Toppin then asked Della Cioppa, Gonzalez, and Traynor each, if they would go to work at the refinery. Della Cioppa and Gonzalez refused. Traynor told Toppin that he felt that more information was necessary. Toppin responded, "You know your option." All three employees were discharged.

Later that morning, Spencer and technician William Mason went to the refinery, completed the job, and left the site around 2 or 2:30 p.m., apparently without incident.

The judge found that the Respondent unlawfully discharged the three employees for their refusal to cross the picket line at the Gulf refinery. In so finding, the judge relied on Business Services By Manpower, 272 NLRB 827 (1984); and ABS Co., 269 NLRB 774 (1984), in which the Board held that the Act protects an employee's refusal to cross a picket line even when the sole motivation is fear.[6]

The Respondent argues that the Board should balance its legitimate business reasons for discharging the employees—performance of work assignments—against the employees' interest in the concerted activity at issue here and find that the type of conduct engaged in by Della Cioppa, Gonzalez, and Traynor is entitled to less weight than the Respondent's valid business considerations.

Even under this approach, the Respondent's interest in the performance of its work assignments is outweighed by the Section 7 rights of the employees in refusing to cross a stranger picket line. As found by the judge, the work that the three dischargees refused to perform was performed by Spencer and employee Mason within 1 or 2 hours of the discharges and was completed in a couple of hours. Thus, this is a case in which the work that the dischargees failed to perform could be completed with little or no disruption in the Employer's operation or with only a harmless delay. Moreover, the dischargees had given the Respondent advance notice on Friday of their concern regarding crossing the picket line on Monday morning. Thus, this case is plainly distinguishable from Business Services by Manpower, 272 NLRB 827 (1984), enf. denied 784 F.2d 442 (2d Cir. 1986). In denying enforcement of the Board's order, the Second Circuit noted that the nature of the operation in that case—a temporary help service—rendered the smooth replacement of the employee or performance of the work impossible, so that the failure of these employees to report to work meant that business was lost forever. As shown above, this factor does not exist in this case.

The Respondent also stresses that Gonzalez and Della Cioppa were instructed to arrive early so that they would not have to cross the picket line to enter the plant. As the judge found, Gonzalez and Della Cioppa did not want to arrive before the picket line was set up, enter the gate, and later find themselves caught behind the picket line, subject to possible violence. We cannot agree that the employees' refusal to arrive early weakens their Section 7 interests. Gonzalez and Della Cioppa were discharged for refusing to cross a picket line, not for refusing to report early. Had the latter been the case, and only then, would we need to address whether the refusal to report early was itself an act in concert with the strikers.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Western Stress, Inc., Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and Mt. Laurel, Maryland, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

MEMBER CRACRAFT, concurring.

I concur in the result. I would find a violation here under either the approach applied by the Board in its decision in Business Services by Manpower, 272 NLRB 827 (1984), enf. denied 784 F.2d 442 (2d Cir. 1986), or under the balancing test applied by the Second Circuit in that case and advocated by the Respondent here.

Marvin L. Weinberg, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Doris J. Dabrowski, Esq., of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, for the Respondent.

[6] We note that, although the judge concludes that Della Cioppa, Gonzalez, and Traynor refused to cross the picket line out of fear for their personal safety, in his discussion of the facts the judge presents evidence that Della Cioppa and Gonzalez were also motivated by business ethics. As we agree with the judge that the employees were protected by Sec. 7 regardless of whether their motive for refusing to cross stranger picket lines was fear, we need not reach this alternative basis for Della Cioppa's and Gonzalez' refusal to cross the picket line.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM F. JACOBS, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on 8 May 1985[1] at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. The charges in Cases 4–CA–14866–1 and 4–CA–14866–2 were filed on 6 February by Thompson Della Cioppa, and John F. Traynor, respectively. The charge in Case 4–CA–14866–3 was filed on 7 February by Manual Gonzalez.[2] The complaint issued 27 March alleging that the above-named individuals were terminated by Respondent Western Stress, Inc. on 4 February because they concertedly refused to work at Respondent's jobsite at the Gulf Oil Corporation's Philadelphia refinery because of adverse working conditions in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Respondent, in its answer and amended answer, denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

The parties were represented at the hearing and afforded full opportunity to be heard and to present evidence and argument. Briefs were filed by both the General Counsel and Respondent.

On the entire record in the case, my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after giving full consideration to the briefs, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

Respondent, a Texas corporation with an office and place of business in Mt. Laurel, New Jersey, is engaged in the service of onsite heat treating of process piping and vessels at various refineries, powerhouses, chemical, and fabrication plants located throughout the United States. During the past year, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, derived gross revenues in excess of $1 million and purchased and received materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of New Jersey. I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Supervisory Issue

As noted above, Respondent does onsite heat treating of process piping and vessels. As of 4 February, the date of the alleged unfair labor practice, it employed eight full-time technicians and four part-time technicians, the latter on an on-call basis, three salespersons, a secretary, an operations manager, and an operations superintendent, all nonunion.

Operations Superintendent Spencer or Operations Manager Toppin assigns Respondent's technicians to their jobs, and the latter report directly to these two members of management. At the jobsite, the technicians do the actual physical labor involved in the heat treatment but may also oversee fellow employees or employees of other employers, union or nonunion, doing the actual physical labor. Whether a particular technician is to be employed as a helper on a project, or is to be a lead technician is determined by Spencer or Toppin. In each case, the designation of lead technician is based on which technician is first on the job, which has the most overall experience, or which has the most experience with regard to a specific type of job. The lead technician, whoever it might be, is responsible for filling out daily time tickets that keep track of the technicians' time, weekly timesheets, and project forms. At one time or another, all three of the alleged discriminatees have worked as helpers and as lead technicians.

Thompson Della Cioppa, a level 2 field technician, has worked for Respondent for 4 years, and at the time of his discharge was earning $9.50 per hour while working in the field, and $7 per hour while working in the shop or on travel. Della Cioppa worked directly under Spencer, the person who hired him, and was assigned as lead technician only when he worked with part-time or casual employees. On these occasions, he received no increase in wages over and above those he earned when he worked as a helper doing only manual labor. Della Cioppa credibly testified that he did not have authority to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, discipline, or interview for employment either Respondent's other employees or employees of other employers.

John Traynor, a level 3 senior technician, has worked for Respondent for 4 years and 9 months and, at the time of his discharge, was earning $11.50 per hour while working in the field and $8 per hour while working in the shop or traveling. On these occasions, when Traynor was assigned the job of lead technician or supervisory technician on a project, he received no additional remuneration over and above his regular wages for performing these duties. Traynor did not interview employees for hire nor did he have authority to hire, fire, transfer, suspend, promote, reward, or discipline Respondent's employees or the employees of other employers working with him on the job.

Manuel Gonzalez, a technician, has worked for Respondent for 6 years and 8 months and, at the time of his discharge, was earning $10.50 per hour for field work and $7 per hour for shop work and travel. Gonzalez credibly testified that he has on occasion served as leadman on some projects but if he arrived on a job after other technicians were already on the job, he would not be assigned as leadman. Similarly, if other technicians on a particular project had more experience than he had, Gonzalez again would not be assigned to the leadman's position. Whether Gonzalez worked as leadman or field technician, he still received the same hourly wage. Gonzalez did not interview employees for hire nor did he have authority to hire, transfer, promote, recall, discharge, lay off,[3] or suspend either Respondent's employees or those of other employers.

[1] All dates are in 1985 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] The motion of counsel for the General Counsel to correct spelling is granted.

[3] Gonzalez credibly testified that on one occasion, on the Eddystone job, he laid off certain union craft workers hired by Respondent but that the decision to do so was not his own. Rather, he merely served as a

Continued

The record reveals that all the 10 full-time technicians have, at one time or another, served as lead technicians; that when so serving, they performed physical labor right alongside other employees; that the type of work performed by the lead technicians was the same as that performed by other technicians except for the filling out of various forms; that the designation of leadman was determined by which employee arrived first on the job or by which one had the most experience in general or in particular in the type of work being performed; and that the leadmen did not receive any remuneration over and above his regular wages.

I conclude from the above that when the technicians, including Della Cioppa, Traynor, and Gonzalez served as leadmen they had none of the authority usually associated with supervision; that the control that they exercised was merely derived from their experience in the type of work involved; and that whatever direction they exercised reflected that of a more experienced employee helping a less experienced one, rather than the authority responsibly to direct, as recognized in connection with the statutory definition of supervisor. Bugle Coat, Apron & Linen, Inc., 132 NLRB 1098 (1961). In short, I find that Della Cioppa, Traynor, and Gonzalez were and are rank-and-file employees, and not supervisors as defined in the Act.

The Discharges

On 30 January, Respondent's Operations Superintendent Spencer assigned employees Della Cioppa and Gonzalez to work on a project at the Gulf refinery, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. They were to perform mechanical physical labor on a compressor located there, and were assigned to work with other Gulf employees under Gulf Oil Supervisor Jerry Hansen. On Wednesday and Thursday, 30 and 31 January, the two employees went to work without incident, entering and exiting refinery gate 51 in one of Respondent's pickup trucks clearly marked with its decal and logo.

On January 31 Hansen advised Gonzalez that the following morning, Friday, 1 February, there might be picketing at gate 51 and suggested that Gonzalez and Della Cioppa report to work the following day in an unmarked vehicle. In accordance with Hansen's instructions, Gonzalez and Della Cioppa drove to work the following day in an unmarked car, entering the facility through gate 24. That day, Hansen told the two employees that the following Monday, 4 July, there would definitely be a strike and that they should report to work on that day, once again in an unmarked car, and enter through gate 24. He added that they would probably finish the job on Monday and, after doing so, should exit through gate 51, the very gate that Gulf assigned to the Union for primary picketing.

On leaving the refinery grounds through gate 51 on Friday, 1 February, Della Cioppa asked the guard if it would be all right for them to use that gate the following Monday. The guard replied that Della Cioppa and Gonzalez should not use gate 51 on Monday because there would be picketing at all gates, and that if they tried to go through the gate, they would be beaten up. When Della Cioppa and Gonzalez arrived back at Mt. Laurel, they advised Spencer and Toppin that if there were a strike on Monday at the refinery they preferred not to cross the picket line. They informed their superiors that they had been told that certain employees of Joule Maintenance Corporation had been beaten up after leaving the refinery through gate 51, and felt that conditions were unsafe. Spencer replied that the strike was not scheduled to start until 7:30 a.m. on Monday, and that Della Cioppa and Gonzalez should report to the project at 7 a.m. driving an unmarked vehicle. He told them to give him a call if there was any problem. Following this discussion, Della Cioppa and Gonzalez went out to the parking lot, where they remained for about 2 hours discussing with other technicians the forthcoming strike, the expected picketing, the possible hazard connected with crossing the picket line, their safety, and what they should do the following Monday. Previous incidents of strike violence directed at Respondent's employees were also discussed. As a result of these considerations, Della Cioppa and Gonzalez decided that they would go to the refinery the following Monday, but if there was a picket line, they would not cross it, both for reasons of safety and business ethics.[4]

Despite Spencer's instructions that they should arrive at the jobsite at 7 a.m., before the picket lines were established, Della Cioppa and Gonzalez reported at 7:30 a.m. because they did not want to arrive before the pickets, enter the gate without obstruction, then later find themselves trapped behind the picket line, subject to possible violence on the way out. They found two or three pickets at gates 24 and 19, and about 40 to 50 more at gate 51. At gate 51, a truck attempting to gain entrance was being surrounded by the crowd of pickets. Someone was taking pictures of the truck and its driver. Della Cioppa and Gonzalez at that point decided that they would not attempt to enter the refinery. They proceeded to drive around the refinery grounds, taking second and third looks at the various gates, but found none of them free of pickets at any time.

Finding no apparent change in the situation after several trips around the block, Gonzalez called Spencer from a telephone booth, told him that there was picketing at every gate, that he felt it was unsafe to cross the picket line, and that he preferred not to do so. Spencer told Gonzalez to call back in a little while. When he did so, Spencer advised him that he had been in contact with Hansen and that Hansen had informed him that he, Hansen, had gotten into the refinery without any problem and that Della Cioppa and Gonzalez should report to gate 24 where Hansen would pick them up. Gonzalez replied that he still felt it would be unsafe and, for this and business reasons, he did not want to cross the picket line. Della Cioppa and Gonzalez then returned to Mt. Laurel.

conduit of orders decided on by his superior. When the testimony of Regional Administration Manager Thomas Dougher conflicts with that of Gonzalez, the latter is credited.

[4] By business ethics Gonzalez meant that he had reservations about going through a picket line manned or supported by people with whom he might eventually have to work again, shoulder to shoulder.

Before Della Cioppa and Gonzalez arrived at the Mt. Laurel office, Toppin asked Traynor if he would be willing to cross the picket line to work at the refinery. Traynor decided that he would not and went into Spencer's office to say so. He told Spencer that he was unwilling to cross the picket line because Respondent did not have enough facts about who was striking and why. Toppin, Spencer, and Traynor then discussed the violence that had occurred involving the Joule employees and agreed that they could not blame Della Cioppa and Gonzalez for refusing to cross the picket line. Traynor asked Toppin to call the Union or go over to the refinery, presumably to get more information, but Toppin refused, stating that it was not the Respondent's problem. Traynor then discussed the situation at the refinery with the other technicians present.

When Della Cioppa and Gonzalez arrived, they engaged some of the other technicians present in conversation. Gonzalez told them what they had seen at the picket lines at the refinery and of the violence that had occurred involving the Joule employees. At that point, Toppin advised Gonzalez that Regional General Manager Paul Napeloni was on the phone and wanted to speak with him. When Gonzalez got on the phone, he told Napeloni that there was picketing at all gates at the refinery, and that he did not feel that it was either safe or good business to go through the picket line. Napeloni replied that Respondent was nonunion, had a commitment to Gulf, and if Gonzalez refused to go into the refinery he would be laid off. He then asked to speak to Toppin. After speaking to Napeloni, Toppin came out and asked Della Cioppa, Gonzalez, and Traynor, each separately, if they would go to work at the refinery. Della Cioppa and Gonzalez both refused. Traynor, having witnessed labor-connected violence in the past, was, like Della Cioppa and Gonzalez, also concerned for his safety. He told Toppin again that he felt that more information was necesssary. Toppin replied, "You know your option." To all he said, "If you don't go over there, that's it, you're done."[5] none of the three went to work at the refinery.

Later that morning, about 11:30, Spencer, along with technician Bill Mason went to the refinery, through the picket line, and did the job begun by Della Cioppa and Gonzalez. They completed the work and left the jobsite about 2 or 2:30 p.m. apparently without incident.

On 19 February Gonzalez visited the Mt. Laurel office of Respondent to pick up layoff slips for himself, Della Cioppa, and Traynor. After obtaining the requested slips, and as he was leaving, he noticed that the boxes on the slips labeled "discharge" and "resignation" were checked, whereas the one marked "layoff" was blank. Gonzalez realized that under these circumstances, he would be unable to collect unemployment. He returned, therefore, to Toppin's office where he asked for an explanation, inasmuch as he had been told on 4 February that he was being laid off, not discharged, if he refused to go to work behind the picket line. Toppin, however, denied that either he or Napeloni had used the term "layoff" during the conversations of 4 February. Gonzalez angrily called Toppin a "liar" and demanded to know if Toppin had given Napeloni the whole story. Toppin replied that he did not want to discuss it further, then proceeded to ignore Gonzalez. Gonzalez lost his temper and backhanded all of Toppin's books and papers off his desk. When Toppin threatened to call the police, Gonzalez left. Contrary to accusations leveled at Gonzalez by Toppin, Gonzalez credibly testified that he did not strike, swing at, or threaten Toppin.[6]

[5] Elsewhere, Gonzalez testified that he was told by Toppin that he was laid off. Compare Tr. 36 and 38. Traynor testified (Tr. 76) that Gonzalez announced as he came out of Spencer's office that he and Della Cioppa had been fired for refusing to cross the picket line. I find that Gonzalez and the others were fired rather than laid off on 4 February.

Conclusion

The 8(a)(1) allegations

Record evidence in the instant case clearly reveals that Della Cioppa, Gonzalez, and Traynor refused to cross the picket lines established at the Gulf refinery because of fear for their personal safety. The record is equally clear that these three employees were terminated because they refused to cross the picket line for the reasons stated. In a recent Board decision,[7] the issue before me was discussed:

> Indeed, we recently held in ABS Co., 269 NLRB No. 138, slip op. at 4 (1984), that the Act protects an employee's refusal to cross a picket line even where the employee's sole reason is a fear of personal bodily injury. We stated, "[T]he focal point of the Board's inquiry is the nature of the activity itself; the employee's motives for engaging in the activity are irrelevant."

I find that the cited cases are controlling, and that by terminating Della Cioppa, Gonzalez, and Traynor because they refused to go through the picket line at the Gulf refinery, Respondent interfered with these employees' Section 7 rights in violation of Section 8(a)(1).[8]

Gonzalez' Postdischarge Conduct

Respondent argues that even if a violation of Section 8(a)(1) is found with regard to the discharges of the three discriminatees, their misconduct precludes the award of any relief. In support of this argument Respondent points to certain discrepancies in the reporting time of Della Cioppa and Gonzalez while employed at [6] Where Toppin's description of events differs from that of Gonzalez, insofar as the events of 19 February are concerned, I credit Gonzalez.

[7] Business Services By Manpower, 272 NLRB 827 at fn. 8.

[8] Respondent argues that the three dischargees lost the protection of Sec. 7 because the picket line they refused to cross was unlawful. The record is devoid of any evidence to support this contention. The consent decree dated 19 February contains a nonadmission clause and is not evidentiary as to what the situation was on 4 February at the refinery. Moreover, the dischargees were told to exit through gate 51, a legal primary picket site where 40–50 pickets were located and where those pickets were told by Gulf to picket.

Respondent argues further that the discharge of the three employees was necessitated by business considerations. However, the record indicates that the work that the three dischargees refused to perform was, in fact, performed by Spencer and Mason within 1 or 2 hours of the discharges, and was completed in a couple of hours. Thus, there was no business consideration behind the discharges. Browning-Ferris Industries, 259 NLRB 60 (1981), revd. 700 F.2d 385; Business Services, supra.

the Gulf refining job, a matter discovered after their discharge. With regard to these discrepancies and the minutes of worktime involved, I find that Della Cioppa and Gonzalez did not engage in such serious misconduct so as to forfeit the Section 7 protection accorded employees who participate in lawful activities. Arrow Industries, 245 NLRB 1376 (1979). Moreover, there is no evidence that Respondent would have terminated these employees on the basis of such misconduct absent their participation in protected concerted activities. Arrow Industries, supra.

Respondent's reliance on the events of 19 February as a basis for denying Gonzalez' reinstatement, I find to be inadequate in light of my earlier finding that Gonzalez neither threatened, swung at, nor struck Toppin. Though Gonzalez did, in fact, call Toppin a liar and did admittedly sweep Toppin's desk clear of Toppin's papers and books, an action certainly not condoned, it must be remembered that the confrontation was the direct result of Respondent's unlawful termination of Gonzalez and consequent denial to him of wages desparately needed. In my opinion, to deny Gonzalez his Section 7 rights and reinstatement because he showed visible signs of anger over the treatment he suffered would be unconscionable. Since no one was physically injured and there was no apparent damage to property as a result of the altercation, I shall recommend that Gonzalez not be denied reinstatement on the basis of the quarrel that took place on 19 February. Hagerty Catering Co., 236 NLRB 1553 (1978).

III. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth in section II, above, occurring in connection with the operations of the Respondent described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes, burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent unlawfully terminated Thompson Della Cioppa, John Traynor, and Manuel Gonzalez I shall recommend that Respondent offer them immediate reinstatement to their former positions or, if such jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without loss of seniority or other rights and privileges, discharging, if necessary, any replacements, and make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of their unlawful terminations, by payment to them of sums of money equal to the amounts that they normally would have earned from the date of their termination to the date on which a bona fide offer of reinstatement is made, with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[9]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is, and at all times material has been, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By discharging Thompson Della Cioppa, John Traynor, and Manuel Gonzalez because they engaged in concerted activities for the mutual aid or protection guaranteed to employees by the Act, the Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[10]

ORDER

The Respondent, Western Stress, Inc. Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and Mt. Laurel, Maryland, its officers, agents, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Interfering with the rights of employees to engage in protected concerted activity by discharging employees for refusing to cross a lawful picket line.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer to Thompson Della Cioppa, John Traynor, and Manuel Gonzalez immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges dismissing, if necessary, any replacements and make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered, in the manner set forth in the remedy section.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Remove from their files any references to the discharges of Thompson Della Cioppa, John Traynor, and Manuel Gonzalez on or about 4 February 1985, and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of these unlawful discharges will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

(d) Post at its Philadelphia facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of the

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT interfere with the rights of employees to engage in protected concerted activity by discharging them for refusing to cross a lawful picket line.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed to them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer to Thompson Della Cioppa, John Traynor, and Manuel Gonzalez full reinstatement to their former positions or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered.

WE WILL remove from our files any references to the discharges of Thompson Della Cioppa, John Traynor, and Manuel Gonzalez on 4 February 1985 and WE WILL notify them that this has been done and that evidence of these unlawful discharges will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

All our employees are free to engage in concerted activities for their mutual aid and protection within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act or to refrain from such activities.

McLean County Roofing and Accurate Roofing and United Union of Roofers, Waterproofers, and Allied Workers, Local No. 69, AFL–CIO. Cases 33–CA–6083 and 33–CA–6198

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND JOHANSEN

On December 27, 1983, Administrative Law Judge James M. Fitzpatrick issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with the Decision and Order.

The Respondent, McLean County Roofing, is a sole proprietorship of David Riddle engaged in the business of roofing construction. In May 1977, the Respondent entered into the first of three successive 1-year collective-bargaining agreements with Roofers Local 130 covering all the Respondent's roofing employees. Throughout the term of the three agreements the Respondent deducted union dues and permit fees from a majority of its employees and made regular monthly contributions on their behalf to Local 130's pension fund. There is no evidence that Local 130 became the exclusive representative of the Respondent's employees through a Board-conducted election or by voluntary recognition based on a claim and clear showing of majority support among the Respondent's employees in an appropriate unit.

On January 1, 1980,[1] Local 130 merged with its sister local, Local 69 (the Union). Local 69 survived the merger and assumed responsibility for administrating the remaining 4 months of the Local 130 contract and for negotiating a successor agreement. On April 22 the Union, the Respondent, and representatives of other area roofing contractors who had been signatories to Local 130 contracts met to negotiate a successor agreement.[2] The parties used the existing Local 130 contract as a basis for negotiations but adjourned this meeting without reaching an agreement.

Riddle attended and represented the Respondent's interests at the April 22 meeting but did not attend the next negotiation session that took place on April 29. Following expiration of the contract on April 30, the parties met a third and final time on May 8 when agreement on a new contract apparently was reached. At this last session as at the first, Riddle did not specifically state that he agreed or disagreed with the contract proposals exchanged and agreed to by the Union and the spokesman for the contractors, although he did state he would not sign anything that would interfere with his making a living.

At the conclusion of the last negotiating session, the Union made arrangements to have the contract typed and mailed or hand delivered to the contractors. Joe Keen, former business representative of Local 130, delivered two copies to Riddle about June 1 and instructed Riddle to sign one and return it to the Union. Riddle told Keen that he "wouldn't sign it but I would try to live by some of it, whatever I could, but I couldn't live by the whole thing because it would break me." As noted by the judge, Riddle was disturbed by the contract's wage provisions that called for periodic raises over the next 2-1/2 years. Accordingly, he told Keen that he would probably sign if it was a 1-year contract.

The contract delivered by Keen, though otherwise complete, did not contain terms specifying its duration. Article 19 of the document was entitled "Duration of Agreement," but nowhere in that provision is a termination date either expressly stated or a procedure set out that provides for termination following notice given by one of the parties.

Union Business Agent Charles Ford visited Riddle in late June or early July to pick up a signed contract. Riddle claimed that he handed Ford an unsigned copy of the contract although Ford testified that the copy had Riddle's signature on it. No copy of the contract was produced at trial. The judge found the evidence insufficient to establish that Riddle had signed the contract.

Notwithstanding Riddle's refusal to sign the contract, the judge found that the Respondent became a contracting party because it substantially adopted and implemented the agreement. Having determined that the Respondent employed a permanent and stable work force during the relevant period, the majority of whom financially supported the Union with their dues, the judge concluded that the status of Local 69 as the representative of the Respondent's employees was, in effect, converted and governed by Section 9(a) of the Act rather than Section 8(f), and that Local 69 was entitled to recognition as the representative of the roofing crew on that basis.[3] Accordingly, he determined that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) when it withdrew recognition from the Union in October 1982. We disagree.

[2] The Respondent participated in negotiations as a separate entity and not as a member of a multiemployer bargaining group.

In our recent decision in John Deklewa & Sons, 282 NLRB 1375 (1987), we rejected the "conversion doctrine" relied on by the judge and adopted instead the principle that a union signatory to an 8(f) agreement acquires immediate but limited 9(a) status and may enforce the agreement under Section 8(a)(5). Specifically "the obligations we impose on an 8(f) employer through our application of Section 8(a)(5) to 8(f) agreements are limited to prohibiting the unilateral repudiation of the agreement until it expires or until that employer's unit employees vote to reject or change their representative." Deklewa, 282 NLRB supra at 1387. Furthermore, "[t]he enforceable Section 9(a) status we confer on signatory unions is also only coextensive with the bargaining agreement which is the source of its exclusive representational authority. Beyond the operative term of the contract, the signatory union acquires no other rights and privileges of a 9(a) exclusive representative." Id. at 1387.

Implicit in these new governing principles is the fundamental requirement that the parties to an 8(f) relationship reach a meeting of the minds on all material terms and voluntarily enter into an agreement. As noted earlier, the collective-bargaining agreement is the sole source of the union's exclusive representational authority in the 8(f) context.[4] Absent an agreement, an 8(f) union has no limited 9(a) status. Here, the record does not support a finding that the parties entered into an agreement.

The Respondent's owner, David Riddle, never consented to be bound by an agreement and when the written contract was presented to him by the Union for signature he refused to sign it. He told the union business agent that he would live by some, but not all, of the agreement and he expressly stated that his reason for refusing to sign was the contract's lack of a 1-year durational term and its call for escalating wages at periodic intervals over 2-1/2 years.

The absence of a termination provision in the contract is further evidence that the parties did not have an agreement. The Board has refused to find a violation of Section 8(a)(5) when a contract, though otherwise complete, did not contain terms specifying its duration and the parties have reached no understanding with respect to that issue. Springfield Electric Service Co., 285 NLRB 1305 (1987). Finding that the contract in that case was incomplete in an important respect, the Board effectively determined that it could not supply the omission and found the respondent did not unlawfully refuse to execute the contract.[5] In the case at bar, the contract presented to Riddle by the union business agent contained no termination date, despite the fact that all three contracts with Local 130 previously signed by Riddle explicitly provided for set terms of 1 year. The parties clearly failed to agree on a termination date. Indeed, Riddle told the Union that if it were a 1-year contract he would probably sign it on the spot.

The Respondent's statement that it would not sign the contract because "it couldn't live by the whole thing," the omission of a termination date, and the failure to sign the contract show that the parties never entered into a collective-bargaining agreement. That the Respondent substantially followed most of the provisions of the agreement[6] is not a substitute for a voluntary agreement on all material terms which is binding on the parties. The absence of such an agreement is particularly critical here, in an 8(f) relationship, when the Union's access to the provisions of Section 8(a)(5) can only be secured from, and is limited to, the duration of a valid 8(f) agreement. We, therefore, find that the

[3] The "conversion doctrine" provided that a collective-bargaining agreement/relationship governed by Sec. 8(f) could become an agreement/relationship governed by Sec. 9(a) on a showing by the Union that it enjoyed majority support among an appropriate unit of the signatory employer's employees. Under this doctrine, 9(a) status could be attained in the absence of a Board certification or a prior demand for recognition based on the clear showing of majority support.

[4] As we emphasized in Deklewa, we do not mean to suggest that a union involved in the construction industry could not achieve 9(a) exclusive representative status by the traditional means of voluntary recognition based on a clear showing of majority support among the unit employees, e.g., a valid card majority. Deklewa, supra, 282 NLRB at 1387 fn. 53. We have also held that in light of the legislative history and the traditional prevailing practice in the construction industry, we will require the party asserting the existence of a 9(a) relationship to prove it. Id. at 1385 fn. 41. Here, as noted earlier, there is no evidence that the Union attained 9(a) status either through a Board-conducted election or through voluntary recognition based on a prior claim and clear showing of majority support among the employees in an appropriate unit.

[5] See also Roman Iron Works, 282 NLRB 725 (1987) (a contract arises only after a meeting of the minds on all material terms); Interprint Co., 273 NLRB 1863, 1865 (1985) (no meeting of the minds because, inter alia, the agreement lacked commencement and termination dates).

In the instant case, the judge noted the absence of a termination date and determined that the agreement was a contract with no fixed duration. However, the cases cited by the judge do not hold that contracts of no fixed duration are enforceable agreements. Instead, the cases cited by the judge concern questions of contract bar and do not reach the issue of whether there was a meeting of the minds on all material terms. Thus, in Pacific Coast Assn. of Pulp & Paper Mfrs., 121 NLRB 990 (1958), the Board held that contracts having no fixed duration will not be considered a bar to a representation petition. Without addressing the issue of whether such contracts were otherwise valid agreements, the Board concluded that it would unjustifiably abridge the statutory right of employees to seek representatives if the contract-bar policy were extended to parties who did not enter into "mutual and binding commitments thereby reasonably insuring that for the duration of the agreement neither party will disrupt the bargaining relationship by unilaterally attempting to force changes in the conditions of employment upon the other." Id. at 994.

[6] The judge found that in certain respects the Respondent did not abide by the agreement.

Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by withdrawing recognition from the Union in October 1982 or in any other respect as alleged by the General Counsel herein.[7]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

MEMBER JOHANSEN, dissenting in part.

I agree with the majority in all respects save one—the decision to overrule the judge's unexcepted-to finding that it was unlawful for the Respondent to tell employees "that it was a nonunion company and they was [sic] union. I said I would have to get some different help because you guys want to be union members." The majority converts this ultimatum to employees to choose between union membership and jobs into an innocuous statement that they must work under nonunion conditions and finds the ultimatum, in its new guise, is not unlawful.

I do not agree. The reasonable tendency of an employer's statement that it has to get "new help" because its employees "want to be union members" is to induce employees into forswearing allegiance to the union. That is unlawful, and I would find it so.

[7] In light of our determination that the Respondent had no bargaining obligation with the Union, we find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's findings that Accurate Roofing, a nonunion company, was the alter ego of the Respondent and that Accurate and the Respondent are a single employer.

The judge found an 8(a)(1) violation based on testimony of Dennis Casey, a half owner of Accurate, concerning remarks he made to three roofers who had worked for McLean and who inquired about working on some jobs for Accurate. We reverse. The statements quoted by our dissenting colleague, when read in context, did not reasonably convey the message that these employees would have to surrender their union membership if they worked for Accurate. It merely suggests that he thought that union members would not want to work for the nonunion scale that Accurate paid. The employees indicated that if no union work was available, they were willing to work on lower-paying nonunion jobs, because they did not "really go by the union all the time anyway." Hence they were offered the jobs. Because, as we have found, there was no recognitional obligation on the part of McLean that could have been imposed on Accurate, Casey was simply giving a lawful and correct report of the nonunion status of Accurate's jobs. For these reasons, Mueller Insulation Co., 263 NLRB 757, 760 (1982), relied on by the judge, is distinguishable. In Mueller, an employer that was currently bound to a union agreement told its employees that they must surrender their union representation and work for its new nonunion company or lose their jobs. There was no such forced choice here.

We note that, although no specific exception was taken to the 8(a)(1) finding, the Respondent did except to the judge's finding on which this violation was based, i.e., that the Respondent had a bargaining obligation with the Union.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES M. FITZPATRICK, Administrative Law Judge. In this case a unionized roofing contractor set up a parallel nonunion or "double-breasted" enterprise. The ultimate question here is whether this ploy involved unfair labor practices. I find it did. Further questions are whether he could, at a later point, without consulting the Union, raise the take-home pay of employees by paying them instead of the Union the union dues and contributions to the union health and welfare fund because many employees indicated disaffection with the Union and then refuse to recognize the Union further on the claim that it no longer represented a majority of employees. I find he cannot do this because he acted in an atmosphere of continuing unfair labor practices.

These proceedings arise from unfair labor practice charges filed July 27, 1982, and amended October 1, 1982, in Case 33–CA–6083 and filed October 7, 1982, and amended November 4, 1982, in Case 33–CA–6198 by United Union of Roofers, Waterproofers, and Allied Workers Local No. 69, AFL–CIO (Local 69) against McLean County Roofing and Accurate Roofing (Respondents). A complaint based on the charges in Case 33–CA–6083 issued September 3, 1982, and was amended October 1, 1982, and another complaint based on the charges in Case 33–CA–6198 issued November 5, 1982, and was amended on January 11 and 13, 1983, both complaints alleging that Respondent had engaged in unfair labor practices proscribed by Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Respondents answered each complaint and the admendments, denying commission of any unfair labor practices. On November 5, 1982, the two proceedings were consolidated.

Although the pleadings appear to raise an issue as to Board jurisdiction, there is no such issue, the parties having stipulated facts sufficient to establish jurisdiction. Other issues raised by the pleadings are whether McLean and Accurate are a single employer or one the alter ego of the other; whether McLean recognized Local 69 and its predecessor and maintained contracts with them covering McLean employees; whether the roofing employees of McLean and Accurate together constitute an appropriate bargaining unit; whether Local 69 represents a majority of roofing employees of McLean and Accurate in that bargaining unit; whether Respondents unilaterally and unlawfully changed the pay and conditions of employment of employees working for Accurate and later for those working for McLean, refused to supply Local 69 with relevant information for bargaining, solicited employees to abandon Local 69, informed employees they would have to be nonunion in order to work for McLean; and whether McLean unlawfully withdrew recognition of Local 69. As affirmative defenses Respondents assert (1) that objective evidence indicates a majority of the employees of both McLean and Accurate do not desire Local 69 to represent them and (2) that the collective-bargaining agreement contains illegal union-security clauses. The consolidated cases were heard before me at Peoria, Illinois, on January 6, 7, 11, and 12, 1983.

Based on the entire record, including my observation of the witnesses and consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Respondents, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

McLean is a sole proprietorship of David A. Riddle (Riddle). Accurate is a partnership of Riddle and Dennis Casey. Both McLean and Accurate are engaged at Bloomington, Illinois, in the roofing construction business. During the 12 months preceding issuance of the complaints, a period representative of its operations, McLean purchased and received at Bloomington, Illinois, products and materials valued over $50,000, which came directly from points outside Illinois or from suppliers within Illinois who had purchased them directly from sources outside Illinois. In addition, during the same period McLean performed work valued over $50,000 for commerical customers within Illinois which were engaged in commerce within the standards applied by the National Labor Relations Board (the Board). McLean is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The evidence respecting Accurate, considered as a separate enterprise, is insufficient to satisfy Board jurisdictional standards. However, as found hereinafter, McLean and Accurate are a single employer, one is the alter ego of the other, and the employees of both together constitute a unit appropriate for collective bargaining. Accurate is therefore subject to Board jurisdiction.

II. THE UNIONS

Local 69 historically has represented employees performing roofing, waterproofing, and similar types of work in the construction industry in Peoria, Illinois, and the surrounding area. Prior to January 1, 1990, its sister local, United Slate, Tile and Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Worker's Association, Local Union No. 130, AFL–CIO (Local 130), represented employees similarly engaged in and around Bloomington, Illinois. On January 1, 1980, Local 130 merged into Local 69, Local 69 surviving the merger and subsequently representing roofing employees in the entire area previously served by both Locals. Local 130 then ceased to exist as a separate organization. At all times material to these proceedings Local 69 has been, and prior to January 1, 1980, Local 130 also was, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background of McLean County Roofing Co.

McLean was established by Riddle as a roofing enterprise in early 1977. He has been its sole owner and chief operating officer. In May 1977 on behalf of McLean he entered into the first of three successive, annual, collective-bargaining agreements with Local 130, covering all the full-time and regular part-time journeymen roofers, helpers, and apprentices employed at McLean's Bloomington, Illinois facilities. I find this to be an accurate description of a unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

1. The status of Local 130

Respondents contend that the majority status of Local 130 during its incumbency has not been established. No Board election nor certification has determined the status of Local 130 as the representative of those employees. The parties agree that during the terms of the three Local 130 collective-bargaining agreements McLean deducted union dues and permit fees for a majority of its roofing employees and forwarded those deductions to Local 130. McLean also made regular contributions to the union pension fund for a majority of its roofing employees.[1] These circumstances tend to show the majority status of Local 130 and I find they are sufficient to demonstrate that status. Haberman Construction Co., 236 NLRB 79, 84 (1978), enfd. 618 F.2d 288 (5th Cir. 1980), modified 641 F.2d 351 (5th Cir. 1981).

2. The incumbency of Local 69

With the merger of Local 130 into Local 69 on January 1, 1980, Local 69 took over the administration of the outstanding Local 130 collective-bargaining agreements. Each of the contracting employers, including McLean, was informed of the merger and assured that the provisions of the Local 130 agreement would remain unchanged through the balance of its terms, which ran until April 30, 1980, at which time a successor collective-bargaining agreement would be negotiated by Local 69. McLean continued to adhere to the Local 130 agreement throughout its term.

a. Negotiation of the Local 69 contract

On April 22, 1980, prior to the expiration of the Local 130 agreement, representatives of Local 69 met with officials from three roofing enterprises in the Bloomington area respecting a successor agreement. Acme Roofing was represented at the meeting by William Nafziger, Union Roofing by Ted and Stan Hoselton, McLean by David Riddle, and Local 69 by its Business Representative Charles Ford. Ford proposed a new agreement which would raise wage rates in the Bloomington area to parity with the higher rates in effect in the Peoria area. The proposed increases engendered strenuous opposition from the employer side, particularly from Stan Hoselton, and the meeting ended without agreement being reached. Riddle participated by his presence and, as did the others, going over item by item an old contract being used as the basis for negotiations, but he said little during the session. He did not overtly express agreement nor, apparently, disagreement with the proposals. It is unclear precisely how the meeting ended. Riddle testified he was the first to leave, and there is no evidence about what went on after that other than the undisputed fact that no agreement was reached. A second session, held April 28, was not attended by Riddle although he had notice of it.

[1] Local 130 apparently had no health and welfare fund.

That meeting also ended with no agreement between Local 69 and the Bloomington contractors.

While Ford was negotiating with the Bloomington contractors, he was carrying on parallel negotiations with the Peoria contractors. As the April 30 contract expiration deadline approached without agreement being realized for either area, Ford agreed with the Peoria contractors to extend their existing agreement 10 days beyond expiration to accommodate further negotiations. He also contacted Ted Hoselton of Union Roofing in Bloomington to inquire whether the Bloomington contractors would similarly agree to an extension of their old agreement. On the evening of April 30, Hoselton informed Ford the Bloomington contractors would not agree to an extension. At midnight that agreement expired. For the next 2 days Local 69 picketed the Bloomington contractors, including McLean. On or about May 2, Ford and Earl Kruse, an International vice president of the United Union of Roofers, Waterproofers and Allied Workers, AFL–CIO, the two Hoseltons and Nafziger, attended a meeting in Bloomington unrelated to these contract negotiations. However, following that meeting they engaged in some unscheduled, informal, negotiating in the course of which the Hoseltons and Nafziger informally agreed with Ford on a wage and benefit increase package which could eventually result in wage parity between Bloomington and Peoria.

The final formal negotiating session for Bloomington took place May 8 and was attended by Nafziger, the two Hoseltons and Riddle on the employer side, and by Ford, Joe Keen, previously business representative of Local 130, and members of the Local 69 negotiating committee on the union side. The union proposal was to phase in wage increases over a 3-year period, as had been discussed at the earlier informal meeting on May 2. Other matters such as health and welfare and fringe benefits were also discussed. On the employer side Ted Hoselton did most of the talking. According to Ford, he was the spokesman for all the contractors. Riddle voiced his concern, stating he would not sign anything that would interfere with his making a living, but he had little else to say. He did not specifically say he agreed, nor did he specifically say he disagreed. Both Ford and Keen received the impression that all the contractors, including Riddle, agreed. A consensus was reached between the Union and Ted Hoselton, the de facto spokesman for the employers. Although Riddle was the first to leave. I find, based on the credited testimony of Keen, that agreement was reached before Riddle left. There is no evidence of any negotiations after he left, and although Riddle testified that discussions were still going on when he left, it is obvious he was not present to observe whether they continued. The testimony of Ford indicates negotiations did not continue. The testimony of Keen, who impressed me as a reliable witness, indicates that agreement was reached while Riddle was still present. Accordingly, I do not credit Riddle's contradictory testimony that he had not knowledge of any agreement.

Subsequent to the conclusion of negotiations, Ford drafted the test of the new agreement and arranged with one of the contracting companies for typing. Because of difficulties in the typing, 3 to 4 weeks passed before copies finally were available for distribution at the end of May or the first part of June. The opening language of the agreement states it is made and entered into as of May 1, 1980. From this, as well as the substantive terms of the agreement, it is clear that it went into effect as of that date. The duration of the agreement, however, is open to question. No date for termination is stated in the agreement nor do its terms provide a procedure for termination. Article XIX is entitled "Duration of Agreement," but the text of that article deals only with the undertaking of signatory employers who are not members of the Greater Peoria Area Roofing Contractors Association to be bound by any amendments, extensions, or changes in the contract agreed to between that association and the Union, and to be bound by all subsequent contracts between the association and the Union unless the individual employer notifies the Union of its revocation of this authorization 90 days "prior to the expiration of this or any subsequent agreement," which expiration date appears nowhere in the document. Although the agreement contains no expiration date, various of its substantive terms became effective at definite times subsequent to the commencement date of May 1, 1980. Thus, article III provides that in the Bloomington-Pontiac area makeup days will remain the same until May 1, 1981; Sunday and holiday work will be at double rate and other overtime at time and a half until January 1, 1983; and loading time will remain unchanged until May 1983. Article V with respect to wages in the Bloomington area provides a rate effective May 1, 1980, and thereafter periodic increases on September 1, 1980; November 1, 1980; May 1, 1981; September 1, 1981; May 1, 1982; and September 1, 1982, on which last date the Bloomington area wage scale would reach parity with that in effect in the Peoria area. In article X, extra compensation is provided to employees working on jobs outside the city of employment, including reimbursement for, "food-first year–$13, second year–$14, third year–$15." Article XXVI, entitled "Union Dues and Building Trades Dues Checkoff," requires that effective May 1, 1982, the employees' wages be increased by an additional 4 cents per hour which is to be checked off and remitted to the West Central Illinois Building and Construction Trades Council. Although it is possible from these provisions to determine that the agreement remained effective through certain times, it is not possible to determine with certainty when it expires. Accordingly, I find that the agreement is not one with a fixed term but rather is a contract of indefinite duration without stated provisions for termination. See Pacific Coast Assn. of Pulp & Paper Mfrs., 121 NLRB 990, 993 (1958); William-McWilliams Industries, 130 NLRB 223 (1961).

Joe Keen delivered two copies of this final document to Riddle on or about June 1. Riddle indicated to him that he could probably live with the first year's wage provisions and that if it were a 1-year contract he would probably sign it on the spot. He apparently was disturbed by the periodically escalating wage package. He told Keen that although he would not sign it, he would try to live by whatever part he could; that he could not live by the whole thing because it would break him. Although Keen testified he had no discussion with Riddle on that occasion, I think his memory failed him. Riddle was very detailed in his report of the conversation and his testimonial version is consistent with his prehearing affidavit as revealed in his examination during the hearing.

According to Riddle, he never signed either copy of the agreement that Keen delivered to him. Instead he directed his secretary to put them in a file where, according to him, they remained until the following September when, so he volunteered, he had them removed and sent to his attorney. If he is to be believed in this, both documents would have been available at the time of this hearing. No one actually privy to this last transmittal of the documents testified they were sent or received, nor did counsel represent he had received them. Neither document was offered in evidence although they might have supported Riddle's testimony. Because such evidence was within the control of McLean at the time of the hearing and no explanation was offered for its nonproduction, I infer that the evidence, if produced, would have been unfavorable to Respondents. Pacific Grinding Wheel Co., 220 NLRB 1389, 1390 fn. 2 (1975), enfd. 572 F.2d 1343, 1348 (9th Cir. 1978); Auto Workers v. NLRB, 459 F.2d 1329 (D.C. Cir. 1972). Considering the evidence in the record, particularly the testimony of Glenn Smith noted below, Riddle could not reasonably believe there was no need to produce the documents he indicated were within his control. Cf. NLRB v. Chester Valley, Inc., 652 F.2d 263, 271 (2d Cir. 1981).

Ford testified that at the end of June or the first part of July, he and Glenn Smith called on Riddle for the purpose of picking up a signed copy of the contract. Smith is the business representative of a small glazers union in Bloomington who customarily accompanies Ford in jointly calling on contractors in that area. He testified, and I find, that on that occasion Ford told Riddle they had come to pick up the contract, that Riddle handed him some papers that Ford put in his briefcase. Smith testified this was the Local 69 contract because he saw the front page, but that he did not see whether it was signed. Ford's testimony is consistent with Smith's but Ford added that when he was handed the contract he looked at it and that it was signed by Riddle. I do not rely on Ford's unsupported testimony that he verified that the contract was signed because his vacillating testimony generally, as well as his demeanor, indicates such reliance is not warranted. Ford testified further that after receiving the document from Riddle, he placed it in the files of Local 69 and that it has since disappeared. He speculates that it and the contract of another employer were lost in the course of moving the Local's offices. At any rate, neither Local 69 nor the General Counsel produced in evidence a collective-bargaining agreement signed by Riddle. Riddle denied he signed the agreement. Based on the credited testimony of Smith and considering that none of the parites produced either of the documents delivered to Riddle by Keen nor one signed by Riddle, I find that about the first of July Riddle handed to Ford one of the documents that Keen had earlier delivered to him. Whether Riddle signed the agreement, an issue on which the General Counsel has the burden of proof, I find the evidence insufficient to establish that fact. In so concluding I have considered that Keen delivered two copies of the agreement to Riddle, neither of which McLean has offered in evidence, that Riddle delivered one copy to Ford in the presence of Smith, that there is no reliable evidence this copy was signed, and that the General Counsel and Local 69 failed to produce a signed copy of the agreement or persuasive evidence that it was signed. But even if Riddle did not sign the document, McLean was a contracting party to the agreement because, as found below, Riddle admitted as much to Ford and Glenn Smith in early June 1982 when Ford objected to the nonunion working conditions of the Accurate crew, and he substantially applied the agreement to the McLean crew from its inception in early June 1980 through September 1982.

b. McLean's adherence to the Local 69 contract

The parties are in dispute regarding whether McLean adopted the Local 69 agreement. I find the agreement was sufficiently implemented so that McLean must legally be considered a contracting party. From the effective date of the agreement in May 1980, McLean, following past practice, deducted union dues and permit fees from the pay of a majority of its employees in the roofing unit described above and continued doing so through September 1982. And beginning at least in January 1981, and possibly sooner, until the end of September 1982, it contributed to the union roofers pension fund and the health and welfare fund for a majority of those employees. During the period May 1980 until May 1982, McLean paid all roofing employees at a rate at least as high as the scale provided in the agreement and also paid time and a half for Saturday work and double time for Sunday and holiday work. From September 1980 through September 1982, pursuant to the agreement, it provided Local 69 with a contractor's wage and welfare fund surety bond assuring payment of the agreed wages, deductions, and contributions. On at least one occasion in 1980, Riddle and Local 69 adjusted a grievance involving employee Terry Segbianao, as provided in the contract. Ford testified that in 1982 he and Riddle adjusted another grievance on behalf of employee Clyde Decker, but I do not credit his tesitmony in view of the contradictory testimony of both Riddle and Dennis Casey. As business representative of Local 69, Ford visited McLean's premises from time to time and on some of those occasions delivered receipts for union payments made by McLean on behalf of employees. Ford testified without contradiction, and I find, that he also appointed Danny Casey, a brother of Dennis Casey, to be the Local 69 steward for all contracting employers, including McLean, in McLean and Livingston Counties. Local 69 has had no designated steward among the employees of each company as contemplated in the collective-bargaining agreement.

Respondents contend that in certain respects McLean did not follow the agreement. One item to which Respondents point is McLean's practice respecting pay for overtime work. However, after reviewing the testimony and the provisions of the agreement, particularly articles III and XXII, it does not appear that McLean deviated from the contract in this respect except that in practice time-and-a-half overtime pay for Saturday work was paid only if the employee already had worked 40 hours during that week. McLean also deviated from the agreement in that its regular weekly payday was Thursday instead of Friday, as provided in the agreement, and also with respect to contributions to the West Central Illinois Building and Construction Trades Council, which it apparently did not make. The collective-bargaining agreement also contemplates an apprentices' program and employment of a fixed ratio of apprentices or helpers to journeymen roofers. These provisions were neither complied with by McLean nor enforced by the Union because of a shortage of journeymen. Along the same line Respondents emphasize various ways in which Ford failed to administer the agreement in an effective manner. None of his inadequacies, however, go to the heart of the question of whether a collective-bargaining relationship and an understanding existed. There is nothing in the record indicating that Ford administered the new Local 69 agreement any differently than the old Local 130 agreement. The logical inference is that both he and the employers, including McLean, carried on the collective-bargaining relationship as they had in the past by means of a collective-bargaining agreement.

Considering those aspects of the agreement that McLean honored, as well as those that were ignored, I find that it substantially adopted the agreement and became a contracting party. Haberman Construction Co., supra, 236 NLRB at 85–86. The testimony of Riddle, which is largely self-serving, and to which Respondent's brief points as indicating that his adherence to the agreement was motivated by a variety of considerations other than a desire to abide by the agreement, is immaterial. Even if credited, such testimony goes to his motivation, which is not at issue if, as I find, he applied the terms of the agreement. The objective evidence demonstrates substantial adherence to, and therefore adoption of, the collective-bargaining agreement. This finding is buttressed by Riddle's participation in the negotiations that lead to the most recent contract and further by the fact that when Ford and Smith came to his office to pick up the signed contract, Riddle, without comment, handed a copy of the document of Ford.

3. Union-security considerations

As an affirmative defense, Respondent's urge that the Local 69 collective-bargaining agreement should be set aside because it embodies unlawful union-security provisions not separable from the balance of the agreement. The agreement provides for various deductions to be made from the wages of employees and remitted to the local or other union-affiliated organizations and does not provide any waiting period following the start of an employee's employment before such deductions commence. Respondents point particularly to articles XI and XVI of the agreement as failing to satisfy the 30-day statutory waiting period of Section 8(a)(3), or the 7-day waiting period of Section 8(f), of the Act. Counsel for the General Counsel takes the position, with which I agree, that the agreement does not contain union-security provisions. I find no clause in the agreement that specifically conditions employment on membership in Local 69. Accordingly, I find the provisions of the agreement to which Respondents refer are not the sort of union-security provisions addressed by either Section 8(a)(3) or Section 8(f) of the Act. The pertinent portions of the contractual articles in question read as follows:

> ARTICLE XI > TOOLS
> . . . .
> Contractors desiring to perform work in the Craft over which jurisdiction is claimed by Roofers Local #69 agree to employ on said work where more than one Employee is required at least fifty percent of Employees of Roofers Local #69.

Jefferson, Peoria, Illinois 61603; together with a list of names and total hours worked of each employe from whom deductions were made. Article XX is a somewhat parallel provision dealing with health and welfare and pension fund contributions. It provides for the contracting employer to make periodic contributions on behalf of employees in the unit to the National Roofing Industry Pension Fund and to the Indiana State Council of Roofers' Health and Welfare of Illinois, Indiana, and Kentucky. Like articles XI and XVI, article XX provides no waiting period following the hiring of an employee before the commencement of such contributions.

Article XI, quoted above, could be read as requiring half of the employer's new employees to be union members immediately on their employment, and if read in that manner it would violate the Act. The language, however, is not entirely clear and could be understood as a jurisdictional requirement that when the employer hires roofers, at least half come from Local 69. There is no requirement that any employees who are or become members must remain members of Local 69. There appears to be a practice in the roofing industry of employees represented by one local union working within the territorial jurisdiction of other locals. Article XVII of the agreement involved here, which article is entitled "Work Performed in Jurisdiction of Any Other Local Union," provides for rates of pay and travel expenses when employees covered by the Local 69 agreement work outside the territorial jurisdiction of Local 69.

Article XVI is less ambiguous. The first two clauses require the employer to increase the employees' basic rate of pay by the amount to be deducted and remitted to the West Central Illinois Building and Construction Trades Council. Arguably, these provisions have no effect on the employees' real wages. The third clause requires the employer to deduct from the employees' wages initiation fees and dues but the provision appears to be limited in application to those employees who are members of Local 69. And, as noted above, there is no requirement that an employee be or remain a member of Local 69 as a condition of employment with the employer. Even if, pursuant to article XXI, one-half of the work force is made up of Local 69 members, union membership by any particular employee is not required. Nothing in the language requires that any employee become or remain a member of the Union.

Article XX is merely an agreement whereby the employer pays to a health and welfare fund and to a pension fund contributions on behalf of each employee. Union membership is not a stated condition of coverage.

Although analysis of the ambiguous clauses leaves some doubt as to legality, they are not explicitly in violation of the Act but rather are ambiguous and should not thereby be found illegal. In Paragon Products Corp., 134 NLRB 662, 664 (1961), the Board pointedly quoted the Supreme Court's language in NLRB v. News Syndicate Co., 365 U.S. 695 (1961), as follows: "we will not assume that unions and employers will violate a federal law . . . against a clear command of this Act of Congress. As stated by the Court of Appeals 'In the absence of provisions calling explicitly for illegal conduct, the contract cannot be held illegal because it failed affirmatively to disclaim all illegal objectives.' [Emphasis added.]" Where contract language is ambiguous, the Board looks to the intent of the parties when they draw up the contract and to their practice in operating under the contract. See Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp., 98 NLRB 753 (1952); Bath Iron Works Corp., 101 NLRB 849 (1952). Here there is no evidence of the parties' intent in this regard at the time the contract was drawn up. The record does reflect that in practice Riddle checked off union dues and permit fees from the outset of the employment of many, but not all, employees, and there is no evidence that these deductions were required from the employees in contravention of the statute, that is, as a condition of their employment. In sum, I find that because the contract has no provisions explicitly calling for unlawful union-security arrangements, and the record fails to demonstrate that the ambiguous contractual provisions in fact have operated to violate Section 8(a)(3) or 8(f) of the Act, I find the Respondents have not sustained their affirmative defense on this issue.

4. The McLean work force

The parties disagree about whether McLean employed a permanent and stable work force. The evidence relating to this consists for the most part of McLean payroll records for 1982, its health and welfare contribution records from Janaury 1981 through September 1982, and its pension contribution records from December 1980 through October 1982. These are not entirely satisfactory because the health and welfare and the pension records do not necessarily reflect the precise size of the work force, and the payroll records do not include 1981 and those for 1982 which are in evidence are incomplete.[8] Nevertheless, payroll and contribution records together give a valid month-by-month picture of the 1982 roofing crew and a fair approximation of crew makeup in 1981.

Over the course of a year, and considering employee turnover and fluctuation in crew size, the total number of roofers employed was modest. During 1981 McLean paid union fringe benefits for only 26 individuals. Company records show employment of 30 roofers during 1982. Certain seasonal fluctuations are apparent, employment being lowest in winter. Thus, fringe contributions were made for four, five, and seven roofers in December 1980 and January and February 1981, respectively, and for three in December 1981. The records show seven, nine, and five roofers in January, February, and March 1982, respectively. By contrast, fringe contributions were made for 17 in June 1981, the highest month that year. A nonseasonably induced increase developed in late August 1982 when McLean obtained two large contracts and the crew increased from 6 to 10, then to 16 in September and October, and then dropped to 12 in November and revocable for successive periods of one year unless revoked by written notice to you and the Union ten (10) days prior to the expiration of each one year period, or of each applicable bargaining agreement between the Employer and the Union, whichever occurs sooner.

to 10 in December. Monthly employment of roofers averaged at least 9 in 1981 and about 10 in 1982. During 1982 total employment by month numbered 7 in January, 9 in February, 5 in March, 12 in April, 8 in May and June, 6 in July, 10 in August, 16 in September and October, 12 in November, and 10 in December. Thus, through July, and with the exception of April, the monthly total remained fairly constant. In late August it began to increase and remained larger for the balance of the year.

Despite fluctuation in crew size, a core of the same roofers was employed with substantial regularity on successive jobs. Until he became a supervisor in May 1982, Dennis Casey was a regular crewmember as well as crew foreman and thereafter, as a supervisor, he continued as crew foreman. Tom Howell was a regular throughout 1981 and 1982 and ultimately became crew foreman. Tim Hardin was a regular through all 1981 and until October 1982. Ed Seth was a regular from April through September 1981 and for much of 1982. Robert Godbey was a regular through September 1981. Steven Stalter was a regular for most of the year from May 1981 through April 1982. In 1982 Greg Riddle worked regularly from June through October, and again in December. Michael Riddle worked in each month from May through December 1982.[4] Dale McCumsey worked regularly for 4 months in mid-1982. Richard Black Sr., Ed Casey, David Graves, Wesley Jeakins, and Bobby Sylvester all worked regularly from late August through December 1982, the last month for which evidence was offered. The record reveals a pattern of a partially evolving but regular core of 4 to 5 roofers throughout 1981 and until late August 1982 when the core enlarged to about 8 or 10 for the balance of the year. Thus, the crew, although experiencing some evolution, was also characterized by substantial continuity in identity of persons employed.

It is clear from the record as a whole that employees in the bargaining unit did not work, nor were they paid, unless there was work to do. The work available for the most part consisted of onsite roofing work, an aspect of the construction industry. Many of these projects are relatively small. Some are repair and maintenance jobs rather than new construction or replacement. The testimony and McLean's records indicate that, although the roofers are employed on an as-needed basis, that need frequently carriers over from job to job. Roofers are hired on an indefinite basis for as long as work remains available. These circumstances demonstrate permanence and stability in the work force, as those terms are understood by the Board and the courts. See Precision Striping, 245 NLRB 169 (1979); Land Equipment, 248 NLRB 685 fn. 2 (1980), enfd. 649 F.2d 868 (9th Cir. 1989); Hageman Underground Construction, 253 NLRB 60 (1980); Pacific Erectors, 256 NLRB 421 (1981), enfd. 718 F.2d 1459 (9th Cir. 1983); Redland Construction Co., 265 NLRB 586 (1982). On somewhat similar facts the Board reached the opposite conclusion in Giordano Construction Co., 256 NLRB 47 (1981). But the circumstances in that case differ in that that employer's jobs were few in number, of long duration, and with substantial hiatuses between. A substantial number of those employees did not carry over from job to job as do the crewmembers of McLean where the jobs typically are smaller and of shorter duration and the hiatuses between these jobs appear shorter. McLean has a greater measure of continuity in its work force than Giordano because of its core crew, the relatively small total number of employees over a year's time, and the absence of long hiatuses in the workflow. A result opposite to that reached in Precision Striping also was reached by the Ninth Circuit in Construction Erectors v. NLRB, 661 F.2d 801, 804 (1981), in which a larger number of employees was involved, a total of 62 having been referred for work over about a year's period, and where the record did not indicate continuity of personnel beyond the first 6 or 7 weeks of the year under consideration. Although the issue in the present matter is not free from doubt, particularly in view of McLean's reliance on new hires during seasonal upswings in business and the big increase in the latter part of 1982, its situation appears more akin to Precision Striping and its progeny than to Giordano or Construction Erectors. Accordingly, I find that McLean employs a permanent and stable work force within the meaning of Board standards.

5. Union majority status

During the life of Local 130 contracts, as noted above, McLean deducted union dues and permit fees for a majority of its employees covered by those contracts and remitted those funds to Local 130 and later to Local 69. McLean continued this practice under the Local 69 agreement from the beginning of May 1980 until the end of September 1982. McLean's records show that during 1982 these deductions were made in January for 4 of its 7 roofers, in February for 6 of it 9 roofers, in March for 4 of its 5 roofers, in April for 11 of its 12 roofers, in May for 7 of its 8 roofers, in June for 6 of its 8 roofers, in July for 4 of its 6 roofers, in August for 8 of its 10 roofers, and in September for 12 of its 16 roofers. In October it had 16 roofers but only deducted dues and permit fees for 2. In November it had 12 roofers and in December 10 but deducted no union dues or permit fees for any in either month. It is apparent from this history that for an unbroken period of about 5-1/2 years Local 130 and its successor Local 69 enjoyed the financial support of a majority of McLean employees. Haberman Construction Co., 236 NLRB (1978), enfd. 518 F.2d 288 (5th Cir. 1980), modified 641 F.2d 351 (5th Cir. 1981); VM Construction Co., 241 NLRB 584 (1979); Land Equipment, supra; Trowel Trades Employees v. E. DeAngelis & Son, 562 F.Supp. 847, 849 (D.C.S.D.Fla. 1983). In these circumstances, the status of Local 69 as the representative of McLean employees was governed by Section 9(a) of the Act, rather than by Section 8(f) as urged by Respondents, and it was entitled to recognition as the representative of the roofing crew on that basis. Haberman Construction, supra; VM Construction, supra.

[4] Greg and Michael Riddle, being sons of the company owner, were not employees under the Act but their presence on the crew demonstrates the continuity of the work force.

B. The Relationship of Accurate to McLean

About April 1, 1982, David Riddle and Dennis Casey, foreman of the McLean work crew, formed the partnership called Accurate Roofing Company for the purpose of engaging in the roofing business on a nonunion basis. Although requested by Local 69, Accurate has refused to recognize it as the representative of its employees and has not adhered to the terms of the Local 69 collective-bargaining agreement for roofers in the Bloomington area.

All capital for Accurate has been provided by Riddle. He initially contributed $2000 and by the time of the hearing had loaned an additional $12,000 although the partnership agreement provides that additional capital will be provided equally by the partners. The partnership agreement names Riddle as general manager with responsibility for all machinery, equipment, leased facilities, any other leasing, purchasing or procuring, and all bookkeeping and gives him responsibility for the partnership bank accounts, including the writing of checks. Dennis Casey is named assistant general manager and operating manager in charge of roofing activities and the supervision of employees.

McLean's offices and warehouse are in a building owned by Riddle, the only sign on the building read "McLean County Roofing." Accurate's rented office is in the same building but in a separate room. Its warehouse is located across the street in premises rented by it from a third party.

McLean employs two office secretaries. Accurate employs one. The two companies share a telephone system in which two separate lines, one for each company, come into the same telephone with extensions in each office. This allows any of the secretaries to answer the telephone for either company. Accurate's telephone also has an extension in Dennis Casey's home where his wife normally answers for Accurate in the absence from the office of Accurate's secretary. Whether the office secretaries work jointly in any other respect does not affirmatively appear in the record, but in testifying, Riddle named the same person as his own secretary and the secretary for Accurate. The two companies have different mailing addresses, McLean using a post office box and Accurate a rural route address. Riddle is the only person authorized to sign checks for both firms but a secretary for McLean also is authorized to write McLean checks and the Accurate secretary also is authorized to write Accurate checks.

McLean maintains an inventory of roofing supplies and materials for its own use and for sale to Accurate. Accurate purchases most of its supplies from McLean and maintains only a small inventory for its own use. Accurate does not own any equipment. It uses a truck owned by Dennis Casey personally and any additional equipment needed for roofing jobs is leased from McLean. Both companies engaged in the same type of business, namely, commercial and residential roofing. They differ in that McLean does a greater volume of business and the jobs for which Accurate contracts are generally smaller. Up to the time of the hearing they had not served the same customers.

Respecting control of labor relations, the record as a whole shows that Riddle has the ultimate control for McLean and also executes most of those responsibilities. He is the one who historically negotiated and contracted with the Unions. He does almost all the notifying of roofing employees regarding when they are to report for work and he apparently hires all new employees for McLean. In performance of the work on the job, on the other hand, Dennis Casey in general directs the employees. I find he can effectively recommend the hiring, firing, or disciplining of McLean employees. I infer that at the end of a day's work he indicates to crewmembers whether they are to report the next workday. I further find that on occasion he contacts roofers to come into work for McLean. Casey does not about the same thing for Accurate as he does for McLean. He testified he does all the hiring for Accurate. But this really appears to be an assigning of McLean crewmembers to Accurate jobs when they have been informed in most instances to come into work by Riddle, or Casey knows they will be available because a McLean job is coming to an end and he has them available for work on Accurate jobs. Casey's testimony in this respect suggests that the infrequent and smaller Accurate jobs are meshed in schedule wise with the larger and more frequent McLean jobs. That conclusion fits with the relative size and importance of the two operations, with Casey's function as the job supervisor for both, and with the repeated use of regular McLean crewmen on Accurate jobs.

Riddle testified he never calls employees into work for Accurate and has nothing whatever to do with those employees. I do not credit these categorical statements. Other credible testimony, notably that of Dale McCumsey, demonstrates that Riddle involves himself in Accurate employee relations. Thus, McCumsey, a regular employee of McLean, was invariably called by Riddle to report for work. The work he performed included jobs for McLean as well as seven jobs for Accurate. On one occasion McCumsey spent time on an Accurate job working for estimator Ted Tice, who did the estimating for both Accurate and McLean, but at Riddle's request McCumsey was paid by McLean as if he worked for McLean. In fact the roofers who work for Accurate are the regular McLean crew. The testimony, the payroll, and other records indicate that virtually all roofers used by Accurate are also used by McLean on a regular basis. Thus, during 1982 Accurate employed a total of nine roofers, all of whom at one time or another were members of the McLean crew. The hours each worked for McLean and Accurate from May through October are as follows:

[1] Crow previously worked for McLean in March and April 1982.

Except for the one instance with the estimator, referred to by McCumsey, the roofers have been paid for the work performed for McLean by a McLean check and for work performed for Accurate by an Accurate check. Their rates of pay, however, differ in that until at least the end of September 1982 work for McLean was paid at the Local 69 wage rate or better, and contributions for union fringe benefits were paid for a majority of the crew. By contrast, work for Accurate was paid for at a lesser rate and no contributions were made for fringe benefits.

As already noted, Accurate leased all roofing equipment from McLean with the exception of the personal truck of Dennis Casey. As a result, the roofers work on Accurate jobs with the same equipment as when they work on McLean jobs. On some occasions McLean trucks were used on Accurate jobs although the name "McLean Roofing" appeared on the side. On at least one occasion a magnetic sign with the name Accurate was placed over the McLean name. In two other regards there is commonality in employment with McLean and Accurate. At the premises of McLean and of Accurate, roofers use the same break area and same washroom irrespective of which company they are working for. Finally, there appeared to be no difference in the work they perform for either company, each roofer, whether journeyman apprentice, or helper, performing the same kind of work under the same supervision.

C. The Single Employer and Alter Ego Issues

1. Single employer

The General Counsel and Local 69 contend that McLean and Accurate are a single employer for purposes of collective bargaining. The standards for determining whether two enterprises are a single employer were described by the Supreme Court in Radio Union Local 1264 v. NLRB, 380 U.S. 255 (1965), in the following language:

> The controlling criteria, set out and elaborated in Board decisions, are interrelation of operations, common management, centralized control of labor relations and common ownership.

In the present matter the operations of McLean and Accurate are interrelated. Although McLean is a larger operation than Accurate, neither is a large business and little separates top management from the rank and file in either company. Both are engaged in the same kind of business, in the same market, and from approximately the same location, their separate offices being in the same building owned by McLean and their separate yards being across the street from each other. They have separate telephone service but common equipment and it is possible for the office personnel of one company to answer the telephone of the other.

McLean, solely owned by Riddle, is managed almost entirely by him with the assistance of a couple of office employees, an estimator, and Dennis Casey as his supervisor of field operations. Riddle's overall management of McLean includes financial control and control of labor relations. Dennis Casey also is involved in labor relations in directing the McLean crew, and on some occasions in calling crewmembers to work, or in informing them whether they will continue to work, be laid off, or be recalled. With Accurate, Riddle is more remotely involved in day-to-day management than Dennis Casey, who as a partner carries a greater managerial responsibility than he does with McLean where he is only a supervisor. Even so, Riddle is significantly involved in the management of Accurate. Under the partnership agreement he has complete financial control and has provided all the working capital. Although under the agreement Dennis Casey is in charge of operations and presumably of labor relations, Riddle also has involved himself in crew selection by contacting crewmembers to work on Accurate jobs. Both men joined in the partnership with the intention that it be nonunion, thus together setting this underlying labor relations policy. Interrelation of the operations, centralized control of labor relations, and common management are also indicated in the interchange of crewmembers between the two companies and the fact that virtually all roofers working for Accurate also work for McLean. Significant points of interrelation are the facts that Dennis Casey manages field operations for both concerns and that McLean provides most of the supplies and, with the exception of Casey's own truck all the equipment for both, although Accurate pays for the supplies and rental of the equipement. It is these supplies and equipment with which the crews of both McLean and Accurate work. Both companies also use the same estimator.

Although Dennis Casey has no proprietary interest in McLean, common ownership exists in the person of Riddle as the sole owner of McLean and one-half-ownership interest in Accurate and also involve him in the management of Accurate.

In these circumstances I find McLean and Accurate are a single employer. The facts demonstrate the "presence of a very substantial qualitative degree of centralized control labor relations," and "evidence a substantial qualitative degree of interrelation of operations and common management—one that . . . would not be found in the arm's length relationship existing among unintegrated companies." Operating Engineers Local 627 v. NLRB, 518 F.2d 1040, 1046–1047 (D.C. Cir. 1975). See also NLRB v. Campbell-Harris Electric, 719 F.2d 292 (8th Cir. 1983).

2. Alter ego

The General Counsel contends further that Accurate was created to subvert the collective-bargaining relationship with Local 69 and is legally the alter ego of McLean. Although alter ego questions more frequently arise in situations where one enterprise succeeds another (see Crawford Door Sales Co., 226 NLRB 1144 (1976)), the issue may also arise with parallel contemporaneous enterprises as in the present case (see Don Burgess Construction Corp., 227 NLRB 765 (1977)). In resolving alter ego issues the Board applies single employer criteria and further examines whether one enterprise operates to circumvent and evade collective-bargaining obligations of the other. The Fifth Circuit states this additional consideration in Carpenters Local 1846 v. Pratt-Farnsworth, 690 F.2d 489, 508 (5th Cir. 1982):

> However, the focus of the alter ego doctrine, unlike that of the single employer doctrine, is on the existence of a disguised continuance or an attempt to avoid the obligations of a collective-bargaining agreement through a sham transaction or technical change in operations. E.g., Amalgamated Meat Cutters v. NLRB, 663 F.2d 223, 227 (D.C. Cir. 1980).

In the present matter McLean and Accurate are sufficiently interrelated so that an arm's length relationship does not exist between them. Rather, there is substantial unity of operation inseparable from the persons of Riddle and Casey, with one set of employees performing the same type of work on a regular basis for two employers which, as their employers, are virtually indistinguishable from each other. The crewmembers have the same community of interest respecting their employment whether working on a McLean or an Accurate job. In these circumstances, for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act, the crew of both companies together constitute an appropriate collective-bargaining unit described as follows:

> All full-time and regular part-time journeymen roofers, helpers, and apprentices employed by McLean County Roofing or Accurate Roofing Company at their Bloomington, Illinois, facilities and their various jobsites; but excluding professional employees, office clericals, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees.

When Accurate began business in May 1982 using six McLean roofers, no effort was made by management to contact Local 69 respecting its operation and the provisions of the Local 69 contract were not applied about the work the crewmen did for Accurate. It was late May before Business Representative Ford learned of the existence of Accurate when Danny Casey, the Local 69 steward for the Bloomington area, told him Riddle had opened a nonunion operation. About the same time Accurate ran a newspaper advertisement in the McLean County newspaper announcing its business. In early June, Ford accompanied by Glenn Smith called on Riddle at his office in McLean Roofing for the purpose of discussing this new operation. Riddle told Ford then that Accurate was his nonunion company. Ford informed him his actions were in violation of the agreement with Local 69. But Riddle took the position that his attorneys had helped him plan the new operation and everything was legal. He declared that Accurate would not abide by the terms of the Local 69 agreement. According to Smith, whom I credit, Ford said he was going to have to do something about it, and Riddle responded that if Ford felt that way, maybe he should just tear up his existing contract with the Local and go nonunion with both shops. Following this meeting, Ford took a wait-and-see attitude, instructing Steward Danny Casey to keep an eye on things.

In late July roofers Dale McCumsey and Ed Seth, who had been working for both McLean and Accurate, complained to Ford about being paid less than the union wage rate for straight time and not being paid time and a half for Saturdays or double time for Sundays, as provided in the collective-bargaining agreement. As a result of these complaints Local 69's attorney, Patricia Benassi, sent Riddle a letter on July 27 setting forth the Union's position that the collective-bargaining agreement applied to Accurate operations and that its employees should be paid in accordance with those terms. She requested bargaining with Local 69 regarding the matter. That same day Local 69 filed the initial unfair labor practice charges here against McLean and Accurate.

Considering the close relationship that makes McLean and Accurate a single employer, evidenced particularly by their use of the same roofing employees working on the same equipment and supplies under the same supervision by Dennis Casey, and the shared responsibility for work assignments in the two operations by Riddle and Casey, I find that crewmembers were performing bargaining unit work when working for either Accurate or McLean. Considering also that Accurate began operations during the week ending May 12, 1982, with the employment of Tim Hardin and Tom Howell under nonunion conditions and without consulting Local 69, as well as Riddle's declaration to Ford and Smith in early June that Accurate was his nonunion operation, and his prophetic threat, in the face of Ford's objections, that McLean might go nonunion as well, I find that Riddle and Casey shifted bargaining unit work to Accurate with the purpose of avoiding the Local 69 contract terms, which were applicable to such work if performed by McLean employees. Thus, for labor relations purposes Accurate is the alter ego of McLean. The shifting of unit work to evade contractual and bargaining obligations violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Edward J. White, Inc., 237 NLRB 1020, 1026 (1978); see also Denzil S. Alkire, 259 NLRB 1323 (1982); Land Equipment, 248 NLRB 685, 688 (1980); Al Bryant, Inc., 260 NLRB 128, 141 (1982); Nabco Corp., 266 NLRB 687 (1983); American Pacific Concrete Pipe Co., 262 NLRB 1223, 1226 (1982); All Kind Quilting, 266 NLRB 1186 fn. 4 (1983); cf. Shellmaker, 265 NLRB 749 (1982); Longshoremen ILA (Rukert Terminals), 266 NLRB 846 (1983).

D. Nonunion Terms as a Condition of Employment with Accurate

It is admitted that sometime in April or May 1982, Dennis Casey informed the crewmembers who would be working on Accurate jobs that they would have to be nonunion to work for Accurate Roofing. That statement, given the circumstances found above, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Mueller Insulation Co., 263 NLRB 757, 759–760, 766 (1982).

E. McLean's Withdrawal of Recognition

1. The nature of the withdrawal

Local 69's Business Representative Ford, in the first few days of October 1982, called on Riddle to talk about union relations with McLean. Riddle refused to discuss such matters without first obtaining permission from his attorney. Ford then spoke with an attorney for Riddle named Semmler who told him that as long as the Union's unfair labor practice charges were pending with the Board, Riddle would not talk with union representatives.[6] As a result, Ford consulted Union Attorney Patricia Benassi who on October 7 telephoned Respondents' attorney Reed Roesler. She inquired of Roesler about the identity of Semmler, who was unknown to her. Roesler informed her that although Semmler was an attorney for Riddle, Roesler's firm was handling labor relations. Benassi further inquired whether the information Ford had received from Semmler was the position of McLean, and Roesler confirmed that that was McLean's position, and that Mclean was withdrawing recognition from Local 69 and would not bargain with it. Thus, McLean also withdrew from and abrogated its contract with Local 69. Roesler stated the Union no longer represented a majority of the employees. This was the first occasion on which Respondents asserted the Union lacked majority status among the employees. Such a defense must be evaluated as of October 7, 1982, the time of withdrawal of recognition based on that assertion. Bartenders Assn., 213 NLRB 651 (1974). Since then McLean has persisted in that position. At no time has Accurate recognized or bargained with Local 69 nor has it retreated from Riddle's initial position taken months earlier that Local 69 enjoys no status as a representative of Accurate employees.

[6] At that point the charges and the complaint were outstanding in Case 33-CA-6083.

McLean implemented its withdrawal of recognition retroactive by ceasing to remit to the Union or to union funds, effective October 1, 1982, those deductions of union dues, permit fees, health and welfare funds contributions, and pension fund contributions which until then it had routinely made. A number of employees from whose paychecks union dues or permit fees deductions had been made after October 1, and for whom health and welfare contributions had been noted on company books, which deductions and contributions were not remitted to the Union, or to union funds, subseqenetly received checks from McLean for these amounts. Thereafter these deductions and contributions were not made but instead were included in the regular paychecks of employees, thus raising their wages. This was, of course, at variance with the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement that contemplated that these amounts be remitted to the Union or union funds. The Union had no specific notice or opportunity to bargain about these changes.

The General Counsel and the Union contend that McLean's withdrawal of recognition and cessation of bargaining with Local 69, the cessation of payroll deductions and fund contributions, and the resultant inclusion of those amounts in the weekly paychecks of employees were unfair labor practices prohibited by Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Respondents contend that unfair labor practices were not involved because, based on objective considerations, Riddle had a good-faith doubt that Local 69 represented a majority of McLean employees and McLean had no further duty to recognize Local 69. This is a possible defense because the collective-bargaining agreement, being of indefinite duration, would not bar a competing union from filing a representation petition with the Board thereby raising a question concerning representation. Pacific Coast Assn. of Pulp & Paper Mfrs., 121 NLRB 990, 993 (1958). Thus, there is no extant contract term during which the Board will conclusively presume that the majority status of Local 69 continues unimpaired. In this respect this case differs from those where the employer could not unlawfully withdraw recognition of a union so long as a valid election petition could not be timely filed. See Quad C Corp., 246 NLRB 463, 467 (1979); Shamrock Dairy, 119 NLRB 998, 1002 (1957), and 124 NLRB 494 (1959), enfd. 280 F.2d 665 (D.C. Cir. 1960), cert. denied 364 U.S. 892 (1960); Hexton Furniture Co., 111 NLRB 342, 344 (1955). The present situation is more analogus to those cases where an employer, before expiration of a contract term, makes an "anticipatory withdrawal of recognition" in relation to a future contract. Such a withdrawal is lawful if on the date of withdrawal the union in fact has lost its majority status or a reasonable doubt, based on objective considerations, exists as to its majority status, and provided the withdrawal is untained by unfair labor pratices. The presumption of continued majority status is thus rebuttable. See Abbey Medical/Abbey Rents, 264 NLRB 969 (1982); Cutten Supermarket, 220 NLRB 507 (1975); Terrell Machine Co., 173 NLRB 1480 (1969). Accordingly, the crucial issues here are (a) whether the withdrawal of recognition was founded on a reasonable doubt of Local 69's majority status in the light of objective considerations, and (b) whether the withdrawal was tainted by unfair labor practices.

2. Objective considerations about majority status of Local 69

Richard Black Sr. went to work for McLean as a roofer during the weekly pay period ending Thursday, August 26, 1982. When he received his first paycheck and realized that health and welfare contributions and union permit fees had been deducted from his wages, he complained to both Dennis Casey and Riddle. According to Black, he told Riddle, "Dave, I don't want to belong to this union . . . . I'm not paying $100 a week out of my check for some idiot to run around in a Cadillac when I drive a Vega . . . . I don't want to belong to the union. I'm not planning on retiring in Illinois and I'm too damn old to stay here for 10 or 15 years to get retirement from the union; and to me, it's no benefits . . . ." After his second paycheck on September 9 the deductions were discontinued, no payments were made to the Union for Black Sr., and the difference was reflected in his subsequent paychecks. This change was unilateral with no notice to Local 69 or opportunity for it to bargain regarding it.

Riddle testified that in September and early October he had comments from a number of crewmembers indicating their objections to the union deductions from their paychecks. He reacted by informing them he wanted their position in writing and for that purpose he made available to them Xeroxed copies of the form of card supplied to McLean by Local 69 for authorizing union deductions and contributions. Thus, on October 1, 1982, in the room at McLean's facility used by the crew, Riddle handed Black Sr. one of these cards, saying to him, "Here, do you want to join the union or not. It's up to you to write on here whether you do or not." Black wrote on the card, "I don't want to join the union." He signed the card, dated it, and handed it back to Riddle. About 2 weeks later, October 15, after withdrawal of recognition from the Union, he received an unsolicited raise in pay.

Richard Malcome began working for McLean in the week ending September 9, 1982, and continued until October 8, the second payday in October. Deductions were made from his pay to cover union permit fees and health and welfare contributions even though at the time Riddle hired him, and on occasion thereafter during his employment, he indicated his preference that such deductions not be made. His testimony indicates that his reason for this preference was that in the past he had been in and out of a number of unions, had had an unsatisfactory experience with the Laborers Union, that he was not a roofer by trade and expected his employment with McLean to be temporary, that he did not think it likely he would attain journeyman status in the roofers' trade, and that in the circumstances he did not think Local 69 would benefit him. When he was hired he told Riddle he was not a strong unionman. He first objected to the deductions when he received his first paycheck on September 9. On October 7 he went into McLean's office and asked for one of the form cards for authorizing union deductions. He signed it, noted on the card, "No, I do not want dues withheld," and returned the card to the office secretary. However, Malcome's last day of work for McLean was October 6 and he did not work thereafter although the pay period did not end until October 8. It appears from his testimony that he signed the card in order to receive a partial refund of deductions already made because he considered himself a temporary employee and not a regular roofer. Riddle testified that Malcome had indicated to him that he was concerned, saying that he had never been a unionman and wanted to know whether Riddle would let him work if he did not authorize union withholdings from his check. This does not square with Malcome's testimony that he had been in and out of the Laborers Union several times as well as other unions. I credit the account of Malcome who was the less interested witness.

David N. Riddle is Riddle's nephew and normally works for his own father who operates a small nonunion roofing firm. In September 1982, however, they had no work and he came to work for his uncle at McLean during the week ending September 16. He stayed less than 6 weeks. On September 15, a day or two after he began working, his uncle gave him a Xeroxed copy of a blank card for authorizing dues and other union deductions, and told him he could fill it out either to be a union member, or not to be in the Union, that it would not affect his employment with McLean in either case; and to fill it out however he wanted and in his own words if he did not want to be in the Union. According to the nephew, he did just that, writing on the card, "I don't want to be in the Union." He then returned the card to his uncle.

Although David Riddle, the nephew, was not asked if he made any oral statement to his uncle indicating his preference, his uncle testified that the nephew expressed himself verbally on the matter in the latter part of September in the presence of Dennis Casey, Ed Casey, and possibly several other crewmembers. None of these other persons were asked, or testified about statements by the nephew, but his uncle quoted him as saying, "I don't want nothing to do with the Union or Charlie Ford because I've already had some dealings. My dad threw him off the roof once." I credit this uncontradicted testimony. This statement apparently occurred subsequent to the card signing. It seems to me that his nephew's nonunion disposition must have been known to David Riddle, the uncle, before he hired him, and further that he must have realized his nephew would only temporarily be with McLean, as proved to be the case, because the nephew's permanent employment was with his father. Throughout his employment with McLean, the Company made no union deductions from his pay, remitted nothing to the Union on his behalf, and increased his paycheck accordingly. This was done without notice to Local 69 or opportunity for it to bargain on the matter.

John Glasscock became a roofer with McLean in the week ending September 23, 1982. The record indicates he was already working on September 17 and, according to his uncontradicted testimony, he had told Riddle prior to then that he did not want to be in the Union and Riddle should not hold anything out of his paycheck. On September 17, Riddle called him into the office after work, handed him a Xeroxed copy of the form for authorizing union deductions, saying as he did so that he wanted to know whether Glasscock wanted to join the Union. Glasscock signed the card, dated it September 17, 1982, and wrote on it the following, "Don't want held out," and returned the card to Riddle. Beginning with his first paycheck on September 23 no union deductions were made, nor any sums remitted to the Union on his behalf, nor was any notice or opportunity given to Local 69 to bargain about it.

Richard Dailey went to work for McLean in the week ending September 16, 1982. No deductions for health and welfare and union permit fees or dues were made from his paycheck for that week but they were from his check at the end of the second week on September 23. He then, according to Riddle, asked, "If I don't permit you to hold out permit money, can I work?" Riddle replied he could. Dailey then told him, "Well, then, don't hold it out." Company records show that starting October 1 neither permit fees nor health and welfare contributions were deducted from Dailey's paychecks. No payments were made to the Union on his behalf, nor was any notice or opportunity given to Local 69 to bargain on the matter.

Wesley Jeakins started working for McLean in the week ending August 26, 1982, and union permit fees and contributions for health and welfare were deducted from his first four paychecks. Chris Akins began working during the week ending September 16, but no union deductions were made from his paychecks. Sometime in September at a time when Akins and Jeakins were in the office together, Riddle either informed Akins that union dues would be withheld from his paycheck or inquired of him whether he authorized such withholding. Jeakins then interjected, "Hey, man, you don't want nothing to do with no union. Especially that one," or words to that effect, and Akins responded, "Yeah, that's right." Respondents contend that it was obvious to Riddle that neither employee wished to be associated with the Union. The last withholding of union deductions from Jeakins' paychecks was made with the pay period ending September 16 and did not thereafter resume. Union deductions for Akins never commenced. No sums were paid to the Union on Akins' behalf, nor on Jeakins' behalf after September 16, nor was Local 69 given notice or opportunity to bargain respecting these matters.

Robert Sylvester joined the McLean crew in the week ending August 26, 1982, becoming a permanent member of the crew. Union dues and health and welfare contributions were deducted from his pay from the beginning of his employment through the pay period ending October 8. According to Riddle, he had heard during September and early October comments by a number of employees indicating objection to the union deductions. He recalled Sylvester saying he did not want a penny of his money going to the Union. As already noted, Riddle made available to crewmembers the union form for authorizing deductions. He handed some to individuals employees and also placed a supply in what is referred to as the crew shack where the roofers congregate before and after work. On October 7 in the crew shack Riddle told Sylvester to read one of these cards, fill it out, and sign it if he wanted to. Sylvester dated and signed the card entered thereon, "I do not wish to be part of Roofers Local 69." He then delivered the card to Riddle. Thereafter he received a refund of the union deductions already made for the first 2 weeks of October.

Ed Casey, one of several brothers of Dennis Casey, also started working for McLean in the pay period ending August 26, 1982. Deductions for the union permit fees and health and welfare contributions were made from his paycheck for that period and for subsequent pay periods through October 8. Sometime in late September or early October, during a period when McLean was engaged on a roofing job for Eagle's Grocery Store, a site rumored to be the target for a Local 69 picket line, according to Dennis Casey, he told the crew one morning as they started for the job, "Boys, there's supposed to be a picket on the job this morning. If any of you guys want to be union members, you had better not go." Apparently on the same occasion Riddle made a similar statement to the crew. Nevertheless, they all got in the truck indicating they wanted to work and were not worried about the Union. Ed Casey testified that on this occasion he declared in no uncertain terms his dislike for the Union as well as for Danny Casey, another of his brothers who was the Local 69 steward. Subsequently, on October 7 Riddle handed Ed Casey the form for authorization of union deductions, telling him he should indicate on it whether he wanted deductions made. Ed Casey signed the card, dated it October 7, 1982, and added the words, "No, I do not." He subsequently requested, and received, a refund of union deductions previously made from his pay for the periods ending October 1 and 8.

David Graves also went to work for McLean during the week ending August 26, 1982, at a time when he had been laid off from other employment. He was a longtime member of other unions, being a member of the Rubber Workers for 4 years and the Railroad Carmen for 7 years, but had become disenchanted with them because of layoffs from other jobs. He had worked for McLean 3 years earlier and permit fees and health and welfare contributions automatically had been deducted from his pay at that time. When he went to work for McLean in August 1982, the same thing occurred and the deductions continued through the week ending October 8.

According to Riddle, on the morning referred to above when it was expected there might be a Local 69 picket line at the Eagle's supermarket job, Graves was the first to indicate his willingness to work under those conditions when he ran to the truck saying that he had belonged to two or three unions that had not done him any good and he did not suppose this one would either. Although Graves denied generally he ever told Riddle how he felt about the Union, he did not specifically contradict the detailed description of the incident as given by Riddle and I credit Riddle's account.

In early October Riddle handed Graves a Xeroxed copy of the form for authorizing union deductions, instructing him to read it and fill out what he thoought, if he wanted to have the money deducted or not. Graves asked him whether his election would affect his job and Riddle replied it would not. Graves read the card, dated it, signed it, and wrote on the card, "I don't want any dues taken out of my check." He then laid the card on the office desk. The date entered on the card, which is the only evidence respecting the date Graves executed it, is October 8, 1982, the day after Respondent withdrew recognition from Local 69. Graves' testimony generally, and specifically respecting his reasons for executing the card as he did, indicates that he was in need of money because of his layoff from other employment and that was the reason he did not want the deduction of permit fees to continue. His testimony also indicates, as does the card he executed, that he believed his election to discontinue deductions applied only to the permit fees and not to health and welfare contributions, which he believed were still continuing at the time of the hearing. Company records, on the other hand, indicate that deductions for both health and welfare and permit fees made for the first 2 weeks in October were refunded to him and that after October 8 no further deductions in either category were made. Whether Graves was accurate or inaccurate respecting what contributions were discontinued, his testimony and the legend he wrote on the dues-deduction form indicate that his intent was to continue the health and welfare deductions and to discontinue the permit fees, thus continuing to benefit from Local 69's representation but not paying for such in the form of permit fees. This does not indicate a desire to end representation by Local 69. See Randle-Eastern Ambulance Service, 230 NLRB 542, 552 (1977). In any case, his intentions, in executing the card, are irrelevant on the question of good-faith doubt because the card was executed after withdrawal of recognition from Local 69. Objective evidence to support a good-faith doubt of majority support for a union, in order to be considered, must be known to the employer at the time of its withdrawal of recognition. Orion Corp v. NLRB, 515 F.2d 81 (7th Cir. 1975); B & B Gallo Pest Control Services, 265 NLRB 535 (1982).

Richard Black Jr., son of Richard Black Sr., started with McLean in the week ending September 23, 1982. The Blacks reside in Iowa, but when working for McLean, temporarily reside in a motel in Bloomington, Illinois. On October 1, the younger Black, a helper, left work in midafternoon and went to their motel. At the end of the workday his father came to the motel, handed him one of the Xeroxed forms for authorizing union deductions, and asked him whether he wanted to join the Union. The son dated and signed the card, writing on it, "I don't want to join the union." He returned the form to his father who later delivered it to Riddle. This appears to be the only indication the son made respecting his attitude toward the Union. Health and welfare contributions were deducted from his first paycheck on September 23 but not thereafter and instead, beginning with his paycheck on October 1, were included in his paychecks. Local 69 had no notice or opportunity to bargain regarding this matter.

From the above it is apparent that as early as August 26, 1982, when the elder Black expressed himself, Riddle became aware of some lack of employee support for Local 69. This was followed by the unsolicited observation of Malcome when he was hired in early September that he was not a strong unionman, and his objections to the deductions when he received his first paycheck on September 9. Then on September 15, shortly after he had hired his nephew, Riddle gave him the form for authorizing union deductions, as contemplated in the collective-bargaining agreement, and instructed him to fill it out as he wished. The nephew indicated on the card that he did not want to be in the Union and later in the month verbally gave his reasons for his attitude. Also, in mid-September, Glasscock told Riddle he did not want to be in the Union and Riddle should not make union withholdings from his paycheck. Shortly thereafter, observing he wanted to know whether Glasscock wished to join the Union, Glasscock responded by signing the card in a manner indicating he did not want the deductions made. This was followed on September 23 by a query from Dailey whether he could work if he did not have the permit money withheld. When Riddle told him he could, Dailey directed him not to make the deductions. In the latter part of September and early October (but prior to October 7), Riddle heard verbal expressions from Jeakins, Akins, Ed Casey, and Graves indicating their lack of support for Local 69 and, in fact, the entire crew, when informed that Local 69 might be picketing the Eagle's job, nevertheless proceeded to work with apparent enthusiasm.

In addition to verbal statements of employees, Riddle received authorization forms from seven employees filled out in a manner indicating less than full support for Local 69.[6] Three of these cards indicated the signing employee did not wish union dues, permit money, and other deductions made from their paychecks, and, standing alone, do not amount to categorical rejections of Local 69 as employee representative. See Randle-Eastern Ambulance Service, supra. The other four cards express a broader desire not to be identified with the Union, one indicating a desire not to be "in the Union," another not to "join the Union," another not to "belong to the Union," and another not "to be part of Roofers Local 69." The oral comments and the cards are evidence tending to erode the presumed continued majority status of Local 69. There is no basis in the record for finding that Riddle solicited employees to oppose the Union or withdraw support from it, as alleged in the complaint, nor is there evidence of an illegal poll of employee sentiment respecting the Union as urged in the General Counsel's brief. The collective-bargaining agreement contemplates that the Employer shall obtain employee authorization for union-related deductions and in all instances it is clear that Riddle underscored that the employee should express his own wish in the matter. I find, therefore, that these expressions of employee sentiment were evidence on which, unless tainted by unfair labor practices, Riddle was entitled to rely in assessing whether Local 69 should or should not continue to be recognized as the representative of his roofing employees. Bellwood General Hospital v. NLRB, 627 F.2d 98 (7th Cir. 1980).

The General Counsel argues that the evidence relied on by McLean to support the good-faith doubt defense is inadequate because a majority of the employees did not execute cards indicating their rejection of the Union. The argument, as stated, is faulty because it takes account only of the cards, ignoring the oral expressions of sentiment noted above. On October 7, when McLean withdrew recognition of Local 69, it employed 12 roofers within the admitted appropriate bargaining unit.[7] Of these 12 employees Riddle has as of October 7 some information from all but 2 (Tim Hardin and Tom Howell) indicating lack of support for Local 69. Noting that it is not essential that a good-faith doubt be supported by such information from a majority of the employees, I find that on October 7 Riddle had sufficient objective knowledge, which would have justified a good-faith doubt of the majority status of Local 69 in the absence of tainting unfair labor practices.

3. The context of the unfair labor practices

The General Counsel urges that a good-faith doubt defense is not available because of Respondents' unfair labor practices in (1) refusing to recognize and bargain with Local 69 concerning the working conditions of Accurate employees and the requirement that roofers working on Accurate jobs do so under nonunion conditions, (b) unilaterally changing terms of employment of McLean employees, and (c) soliciting employees to abandon the Union. For Respondents to be deprived of that defense, the unfair labor practices must have tainted the Employer's good-faith doubt asserted at the time of withdrawal of recognition. The McLean crewmen who expressed their reservations concerning Local 69, verbally or in writing, did not work on Accurate jobs or under the nonunion conditions that the General Counsel contends were violations of the Act. Some testified they knew nothing about Accurate or its operations. I do not credit these disclaimers. Given the modest size of the McLean work force at its largest, together with the proximity of Accurate, the common supervision of Dennis Casey, and the fact that almost all Accurate roofers were members of the McLean crew, I infer that the nonunion status of Accurate was general knowledge among McLean roofers. These nonunion conditions had been apparent at least since May 1982 and remained so through the time of McLean's withdrawal of recognition on October 7, 1982. Thus, the ongoing refusal to recognize and bargain about the Accurate operation provided a pervasive and continuing atmosphere of unfair labor practices during the time Riddle was noting and collecting antiunion sentiments from employees and up to and beyond the date of withdrawal of recognition. As the Board stated in C & C Plywood Corp., 163 NLRB 1022, 1024 (1967), "The failure to accord the Union its rightful role in the establishment of new wage rates . . . necessarily tended to undermine the Union's authority among the employees whose interests it was obligated to represent in such matters."

Beginning in early September this context of unfair labor practices increased further with the diversion of union dues, permit fees, and health and welfare contributions from the union recipients to the employee, thereby effectively increasing the employee's pay. These de facto increases were carried out without notice to Local 69 or opportunity for it to bargain on the matter, while it was still presumptively the majority representative, and before the October 7 withdrawal of recognition based on doubt on the Union's majority status. In this fashion the take-home pay of employees was increased as follows: Richard Black Sr. on September 9, David N. Riddle and Chris Akins on September 16, John Glasscock and Wesley Jeakins on September 23, and Richard Black Jr. and Richard Dailey on October 1. I find these unilateral increases, which further undercut the status of the Union, were additional unfair labor practices prohibited by Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. C & C Plywood Corp., supra and see Abbey Medical/Abbey Rents, supra. I also find that the cessation of health and welfare and pension payments to the union funds violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Cauthorne Trucking, 256 NLRB 721 (1981). It is arguable that the sums involved in these changes belonged to the respective employees and that McLean merely gave them what was already theirs. Be that as it may, there is no disputing the unilateral nature of the changes with the attendant undercutting effect on the Union's status. Even if the employees were entitled to the money, McLean was obligated to take the matter up with the Union as their lawful representative. It is also arguable that the changes complied with the collective-bargaining agreement. I find they did not because the pattern of the agreement is to funnel certain amounts to the employees and other amounts to the Union or union funds. The most that can be contended for the defense on this point is that the agreement is ambiguous. If so, Respondent is not thereby relieved of its duty to bargain with the Union on such matters. See C & C Plywood Corp., supra.

Considering the totality of the circumstances, I find that Riddle may not assert a good-faith doubt as of October 7, 1982, regarding the majority status of Local 69 because, even though he knew of considerable antiunion sentiment among the employees, that doubt thrived in the context of continuing unfair labor practices which nurtured disaffection from the Union. Celanese Corp., 95 NLRB 664 (1951). In this respect these circumstances differ from those in Sofco, Inc., 268 NLRB 159 (1983), where the Board found objective considerations sufficient to support the employer's good-faith doubt of union majority status. There there appeared to be no comparable context of unfair labor practices. The basis for McLean's withdrawal of recognition from Local 69 is, therefore, unfounded and constitutes no refutation of its presumed majority status. That presumption of continuing majority status is based on the Union's labor relations history with McLean. Barrington Plaza & Tragniew, 185 NLRB 962, 963 (1970), enf. denied on other grounds 470 F.2d 669 (9th Cir. 1972). It follows that by its withdrawal of recognition on October 7, 1982, McLean reneged on its continuing duty to recognize and bargain with Local 69 and in so doing violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Celanese Corp., supra; Shamrock Dairy, supra, 119 NLRB 998 and 124 NLRB 494 (1959), enfd. 280 F.2d 665 (D.C. Cir 1960), cert. denied 364 U.S. 892 (1960); Bartenders Assn., 213 NLRB 651, supra.

It also follows from McLean's continuing duty to recognize and bargain with Local 69 that the unilateral reimbursement to employees after October 7, 1982, of union dues and deductions made before that date and the increase in take-home pay that resulted and continued thereafter also violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Such increases were given after October 7 to Ed Casey, David Graves, and Robert Sylvester.

4. The failure to provide information

When McLean withdrew recognition from Local 69 on October 7, 1982, Union Attorney Benassi that same day in a letter to Respondent Attorney Roesler protesting the withdrawal of recognition also requested that Respondents furnish the Union certain information for use in collective bargaining, including employment records of both companies showing rates of pay, hours worked, and fringe benefits paid since January 1, 1982. It is undisputed that this information has not been supplied. The information requested, apparently relevant for bargaining purposes, has not been furnished because of the defense that Respondents have no duty to bargain with Local 69. Inasmuch as it has been found above that such duty exists, it follows that the relevant information requested should be furnished for bargaining and Respondents' failure to do so constitutes an additional violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149 (1956); NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondents McLean and Accurate are employers within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, a single employer for labor relations purposes; alter egos of each other for labor relations purposes; and engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. All full-time and regular part-time journeymen roofers, helpers, and apprentices employed by Respondent McLean or Accurate at their Bloomington, Illinois facilities and various jobsites; but excluding professional employees, office clerical, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

3. Local 69 was and is, and prior to January 1980 Local 130 was, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

4. Respondent McLean adopted and became bound by the collective-bargaing agreement of Local 69 with Bloomington, Illinois roofing contractors effective May 1, 1980.

5. By informing employees in April and May 1982 that in working for Accurate they would be working under nonunion conditions, Respondents engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

6. Respondents engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 8(d) of the Act by

(a) In June 1982 and thereafter, although requested to do so, refusing to recognize and bargain with Local 69 as the representative of the roofing employees of Accurate.

(b) In September 1982 and thereafter increasing the take-home pay of employees by the amounts previously deducted as union dues, permit fees, and health and welfare contributions.

(c) Effective October 1, 1982, ceasing to remit employee union dues and permit fees to Local 69 and contributions to the health and welfare fund to the roofers pension fund designated by Local 69.

(d) On October 7, 1982, withdrawing recognition from Local 69 as the representative of Respondents' roofing employees and refusing thereafter to bargain collectively with that Union.

(e) Since October 7, 1982, failing and refusing to furnish to Local 69 relevant information necessary for collective bargaining.

7. The unfair labor practices found above affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondents have engaged in and are engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 8(d) of the Act, I shall order that Respondents cease and desist therefrom, and, on request, bargain collectively with Local 69 as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit.

I shall further order that Respondents make whole the employees in the unit found appropriate here by paying all contributions to the health and welfare and pension trust fund as provided in the collective-bargaining agreement of Local 69 effective from May 1, 1980, until its abrogation October 7, 1982, which have been paid absent Respondents' refusal to apply the terms of agreement to Accurate employees and McLean's unilateral discontinuance of such payments, and to post the attached notice.[8]

[8] Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide at the adjudicatory stage of a proceeding for the addition of interest at a fixed rate on unlawfully withheld fund payments. The Board leaves to the compliance stage the question of whether Respondents must pay any additional amounts into the benefit funds in order to satisfy the "make-whole" remedy. These additional amounts may be determined, depending on the circumstances of each case, by reference to provisions in the documents governing the funds at issue and, where there are no governing provisions, to evidence

This make-whole remedy shall include reimbursing employees for contributions they themselves may have made or the maintenance of their coverage for benefits after Respondents unlawfully ceased contributing, for any premiums they may have paid to third-party insurance companies for coverage heretofore provided by the trust, and for any medical bill employees have paid to health care providers that the trusts would have covered, together with interest as provided in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[9] See Hudson Chemical Co., 258 NLRB 152 (1981); Kraft Plumbing & Heating, 252 NLRB 891 (1980). The General Counsel urges that the remedy include enforcement of the Local 69 contract beyond October 7, 1982. It is not demonstrated in this record, however, that, absent clear contractual provisions controlling the duration and termination of the agreement, Respondents violated the contract by canceling it. The appropriate remedy, therefore, is for Respondents to bargain with Local 69 regarding terms and conditions of employment after October 7, 1982. Respondents also will be required to preserve and, on request, make available to authorized agents of the Board all records necessary or useful in determining compliance with this Order.

DECISION, ORDER, AND DIRECTION OF SECOND ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On February 6, 1984, Administrative Law Judge Marvin Roth issued the attached decision.[1] The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the Charging Party filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in opposition to the Respondent's exceptions.[2]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[3] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

I.

This case concerns the conduct of the Respondent and the Charging Party during a lengthy union organizing campaign that culminated in an election that the Charging Party lost by a vote of 1049 to 231.[4] In his decision, the judge found that the Respondent, New Process Company (NPC), committed a number of violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the National Labor Relations Act, and he sustained several of the Charging Party's objections to the election and directed that a new election be held. The judge also dismissed a number of alleged violations and overruled many of the Charging Party's election objections. NPC excepts to all the violations that were found and all the objections that were sustained. The Charging Party, the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union Local 1 (UFCW or the Union), excepts to the judge's denial of the UFCW's request for reimbursement of its organizational expenses and to the findings on which the denial was predicated. No party excepts to the judge's disposition of any of the alleged violations that he dismissed or any of the election objections that he overruled.

On the basis of NPC's exceptions, we reverse, for reasons stated below, the judge's conclusions that NPC committed unfair labor practices by not granting nonemployee union organizers access to its property. We adopt the judge's conclusion that NPC violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by refusing to reinstate former employees Freeda Carr and Nancy Race.[5] We also adopt the judge's conclusions that NPC violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and in some instances (4), by refusing to recommend for rehire and refusing to rehire the six former employees who are the subject of Case 6–CA–15995. Additionally, except in the few instances discussed below, we adopt the judge's disposition of the remaining violations and objections to which NPC excepted,[6] and we adopt the judge's recommendation that the election be set aside and a new election ordered.[7] We have not considered, and ex-

[1] On February 21, 1984, Judge Roth issued an errata correcting par. 2(h) of the recommended Order and correcting the decision number.

[2] The Respondent has requested oral argument. In support of its request, the Respondent also submitted a supplemental letter and a portion of a union newsletter. The request for oral argument is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[3] The Respondent in its brief initially states that it does not take issue with the judge's credibility findings. Later, however, it challenges the judge's credibility findings concerning certain testimony of the Respondent's assistant vice president Stark, Supervisor Gern, and employee Hockenberry. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[4] There were also 81 challenged ballots and 3 void ballots.

[5] As appropriate affirmative relief may be ordered on the basis of the 8(a)(3) and (1) violations, we find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's conclusion that the refusal to reinstate Carr and Race also violated Sec. 8(a)(4).

[6] In adopting the judge's conclusion that Supervisor Nick Pollock unlawfully interrogated Alan LaCava and other employees, we reject NPC's contention that the judge's resolution of this issue is contrary to our decision in Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984). Unlike that case, it was not shown here that the employees questioned by Pollock other than LaCava openly supported the Union. Moreover, unlike Rossmore House, Pollock's questions concerned the employees' union activities rather than union sentiments.

[7] The judge held that the critical period began on the date of the filing of the initial election petition, October 27, 1980, although this petition was withdrawn on December 22, 1980, a second election petition was filed on January 2, 1981, and the election was held on June 9, 1981. NPC excepts to the critical period found by the judge. The judge, however, found no unfair labor practices or other objectionable conduct to have occurred between October 27, 1980, and January 2, 1981, except for NPC's refusal to rehire Barbara Morgan, which occurred both before and after January 2, 1981. Thus, we need not consider whether the judge was correct in determining that the critical period began on the date that the first petition was filed, rather than the date that the second petition was filed.

Although we reverse some of the judge's findings of unfair labor practices and other objectionable conduct that were alleged to have occurred during the critical period, we find that the allegations of objectionable conduct that we sustain warrant setting aside the election, even assuming that the critical period did not begin until the Union filed its second election petition. These instances of objectionable conduct are as follows: (1) Supervisor Mary Bloom's warning to Warren employees Sheila Mack and Dawn Dickson for copying the names of employees from timecards in the timecard rack; (2) Supervisor Kerry Gern's written warning to Irvine employee Joan Hockenberry for similar conduct; (3) Gern's warning to Hockenberry to stop "union arguing" after she answered another employee's questions about the Union while continuing to do her work; (4) NPC's informing Carr that she was denied access to NPC's property press no views concerning, the judge's findings and conclusions about which no party filed exceptions. See Section 102.46(b) and (h) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, 29 CFR § 102.46(b) and (h).

II.

The General Counsel's allegation that NPC violated Section 8(a)(1) by refusing to allow nonemployee union organizers access to NPC's property concerns only NPC's Irvine Distribution Center facility (Irvine), at which approximately 538 bargaining unit members were employed. No similar allegation was made concerning NPC's Warren facility, 7 miles from Irvine, at which approximately 917 unit members were employed.[8] Irvine is located on a large tract of land owned by NPC adjacent to U.S. Highway 62 in a semirural area of northwestern Pennsylvania. The access roads connecting the Irvine facility to the highway are on NPC property. On October 6, 1980, two union organizers and three former NPC employees attempted to distribute union literature to employees along a sidewalk that leads from the main building exit to a parking lot at Irvine. NPC Vice President John Carter told one of the organizers that they were on private property and requested them to leave, which they did. The next day the same group plus an additional organizer returned and were ordered to leave by a Pennsylvania state trooper, who was present at NPC's request. The three organizers left but returned shortly and distributed leaflets to employees leaving the plant. At the request of NPC, the trooper charged the organizers with criminal trespass. The organizers did not return thereafter. Subsequently, on February 26, 1981, during the pendency of the election petition, the UFCW wrote Carter requesting that NPC allow the Union to handbill the employees at Irvine or provide the Union a list of the names and addresses of those employees. NPC did not reply to the request.

After conducting an extensive review of the Union's organizing efforts, the judge concluded that, despite conscientious efforts, the Union did not have a viable means of communication with Irvine employees other than entering Irvine premises for the purposes of distributing literature and talking to the employees. He therefore concluded that NPC violated Section 8(a)(1) by excluding nonemployee union organizers from its premises. We do not agree.

Subsequent to the judge's decision, the Board issued its decision in Fairmont Hotel, 282 NLRB 139 (1986). In Fairmont, the Board reviewed NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105 (1956), and its progeny, and determined that in cases involving conflicts between Section 7 rights and property rights, the Board's task is "first to weigh the relative strength of each party's claim." The Board found:

> If the property owner's claim is a strong one, while the Section 7 right at issue is clearly a less compelling one, the property right will prevail. If the property claim is a tenuous one, and the Section 7 right is clearly more compelling, then the Section 7 right will prevail. Only in those cases where the respective claims are relatively equal in strength will effective alternative means of communication become determinative. [Fairmont Hotel, supra at 142.]

The Board also set forth some of the factors that may affect the relative strength or weakness of an asserted property right or Section 7 right. Applying those factors here, we find that NPC has a strong property right at Irvine. NPC is engaged in the mail order retail sale of merchandise, primarily clothing. Irvine is essentially a warehouse operation engaged in the storage, inspection, packing, and shipping of merchandise. NPC has retail outlets for direct sales at three other locations but not at Irvine. As Irvine is set back from the highway on a large tract of land devoted exclusively to NPC's business and to which retail customers are not invited, NPC has a strong property right at Irvine.

We also find that the Section 7 right at issue is quite strong. The right of workers to organize freely for the purpose of collective bargaining is a very strong Section 7 right, one found by the Supreme Court to be "at the very core of the purpose for which the NLRB was enacted."[9] Here, the union organizers sought access to the plant exterior at Irvine, a facility of NPC, the targeted employer, unless she first received permission to enter; and (5) NPC's refusal to rehire Barbara Morgan. Although Morgan first applied for reemployment in December 1980, she went to NPC and updated her application a week or two later, and she thereafter contacted NPC three or four times about being rehired. We thus conclude that her efforts to obtain reemployment continued into the period between the Union's filing of its second election petition on January 2, 1981, and the date of the election, June 9, 1981.

We additionally adopt the judge's conclusion that issuance of a bargaining order is not warranted. The judge's discussion of the bargaining order issue, however, has been superceded by our decision in Gourmet Foods, 270 NLRB 578 (1984).

[8] Union organizers and prounion employees distributed literature to employees on the sidewalk directly in front of the Warren facility, which was located on a downtown street. Sixty-three percent of the bargaining unit members were employed at the Warren facility.

in furtherance of this paramount right of employees to organize.[10]

We thus find that both the property and Section 7 rights at issue are strong and, thus, relatively equal. Accordingly, we deem it necessary to consider whether reasonable alternative means by which the Union could have communicated its message were available.[11]

In considering this question, it is instructive to review the Supreme Court's decision in Babcock & Wilcox, supra, the seminal case involving the accommodation of property rights and Section 7 rights. In Babcock & Wilcox, union organizers sought access to privately owned parking lots at an industrial site so that they could organize the employees. As both rights claimed were important ones, the Court carefully reviewed the facts before it to ascertain if there were some way that the Section 7 right in issue could be effectuated without requiring trespassory access. The Court concluded that access to the employees could be obtained in the adjacent town or at the employees' homes. Therefore, access to Babcock & Wilcox's private property was denied. The Court specifically acknowledged that in rare circumstances the accommodation principle may require trespassory organizational activities, citing NLRB v. Lake Superior Lumber Corp.,[12] a case invalidating restrictions placed on access to employees living and working at an isolated lumber camp. In Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. San Diego County District Council of Carpenters,[13] the Court again acknowledged the existence of such rare circumstances, citing Lake Superior Lumber, and also NLRB v. S & H Grossinger's,[14] a decision ordering union access to employees living and working on the premises of a resort hotel. Therefore, had Babcock & Wilcox involved a company town, for example, where all or a majority of the employees in question both lived and worked, the Court might well have struck the balance differently. But, clearly, on the facts before it in Babcock & Wilcox, the Court implicitly found the obvious additional burden or cost of organizing in the town, on the street, and at the employees' homes was not sufficient to overcome the private character of the property right at stake.

On the record before us here, the General Counsel has not demonstrated the existence of "unique obstacles to nontrespassory methods of communication with the employees"[15] such as were present in Lake Superior Lumber, supra, or Grossinger's, supra. Thus, the record shows that the UFCW conducted an extensive organizing campaign among NPC's employees. It established an internal organizing committee at Irvine and Warren that numbered between 75 and 80 employees, although the size of the committee varied over the course of the campaign. A number of the committee members, including Freeda Carr, Kay Davis, Donna Fehlman, Joan Hockenberry, and Alan LaCava, distributed union literature to employees at Irvine in front of the building between shifts or in the cafeteria at lunchtime. Union representatives made about 1000 house calls at the homes of employees. The Union also compiled a list of the names and addresses of 800 employees and sent between 12 and 15 mailings to employees. The Union held regular weekly meetings in a motel meeting room and held a large meeting in a school auditorium shortly before the election. The Union for a time broadcast commercials on a Warren radio station and later did the same on a radio station in Jamestown, New York, 24 miles from Warren.

As detailed by the judge in section IV,A,8 of his decision, the UFCW did encounter obstacles in its organizing efforts. There was a 15- to 20-percent annual turnover rate among NPC's employees, some of the employees' homes were widely scattered over a rural area, the Warren newspaper declined to run UFCW ads, the Warren radio station discontinued UFCW ads, and the UFCW had difficulties arranging for a large meeting hall. Nevertheless, despite these impediments, the Union was able to communicate with the employees through the various means described above. Although the judge also emphasized NPC's unlawful interference with employee organizing activity as impeding organizational efforts, we note that some prounion employees nevertheless passed out literature in the cafeteria and in front of the building at Irvine, and a larger number wore union T-shirts or other union paraphernalia to work. Additionally, the great majority of violations committed by NPC occurred prior to the start of the lengthy critical period, which the judge found to extend from October 27, 1980, to the election on June 9, 1981. Moreover, as detailed below, some of the actions that the judge determined to be unlawful interference we do not find to be such.

Thus, we find that there were channels of communication available to the Union through which, with reasonable efforts, it could reach its intended audience with its message. The Union emphasizes that it was not, in many cases, able to have its message conveyed personally by its professional organizers, as it would have preferred, and instead had to rely on prounion employees, leaflets, mailings, and radio commercials, as well as home visits by organizers, to spread its message. As the Section 7 right and property right at issue here are relatively equal, however, the Union possessed no right to have its organizers come onto NPC premises in person to deliver its message as long as there were other available channels of communication through which, with reasonable efforts, it could reach its intended audience.

The judge, in section IV,B,6 of his decision, also found NPC's failure to grant access in response to the Union's request of May 7, 1981, constituted a violation on the basis of the Board's decision in Montgomery Ward & Co., 145 NLRB 846 (1964). That decision held that a nonunion employer, which was engaged in retail sales, and thereby could lawfully maintain a privileged broad no-solicitation rule as to sales areas, violated Section 8(a)(1) by imposing an unlawfully broad rule banning union solicitation in nonworking areas during nonworking time and at the same time denying the union an opportunity to enter the employer's premises to respond to antiunion speeches the employer made to its employees. Montgomery Ward is not applicable here, however, because unlike the employer in that case, NPC did not generally prohibit employees from engaging in union solicitation in nonworking areas during nonworking times. Although we adopt the judge's finding of a violation concerning NPC's no-solicitation policy, this violation is based on the discriminatory nature of that policy, rather than overbreadth. Accordingly, union access to NPC's premises was not mandated under Montgomery Ward.

III.

We also reverse the judge's decision on certain other matters. A statement made by NPC representatives to assembled groups of employees during the week prior to the election was found by the judge in section IV,B,5,a of his decision to imply that if the employees decided in favor of union representation, NPC's policy of allowing employees to have direct access to management would end. Assuming arguendo that this statement implied what the judge found it to imply, on the basis of our decision in Tri-Cast, 274 NLRB 377 (1985), we nevertheless dismiss the allegation that this statement constituted a threat in violation of Section 8(a)(1). In Tri-Cast, which addressed a similar but more explicit employer statement of the consequences of unionization, we held there is no threat in a statement that explains to employees that, when they select a union to represent them, the relationship between the employees and the employer will not be as it was before. That holding is dispositive of the alleged violation here.

Other statements made by NPC spokesmen to assembled groups of employees during the first week of June 1981 were found by the judge to constitute threats. Statements were made to the effect that the Union was likely to seek a contract provision requiring union membership as a condition of employment, and, under such a provision, if employees for any reason then lost their union membership, they would also lose their jobs. In section IV,B,5,a of his decision, the judge found that these statements constituted threats of loss of job security. We disagree. The statements were an inaccurate account of the law, but they did not amount to a threat that the employees would be fired if they voted for the Union or that unionization would result in the employees' losing their jobs. Moreover, the possibility of job loss was predicated on the Union's first terminating the employees' union membership, an event beyond the control of NPC. In Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 266 NLRB 507 (1983), the Board held unobjectionable an employer's election campaign statement that employees who continued to work during a strike could be fined by the union, even if they were not members of the union. That the statement constituted a misrepresentation of the law did not warrant finding it to be objectionable conduct. The Board did not discuss whether the statement constituted an unlawful threat, but in finding the statement unobjectionable the Board implicitly rejected such a view. We find similarly that NPC's statements here, although a misrepresentation of the law, did not constitute objectionable conduct or an unlawful threat. We therefore dismiss the allegation that they violated Section 8(a)(1). See John W. Galbreath & Co., 288 NLRB 876 (1988). In section IV,B,5,b of his decision, the judge similarly found statements that a union member could be fined for writing an antiunion letter and that an employee could be fined or expelled from the Union for filing a decertification petition to constitute threats of loss of job security. Again, we reverse the judge and find these statements not be threats but, as most, misrepresentations, and, therefore, not objectionable conduct under Metropolitan Life.[16]

[16] In agreement with the judge, Member Johansen would find violative of Sec. 8(a)(1) NPC's election campaign statements that the Union would be likely to seek a contract provision requiring union membership and if employees for any reason then were expelled from the Union, they

IV.

In affirming the judge's remaining findings of violations or objectionable conduct, we make certain modifications to the judge's rationale, as follows. In adopting the judge's conclusion in section IV,A,4 of his decision that NPC violated Section 8(a)(1) by increasing the amount of supervision on the night shift at its Warren facility, we note the NPC's explanation for the increase in supervision is unconvincing.[17] We find particularly unpersuasive the testimony of NPC Assistant Vice President George Stark that starting in the summer of 1980 the night-shift supervisors at Warren, who were all experienced supervisors, began asking Stark numerous questions about "how they were to do this and how they were to do that," which necessitated assigning day-shift supervisors to assist and advise the night-shift supervisors. Stark failed to explain why the experienced night supervisors' sudden need for assistance happened to coincide with the onset of the union organizing effort.

In adopting the conclusion in section IV,A,5,f of the judge's decision that NPC violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by issuing to employee Vivian Newton a written warning after Newton requested employee Chris Nuhfer to show her Nuhfer's union authorization card while at work, we note that at the time Newton made the request she was not neglecting her work, as her work tasks were completed at that point. Indeed, the phrase "rather than doing her work" was deleted from her warning in order to reflect this fact. Moreover, the language of the warning did not assert Newton was impeding Nuhfer's work. Rather, the conduct for which Newton received a warning was characterized as "conducting union organizing business while on Company time." We, therefore, adopt the judge's finding that the issuance of the warning constituted an unfair labor practice. See Gemco, 271 NLRB 1190 (1984) (prohibition of solicitation on "company time" found unlawful).[18]

As we have concluded that NPC has committed certain unfair labor practices, we issue the following remedial order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, New Process Company, Warren, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discouraging membership in United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, Local 1, AFL–CIO–CLC, or any other labor organization, by discriminatorily refusing to reinstate, recommend for rehire, or rehire employees; by discriminatorily transferring employees; disciplining them because of their union activities; segregating them at work; conspicuously or closely observing them or scrutinizing them at work; prohibiting them from talking at work; or in any other manner discriminating against employees in regard to their hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment.

(b) Refusing to reinstate, recommend for rehire, or rehire employees, or otherwise discriminating against them because they give testimony or are subpoenaed to testify under the National Labor Relations Act.

would lose their jobs. Coupled with these statements, NPC enumerated all the offenses listed in the Union's constitution for which a member could be expelled. To be lawful, predictions of the consequences of unionization "must be carefully phrased on the basis of objective fact to convey an employer's belief as to the demonstrably probable consequences beyond his control." NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 618 (1969). Although NPC's prediction that the Union would seek a contractual union-shop provision may have been objectively probable and beyond NPC's control, NPC's further statement that if employees for any reason were expelled from the Union they would lose their job was not. Contracts cannot lawfully provide that expulsion from a union for any reason requires termination of employment; employment may be conditioned only on payment of union dues and fees. NLRB v. General Motors Corp., 373 U.S. 734 (1963). Thus, NPC's statement about employee job loss was premised on a prediction that NPC and the Union would agree to an illegal contract clause and that NPC would discharge employees pursuant to this clause, a prediction of events neither objectively probable nor beyond NPC's control. As the judge noted, the statements here are unlike the employer misstatement of law at issue in Daniel Construction Co., 257 NLRB 1276 (1981), which was found not to violate Sec. 8(a)(1) because it contained "no express threat that the employer by its own action would impose dire consequences, such as discharge on the employees and no implicit threat to the employees' rights." There, in response to an employee question, the employer's manager stated that the employee would have to join the union if the union won the election. Nothing was said regarding the consequences if the employee failed to join the union. In the present case, by contrast, NPC specifically raised the prospect of discharge, a "dire consequence," if employees lost union membership. Cf. SMI of Worcester, 271 NLRB 1508, 1524 (1984) (statement that, if requested by union, employer would discharge employee who refused to sign union membership application found to violate Sec. 8(a)(1)). Similarly, the statements at issue here are unlike the employer misstatement of law found unobjectionable in Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 266 NLRB 507 (1983), as the statement there merely threatened nonunion members with union fines, not the "dire consequence" of discharge, if they worked during a strike; moreover, the threatened union fines there were beyond the employer's control. Accordingly, Member Johansen would find NPC's statement that employees would lose their jobs if expelled from the Union to violate Sec. 8(a)(1).

[17] In adopting the judge's decision on this issue, we do not rely on his statement that, in increasing supervision, NPC used eight or nine additional supervisors to cover the night shift. As the judge noted in the paragraph that preceded the one containing this statement, these additional supervisors covered the night shift on a rotating basis. Normally only one additional supervisor at a time served on the night shift.

[18] In addition, in adopting the judge's conclusion in sec. IV,A,5,c of his decision that NPC's policy concerning display of prounion and antiunion signs on "heisters," or forklift trucks, was an unfair labor practice, we rely solely on NPC's discriminatory implementation of this policy. We do not adopt, in the context of this case, the judge's statements that NPC could not prohibit the signs simply because they were taped onto NPC property and that prohibiting the display of both prounion and antiunion signs violated the Act.

(c) Interrogating employees concerning their union activities or those of their fellow employees.

(d) Threatening employees with lack of equal or fair opportunity for advancement or benefit, or other more onerous terms and conditions of employment, if they designate or select the Union or any other labor organization as their bargaining representative.

(e) Threatening employees with management disapproval or other reprisal because of their union activities.

(f) Wiping dirt or grease on union T-shirts or other union insignia worn by employees.

(g) Threatening to destroy union literature or paraphernalia.

(h) Confiscating union literature in nonworking areas.

(i) Maintaining or enforcing any policy which prohibits employees from union solicitation or talking about the Union or union business at times when the employees are properly not engaged in performing their work tasks, or which prohibits such activity while permitting other forms of solicitation or conversation.

(j) Prohibiting displays of union signs while permitting display of antiunion signs.

(k) Denying employees access to its bulletin boards to post prounion or related material, or removing such material from its bulletin boards, while permitting posting of other nonwork literature.

(l) Engaging in surveillance of union activities, or increasing supervision in order to engage in surveillance of employees because of their union activities.

(m) Prohibiting off-duty employees, including employees who have been discriminatorily denied reinstatement, from entering or remaining on outside nonwork areas of the Respondent's premises for the purpose of engaging in union solicitation or distribution of union literature.

(n) Prohibiting employees from copying names from timecard racks for lawful organizational purposes at times when the employees are properly not engaged in performing their work tasks, or disciplining employees because they engage in such activity.

(o) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Freeda Carr and Nancy Race immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the judge's decision.

(b) Offer Pamela Damon, Rhonda Gross, Barbara Morgan, Debra Nuhfer, Floyd Monticue, and Rebecca Stuart Walton immediate and full employment, in a nondiscriminatory manner, to positions for which they are qualified, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges to which they would be entitled absent the discrimination against them, and make them whole for losses they suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, in the manner and to the extent set forth in the remedy section of the judge's decision.

(c) Remove from its files the negative or qualified reemployment recommendations for Freeda Carr, Nancy Race, Pamela Damon, Rhonda Gross, Barbara Morgan, Debra Nuhfer, Floyd Monticue, and Rebecca Stuart Walton, and notify each of them in writing that this has been done and that such recommendations will not be used as a basis for further personnel actions against them.

(d) Revoke, and expunge from its files, the written warnings which were given to Vivian Newton in October 1980, and to Joan Hockenberry in February 1981, and any references to the oral warnings which were given in January 1981, to Hockenberry, Sheila Mack, and Dawn Dickson, and notify each of them in writing that this has been done and that such warnings will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

(e) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(f) Post at its plants in Warren and Irvine, Pennsylvania, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[19] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 6, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Re-

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT discourage membership in United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, Local 1, AFL–CIO–CLC, or any other labor organization, by discriminatorily refusing to reinstate, recommend for rehire, or rehire you, by discriminatorily transferring you, disciplining you because of your union activities, segregating you at work, conspicuously or closely observing or scrutinizing you at work, prohibiting you from talking at work, or in any other manner discriminating against you in regard to your hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment.

WE WILL NOT refuse to reinstate, recommend for rehiré, or rehire you, or otherwise discriminate against you because you give testimony or are subpoenaed to testify under the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT interrogate you concerning your union activities or those of your fellow employees.

WE WILL NOT threaten you with lack of equal or fair opportunity for advancement or benefit or other more onerous terms and conditions of employment if you select Local 1 or any other labor organization as your bargaining representative.

WE WILL NOT threaten you with management disapproval or other reprisal because of your union activities.

WE WILL NOT wipe dirt or grease on union T-shirts or other union insignia worn by employees.

WE WILL NOT threaten to destroy union literature or paraphernalia.

WE WILL NOT confiscate union literature in nonworking areas.

WE WILL NOT maintain or enforce any policy which prohibits you from union solicitation or talking about the Union or union business at times when you are properly not engaged in performing your work tasks, or which prohibits such activity while permitting other forms of solicitation or conversation.

WE WILL NOT prohibit display of union signs while permitting display of antiunion signs.

WE WILL NOT deny you access to our bulletin boards to post prounion or related material, or remove such material from our bulletin boards, while permitting posting of other nonwork literature.

WE WILL NOT engage in surveillance of union activities or increase supervision in order to engage in surveillance of you because of your union activities.

WE WILL NOT prohibit off-duty employees, including employees who have been discriminatorily denied reinstatement, from entering or remaining on outside nonworking areas of our premises for the purpose of engaging in union solicitation or distribution of union literature.

WE WILL NOT prohibit you from copying names from timecard racks for lawful organizational purposes at times when you are properly not engaged in performing your work tasks, or discipline you because you engage in such activity.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of your right to engage in union or concerted activities, or to refrain therefrom.

WE WILL offer Freeda Carr and Nancy Race immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from the discrimination against them, plus interest.

WE WILL offer Pamela Damon, Rhonda Gross, Barbara Morgan, Debra Nuhfer, Floyd Monticue, and Rebecca Stuart Walton immediate and full employment, in a nondiscriminatory manner, to positions for which they are qualified, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges to which they would be entitled absent the discrimination against them, and make them whole for losses they suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, with interest.

WE WILL remove from our files the negative or qualified reemployment recommendations for Freeda Carr, Nancy Race, Pamela Damon, Rhonda

Gross, Barbara Morgan, Debra Nuhfer, Floyd Monticue, and Rebecca Stuart Walton, and notify each of them in writing that this had been done and that such recommendations will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

WE WILL revoke, and expunge from our files, the written warnings which were given to Vivian Newton in October 1980, and to Joan Hockenberry in February 1981, and any references to the oral warnings which were given in January 1981, to Joan Hockenberry, Shelia Mack, and Dawn Dickson, and notify each of them in writing that this has been done and that such warnings will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARVIN ROTH, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were heard at Warren, Pennsylvania, on October 18 through 22, December 6 through 10, 14, and 15, 1982, and as reopened on April 27, 1983. The charges and amended charges were filed by United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, Local 1, AFL–CIO–CLC (the Union) as follows: Case 6–CA–13933 on October 15, 1980, and as amended on October 7, 1982; Case 6–CA–14403 on April 2, 1981; Case 6–CA–14578 on May 19, 1981; Case 6–CA–14597 on May 26, 1981; Case 6–CA–14697 on July 7, 1981; and Case 6–CA–15995 on December 10, 1982. The consolidated complaint in Cases 6–CA–13933, 6–CA–14403, 6–CA–14578, 6–CA–14697, which issued on June 28, 1982, and was amended at the hearing, and the complaint in Case 6–CA–15995, which issued on February 15, 1983, and was consolidated with the other cases on motion of the General Counsel by my order of February 25, 1983, and was also amended at the hearing, allege that New Process Company (Respondent or the Company) violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the National Labor Relations Act. The complaints do not allege that the Company violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. The Company's answers deny the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices, and further assert by way of affirmative defense, in sum, that certain allegations of the complaint were the subject of charges on which the Regional Director and/or the General Counsel declined to proceed, and that certain allegations of the complaint in Case 6–CA–15995 are time-barred under Section 10(b) of the Act. I have heretofore ruled on some of these affirmative defenses.

Pursuant to a Decision and Direction of Election issued by the Regional Director on May 1, 1981, an election was conducted on June 9, 1981, among the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time Mailing Department, Order Handling Department and Merchandise Handling Department employees, including pallet tally clerks, inventory control clerks, hold up release clerks, receiving clerks, order preparation clerks, order distribution clerks, cancel desk clerks, invoice lookup clerks, and returns section records clerks, maintenance employees and maintenance clerks, Accounting deposit clerks, computer operators, Data Processing operations clerks, and Marketing Department merchandise inspectors employed by the Company at its Hickory Street and Bell Building, Warren, Pennsylvania, and Irvine, Pennsylvania, facilities; excluding other Marketing Department employees, other Financial, Employee, Plant Services Department employees, computer programmers, office clerical employees, confidential employees, seasonal employees, janitor/watchmen and other guards, professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The tally of ballots showed that of approximately 1425 eligible voters, 231 voted for the Union, 1049 voted against the Union, and there were 3 void ballots. The 81 challenged ballots were insufficient in number to affect the results of the election. The Union filed timely objections to the conduct of the election, numbered 1 through 17, but subsequently withdrew Objection 11 (alleged omission of names of employees from the voter eligibility list). On August 3, 1982, the Regional Director issued his order directing hearing on objections and notice of hearing finding that the objections raised "substantial and material issues with respect to the election," which warranted a formal hearing, and that "some of the issues involved in these objections" were encompassed by the outstanding unfair labor practice complaint. The Regional Director did not otherwise make specific findings concerning the objections, although, as will be discussed, the objections were so broadly worded as to encompass virtually every form of potentially objectionable conduct, including the subject matter of allegations on which the Regional Director and/or the General Counsel declined to proceed by way of unfair labor practice complaint. The Regional Director ordered that the unfair labor practice and representation cases be consolidated for the purposes of hearing, ruling, and decision by an administrative law judge, and that after decision by an administrative law judge, the representation case be transferred to and continued before the Board.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to participate, to present relevant evidence, to argue orally, and to file briefs. On the entire record in this case,[1] and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and of the Company's plant premises, and having considered the briefs submitted by the General Counsel, the Union, and the Company, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

The Company, a Delaware corporation with its principal offices at Warren, Pennsylvania, is engaged in the mail order retail sale of merchandise, primarily clothing.[2] The Company maintains plants at Warren and Irvine, Pennsylvania, and it is these facilities that are involved in the present proceeding. The Company's Warren plant, where the executive offices are located, is principally engaged in the processing of orders and distribution of sales and advertising literature. The Irvine plant, known as the Irvine Distribution Center (IDC), is essentially a warehouse operation that is engaged in the storage, packing, shipping, inspection, and processing of returns of merchandise. In the operation of its business, the Company annually derives gross revenues in excess of $500,000, and annually ships from its Pennsylvania facilities merchandise valued in excess of $5000 directly to points outside of Pennsylvania. I find, as the Company admits, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. AN OVERVIEW OF THE CASE AND THE ISSUES PRESENTED

In light of some of the issues presented in this case, it is necessary at the outset to review the context in which the alleged unfair labor practices and objectionable conduct occurred. In February 1980 the Union commenced an organizational compaign among the Company's employees. During the period from February 1980 through June 1981, there were, within the unit eventually found appropriate by the Regional Director, approximately 917 employees at Warren and approximately 538 employees at the Irvine Distribution Center, which is located about 7 miles from the Warren plant. On October 15, 1980,[3] the Union filed its initial charge in Case 6–CA–13933, alleging that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, inter alia, by discriminatorily transferring union adherents Freeda Carr and Nancy Race from the housewares department to less desirable work in the returns department, thereby causing them to quit (i.e., constructively discharging them). The charge was served on the Company on October 16. By letter dated January 30, the Regional Director informed the parties that he was declining to proceed on several aspects of the charge, including the matter of Carr and Race. By letter dated January 29, 1982, the General Counsel sustained the Regional Director's refusal to proceed on the allegation of constructive discharge, but concluded that a hearing was warranted insofar as the charge alleged that the Company unlawfully refused to reinstate Carr and Race when they offered to return to work in the returns departments. However, the Regional Director declined to proceed on an allegation (in Case 6–CA–14403) that the Company unlawfully refused to rehire Carr as a clerk-typist on February 16, 1981, and this determination was sustained on appeal to the General Counsel.

In the meantime, on October 27, 1980, the Union filed a petition for an election (Case 6–RC–8874) among the merchandise handlers and maintenance employees at IDC (i.e., a unit substantially comprising the Irvine, but not the Warren, plant). The Regional Director determined that a larger unit would be appropriate. The Union then requested leave to amend the petition to define a substantially larger unit, but the request was denied because the Company indicated that it was willing to proceed to an election in the original petitioned-for unit. At this point, the Union requested leave to withdraw its entire petition, and such leave was granted on December 22. On January 2 the Union filed its second (and present) election petition. This time, the Union sought a unit at both plants, comprising about 900 employees, but still proposed to exclude the order handling department, which contained a substantial number of the Warren employees. The Union contended that they were office clericals. A hearing was held beginning on February 4, 1981. On May 5 the Regional Director issued a Decision and Direction of Election, finding that the order handlers were properly included in an appropriate unit, and directing an election, contingent on the Union making an adequate showing of interest in the appropriate unit. The Union indicated that it was willing to proceed to an election in any unit found appropriate, and notwithstanding its pending unfair labor practice charges. As indicated, the Union lost the election that was held on June 9.

The complaints in this case contain some 44 subparagraphs, each alleging separate acts of unfair labor practice conduct. The complaint allegations may be grouped into four general categories. The first, and most numerous group consists of alleged acts of intimidation, coercion, and interference directed against employee union adherents (e.g., discriminatory restrictions on union solicitation and distribution, discriminatory restrictions on union adherents, threats, interrogation, disciplinary warnings, surveillance, harassment, and ostracizing and segregating union adherents). As will be discussed, many of these allegations involve supervisory surveillance and restrictions on employees at times when the employees were engaged at work or normally expected to be engaged at work. The second category involves the alleged unlawful exclusion of union organizers from the IDC premises, and the Company's alleged unlawful refusal to afford the Union an opportunity to respond to statements made to employees by the Company in captive audience meetings. The Union contends that in any event, such access is warranted as a remedy for the Company's alleged unfair labor practices. The third category involves alleged threats and misrepresentations contained in speeches or other statements by company officials and supervisors. The fourth category consists of the Company's alleged discriminatory refusal to rehire and/or recommend for rehire eight employees who quit and subsequently reapplied for employment, because they supported the Union, filed charges, and/or were subpoenaed to testify for the Union in the representation proceeding. The eight employees are Freeda Carr and Nancy Race, who were named in the original consolidated complaint, and Pamela Damon, Rhonda Gross, Barbara Morgan, Debra Nuhfer, Floyd Monticue, and Rebecca Stuart Walton, who were subsequently named in the complaint in Case 6–CA–15995. The complaint does not allege that any employee was discriminatorily terminated, either constructively or otherwise. The Union contends that by way of remedy for the alleged unfair labor practices, the Company should be ordered to bargain with the Union; or in the alternative, that a rerun election should be held with the Union given access to nonworking areas, equal time at captive audience meetings, an opportunity for preelection speeches, a list of employees' addresses and telephone numbers, and reimbursement for the Union's organizational expenses.[4]

[2] The Company maintains retail outlets for direct sales at Warren, Starbrick, and Erie, Pennsylvania. However, the vast majority of the Company's sales are processed by mail order.

[3] All dates are for the period from July 1, 1980, through June 30, 1981, unless otherwise indicated.

With respect to the election proceeding, the Union contends that the critical period for determining objectionable conduct should begin with the filing of the first election petition on October 27. I agree. In Monroe Tube Co., 220 NLRB 302 (1975), revd. on other grounds 545 F.2d 1320 (2d Cir. 1976), involving a similar situation, the Board held that "where the first [withdrawn] petition was filed a short time prior to the filing of the second petition and a petition was on file at the time that unlawful conduct took place, we deem it proper to begin the critical period at the filing of the first petition and to evaluate conduct occurring from that date until the election." (220 NLRB at 305.) The present case meets both conditions set forth in Monroe Tube. The first petition was filed shortly before the second, during the same organizational campaign, and remained on file until December 22. There is no allegation of objectionable conduct during the brief hiatus between December 22 and January 2, when the second petition was filed. However, the Company is alleged to have engaged in objectionable conduct during the period when the first petition was on file. Therefore Monroe Tube is applicable. With regard to the substance of the objections, I have (as I indicated at the hearing) declined to consider any grounds for objection that, if meritorious, would also constitute unfair labor practice conduct, but on which the Regional Director (unless reversed by the General Counsel) declined to proceed by way of complaint. See Times Square Stores Corp., 79 NLRB 361, 365 (1948); Martinolich Ship Repair Co., 111 NLRB 761, 762 (1955). As the Board pointed out in Martinolich: "Under established practice, the Board dismisses pro forma objections to an election which are mere reiterations of unfair labor practice charges which have been dismissed." Moreover, sound administrative practice requires that the order directing hearing on objections be interpreted in a manner that is consistent with the disposition of the unfair labor practice charges. It makes no sense to interpret the order as one directing a hearing on matters on which the Regional Director, with the approval of the General Counsel, declined to proceed by way of complaint. The Regional Director who issued the order was not the same individual who initially passed on the unfair labor practice charges. However, the Regional Director is not simply an individual, it is an office, and the actions of one Regional Director should be interpreted in a manner that is consistent with the actions of his predecessor, particularly when the earlier actions have been sustained by the General Counsel.

[4] At the hearing, the Union also requested reimbursement for its costs incurred in connection with the present unfair labor practice litigation. However, in its brief (Br. 15, 19), the Union abandoned this request.

IV. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES AND OBJECTIONS TO THE CONDUCT OF THE ELECTION

A. Alleged Violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act prior to October 27, 1980

1. Threats and interrogation by Nick Pollock

Nick Pollock was, at all times material, receiving dock crew chief at IDC. He directed the work of unloading deliveries, and assigned warehouse employees to such work as needed. Pollock reported to the supervisor of the warehouse, who in turn reported to John Carter, vice president in charge of merchandising, who was in overall charge at IDC. In its answer to the consolidated complaint, the Company initially denied that Pollock was a supervisor. However, during the hearing the Company admitted that Pollock was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Pollock was still in the Company's employ at the time of the present hearing.

Alan LaCava was a forklift operator in the warehouse. Pollock was not LaCava's immediate supervisor. However, LaCava was required to obey Pollock's work orders. LaCava was one of the first union activists. On February 1, 1980, the Union informed the Company by mailgram that LaCava was a member of its employee organizing committee. LaCava testified that he distributed union literature in the plant cafeteria and in front of the plant after work, and that he brought the literature to the plant in his lunch bag. LaCava made no effort to conceal his union activity, and like other prounion employees, he wore a union T-shirt in the plant. Crew Chief Pollock knew that LaCava was a union adherent. LaCava testified that on several occasions early in the organizing campaign, Pollock asked him whether he had union literature in his bag. LaCava would answer that he did. LaCava further testified that on several occasions early in the campaign, when Pollock observed employees in conversation, he would ask whether they were having a union meeting, or while cupping his ear, comment that "I'm not supposed to be listening." LaCava's testimony does not indicate that the employees were either at work or expected to be at work during these conversations. According to LaCava, the employees "laughed off" these incidents. On direct examination, LaCava also testified that in the spring of 1980, Pollock told him that "Mr. Blair" (i.e., Company President Jack Blair) told him that if the Union ever came in to New Process he would shut the doors. However, in his investigatory affidavit to the Regional Office, LaCava testified that Pollock made such a statement to him in May 1979, during the course of another organizational campaign by a different union. No other witnesses testified concerning these incidents. In particular, Crew Chief Pollock was not presented as a witness. Company witnesses testified without contradiction that President Blair has not been at IDC since 1973. The General Counsel presented in evidence a photograph of the Company's 25-year club, taken in the summer of 1980, showing Pollock standing next to Blair. No other evidence was presented that would indicate what if any other contact Pollock might have had with Blair.

In light of LaCava's affidavit, I find that the alleged threat of plant closure, if made at all, was made in May 1979. Therefore, the pertinent allegation of the complaint is precluded by the time limitation of Section 10(b) of the Act, and for this reason, I am recommending that paragraph 7(a) of the complaint be dismissed. The cutoff date for 10(b) purposes is April 16, 1980. LaCava's references to a timeframe early in the campaign could have referred to times after April 16, 1980. The time limitation of Section 10(b) is an affirmative defense, and the respondent has the burden at least of coming forward with evidence to establish that defense. Here, the Company did not present evidence that would demonstrate that the alleged interrogation either did not or could not have taken place on or after April 16, 1980. Therefore, the alleged interrogation is properly before me for consideration on its merits. I credit the uncontroverted testimony of LaCava. I find, on consideration of such testimony, that the Company, by Pollock, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by interrogating LaCava and his fellow employees concerning their actual or ostensible union activities. Pollock had no legitimate reason for questioning the employees, and he did not give them any assurance against reprisal. Moreover, as will be discussed, the interrogation was followed by other unlawful conduct. LaCava's lunch bag was his personal property. LaCava did not testify that he regarded Pollock's repeated questioning in this regard as a joke. Indeed, it is evident from LaCava's testimony that he felt obligated to answer Pollock's question. Concerning the ostensible "union meeting," Pollock's repeated questioning was addressed to several employees. While some of the employees may have regarded the questioning as funny, it does not follow that every employee who heard Pollock would feel the same way. Therefore, Pollock's questioning of the employees constituted unlawful interrogation.

2. Threats of abuse and physical abuse by maintenance supervisors

During the summer of 1980, Randy McWilliams and Charles Martin were supervisors of mechanics at the Warren plant. McWilliams subsequently quit his job. Martin was discharged in November 1980, allegedly for falsifying timecards for employees.[5] Vivian Newton, Barbara Wilson, Diane Savugot, and Barbara Morgan worked on the second shift (which normally operated from 5:30 to 10:30 p.m.) in the mailing department at Warren. All four joined the Union, became members of the organizing committee, and wore union T-shirts at work. Newton, Wilson, and Savugot testified without contradiction concerning incidents involving Martin and McWilliams, which occurred about August 1980. Newton testified that when Martin saw her wearing a union T-shirt, he said that they were told that if they saw any union literature or anything around they were to rip it up, and he made a gesture as if to rip her shirt. Newton further testified that she did not take Martin seriously. Wilson and Savugot testified in sum that on several occasions McWilliams would wipe his greasy hands on their T-shirts, leaving marks, that he did the same to Morgan, and that he did this in the presence of other employees. Management learned of these actions by McWilliams, but he was not disciplined. The employees did not complain directly to the Company. However, they did complain to the Union, which protested to the Company on their behalf.

I credit the uncontroverted testimony of Newton, Wilson, and Savugot. Newton may not have believed that Martin would actually tear her shirt. However, Newton could reasonably believe that the Company intended to destroy or remove union literature or paraphernalia. As will be discussed, there is additional evidence that the Company did engage in such conduct. I find that the Company, by Martin, interfered with employee rights in violation of Section 8(a)(1), by threatening to destroy union literature or paraphernalia whenever and wherever it was found. I further find that Martin's statement may properly be considered as evidence with respect to other allegations, discussed below. It is immaterial that Martin was subsequently discharged, or that he may have been personally sympathetic to the Union. Martin was a supervisor who was purporting to inform an employee concerning company policy; and he was not discharged because of what he told Newton.[6] I further find that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) by engaging in physical abuse of union adherents, when Supervisor McWilliams repeatedly wiped his greasy hands on the union T-shirts of female employees. See and compare General Electric Co., 255 NLRB 673, 688 (1981). It is immaterial that the employees did not complain directly to their supervisors. As indicated, the employees complained to the Union, which protested on their behalf. It is evident that the employees took McWilliams' conduct seriously.

[5] The Union subsequently filed an unfair labor practice charge alleging that Martin was discharged in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act. The Regional Director declined to proceed on the charge because of his supervisory status, and also because of insufficient evidence of unlawful motivation.

[6] The complaint also alleges (par. 7(i)) that about October 1980, Supervisor Rick Arthur threatened employees with unspecified reprisals if they wore union T-shirts. No evidence was presented in support of this allegation. Therefore, I am recommending that the allegation be dismissed.

3. Isolating and ostracizing union adherents, related threats, and stricter work conditions

During the summer of 1980, Jerry Selini was stock department supervisor at IDC. Subsequently Selini replaced Rick Arthur as supervisor of the housewares department. Alan LaCava testified that on a couple of occasions, Selini told him that "we had better watch ourselves because the supervisors were watching us." LaCava further testified that Selini also told him, in August, that the supervisors were not to associate with forklift operators Jerry Stewart and Jeff Atkins because they wore union T-shirts. According to LaCava, until that time Stewart and Atkins regularly played whiffle ball at the lunchbreak with four supervisors (Selini, Ken Bastow, Kerry Gern, and Jim Hagg). However, the supervisors failed to show up for the game that day, and there were no more whiffle ball games. Stewart and Atkins were not presented as witnesses, and LaCava was the only General Counsel witness to testify concerning this matter. Selini, who was presented as a company witness, categorically denied saying that supervisors could not associate with prounion employees or that the employees should be careful because supervisors were watching them. However, Selini testified that in the fall of 1980, he asked LaCava "if he wasn't concerned what some other people might think of what he was doing," referring to LaCava's union activity. Selini testified that he began playing whiffle ball with Stewart and Atkins in the fall of 1980, stopped in late November when the weather got bad, resumed in 1981, and continued through the time of the election. Selini testified that he never discussed the matter with Vice President Carter. Carter testified that he never instructed supervisors not to associate with prounion employees. However, Carter and Stock Replenishment Supervisor Randall Chase testified in sum that Chase told Carter that he did not wish to be seen playing whiffle ball with employees wearing union T-shirts, that Carter told him that it was on his own time, and therefore his own decision, and that thereafter, without saying anything to the employees, he stopped playing whiffle ball with Stewart and Atkins. According to Chase, four other supervisors stopped playing whiffle ball for the same reason.

I credit the testimony of Supervisor Selini, who impressed me as a generally credible witness. In contrast, LaCava sometimes displayed a tendency to accommodate his version of the events to the needs of the present litigation. It is also evident that LaCava, who was not himself one of the whiffle ball players, did not have accurate knowledge of the course of those games. Nevertheless the General Counsel did not call Stewart and Atkins, the employees who were involved in the games, as witnesses. Therefore, I find that Selini did not tell LaCava that the employees should watch themselves because the supervisors were watching them, or that the supervisors could not associate with prounion employees. However, on the basis of Selini's testimony, I find that the Company by Selini violated Section 8(a)(1) by asking LaCava if he was concerned what some other people might think of his union activity. Selini did not indicate that he was referring only to the attitude of other employees. Therefore, LaCava could reasonably infer that Selini was conveying a message that LaCava was incurring the displeasure of management by actively supporting the Union. Such statements carry with them the implied threat of employer reprisal, and constitute unwarranted and unlawful interference with Section 7 rights. See and compare Wilker Bros. Co., 236 NLRB 1371, 1372 (1978), enfd. in pertinent part 652 F.2d 660 (6th Cir. 1981); Appletree Chevrolet, 237 NLRB 867, 872–873 (1978), enfd. in pertinent part 608 F.2d 988 (4th Cir. 1979); Goshen Litho, Inc., 199 NLRB 769, 772 (1972). I further find, on the basis of the credited testimony of the company witnesses, that the Company did not violate the Act when certain of its supervisors personally decided that they did not wish to play whiffle ball with employees who wore union T-shirts. This was personal activity in which the supervisors participated on their own free time. The supervisors did not act on behalf of the Company either when they played whiffle ball or when they ceased playing whiffle ball. Moreover, there is no credible evidence that the employees had reason to believe that the supervisors were acting pursuant to company instructions or policy. For these reasons, I also reject the Union's alternative theory that the Company acted unlawfully because the supervisors avoided associating with prounion employees; but later demonstrated common cause with antiunion employees. Therefore, I am recommending that paragraphs 7(d) and 10(a) of the consolidated complaint be dismissed.

The complaint alleges (par. 9(a)) that about August 1980, at Warren, the Company segregated machine operators based on the wearing of union T-shirts. Frances Work was employed as a Nester machine operator in the mailing department. Fred Rulander was her immediate supervisor. The employees were assigned in teams of three, with each team operating two machines. Work testified that her normal team included, besides herself, Joan Fredericks and Carol Anderson. Union meetings were normally held on Tuesday evenings, at the Holiday Inn in Warren. Work testified that on Tuesdays, some employees, including herself and Fredericks but not Anderson, wore union T-shirts to work. Work testified that on these occasions, Anderson would be replaced on the team by Joan Abbey who wore a union T-shirt, and that this pattern continued until one of them stopped wearing a union T-shirt, whereupon Anderson remained on the team regardless of whether the others wore union T-shirts. Barbara Wilson and Diane Savugot, who as indicated, worked in the mailing department, testified concerning a similar pattern in their area. Jane Guthrie was their immediate supervisor. Wilson and Savugot testified, in sum, that beginning in August, employees wearing union T-shirts invariably found themselves all working in the same area, which was located near the supervisors' office. According to Wilson and Savugot, it seemed that whenever they looked up from their work, a supervisor would be staring at them. Joanne McMeans, another mailing department employee, testified that after she began distributing union literature in July, Supervisors Pauline Stec and Helen Littlefield would constantly stare at her, and would follow her to the bathroom and to the water fountain. Barbara Wilson testified that Assistant Supervisor Lorraine Roblesky would follow her to the restroom.

Assistant Vice President for Mailing George Stark, who was in overall charge of the mailing department, testified as a company witness. Stark denied that the Company intentionally segregated employees who wore union T-shirts, but he admitted that in fact such isolation took place about August 1980. Stark testified that the Company had a practice of honoring employee requests to work or not to work with other specific employees. According to Stark, in August 1980 some employees requested of their supervisors (Stec, Littlefield, and Jane Guthrie) that they not be assigned to work with employees who were "haranging them or whatever; talking to them constantly about their beliefs." Stark testified that eventually Stec complained to him that there were so many such requests that it was causing production problems, and she asked what she should do. According to Stark, he said that the Company could not have such production problems, and that she should tell the employees to work out their personal problems themselves. Stark testified that thereafter Stec made assignments on the basis of production efficiency. However, Stark admitted that the union adherents were assigned to an area near Steck's office. The credibility of Stark's explanation is undermined by the fact that it is substantially based on his own hearsay testimony. The Company failed to produce as witnesses any of the supervisors who were directly involved, or any of the employees who allegedly requested that they not be assigned to work with union adherents. (At the time of the present hearing, Littlefield, Guthrie, and Rulander were still employed as supervisors and Stec was working as a machine operator.) Moreover, the uncontroverted testimony of Frances Work demonstrated a pattern of work assignment that was obviously intentional on the part of management, and did not come about as the result of employee requests. Additionally, as has been and will be discussed, other evidence indicates a policy on the part of management to be extremely solicitous of complaints of alleged harassment by union adherents, while tolerating harassment of union adherents by supervisors and antiunion employees. I do not credit Stark's explanation. I find in light of the present and other evidence that will be discussed, that the Company intentionally segregated union adherents at their workplace in order to limit communication between active union adherents and other employees, create a feeling of isolation among the union adherents, and create antagonism between the union adherents and their fellow employees. The Company thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Lowery Trucking Co., 200 NLRB 672, 677 (1972); Daylight Grocery Co., 147 NLRB 733, 738 (1964), enfd. 345 F.2d 239 (5th Cir. 1965). The matter of alleged surveillance will be deferred at this point, pending discussion of other evidence concerning surveillance.

The consolidated complaint alleges (pars. 8(e), 9(b), and 9(c)), that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) by discriminatorily rescinding previously granted permission to employees to read books when work was slow, and violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by requiring Vivian Newton to sit at a table behind materials that blocked the view of the machines that other employees were operating, and by forbidding Newton permission to help other machine operators as she had done in the past. The first allegation also involved Newton. Newton's job was to stock the machines that insert advertising literature into mailing envelopes. Newton testified that Night Shift Mailing Supervisor William Moore told her that if she had nothing to do, she could bring a book to read, and she did. However, according to Newton, Moore told her in September that she could not do this anymore because some employees were complaining. Newton testified that some machine operators were given the same admonition, but continued to read anyway unless they were caught. On cross-examination, Newton admitted that in September she was reading a book at work for 3 consecutive days, when Moore asked (apparently sarcastically) whether it had any interesting parts. On the fourth day, Moore told her to stop. Newton answered that if he did not like it he should find her some work. Moore said that he would check with another supervisor. Newton testified that thereafter she continued to read a book for a few minutes at a time, and that she did so on the work floor. However, on her earlier direct testimony, Newton testified that the day after Moore told her to stop reading, he told her to sit at a certain table when she was not working. Newton testified at one point that the table faced a wall, and at another point (and in her affidavit) that there were rolls of material in front of the table that blocked her view of the machines. Newton testified that previously she was told that she could sit at the table if she wanted. However, in her investigatory affidavit, Newton stated that about October 16 (when she was still wearing a union T-shirt), she asked Moore if she could sit in the aisle in order to see the machines, and he answered that he did not care where she sat. Newton further testified that in mid-September, Moore told her that she could help machine operators, and that she did so for 2 days, but that on the third day Moore told her to stop. According to Newton, Moore told her about a week later that he stopped her because of complaints that she was helping only certain employees. Newton testified that this was not true, but she admitted that she helped three specific individuals because in her opinion, they needed help.

Supervisor Moore testified that in the fall of 1980, he told Newton that she was talking and visiting too much. According to Moore, he told her that if she had nothing to do, she could use an area in the rear of the department, but he did not require her to sit there. Moore testified that he saw her spending a lot of time talking to operators at their machines. According to Moore, he gave Newton permission to read a book but told her not to make a habit of it. However, that evening he saw her sitting on a skid, reading her book, in an area where other operators were working. He told her that she should not just sit there reading. Moore testified that on another occasion he told Newton that she could help other employees, but that she should help eqfially. According to Moore, he said this because she was spending too much time at one machine. However, Assistant Vice President Stark told him that she could not do any work other than her own unless she volunteered to do such work, and if she was just going to visit the operators, he would rather that she not help at all.

The General Counsel contends (Br. 29) that the alleged unlawful conduct was part of a campaign to isolate prominent union supporters. As has been and will be discussed, there is evidence that the Company did unlawfully seek to restrict communication between union activists and their fellow employees, and did engage in discriminatory action against Newton in particular. Nevertheless, even on the basis of Newton's testimony (including the contradictions therein), and the testimony of operator Joanne McMeans, who partially corroborated the testimony of Newton, it is difficult to find discriminatory action based on the present three allegations. Newton enjoyed the privilege of reading a book when she was not busy (i.e., a privilege that was not available to other employees) and she was given this privilege during the union campaign, when her union sympathies were known to management. Nevertheless Moore said nothing to her until it became evident, as it would to a reasonably minded supervisor, that she was possibly abusing the privilege. Newton was a capable employee who performed her job well, and because of this and the nature of her regular work, there were periods of time when she had nothing to do. However, the evidence fails to indicate that the Company had a policy of permitting employees to sit around reading books in the presence of other employees who were working at their machines. Moore did not require Newton to sit in the rear area at all times when she was not working. However, Newton evidently understood that the Company preferred that she do so rather than read books on the work floor or talk to operators who were working at their machines. Such a preference cannot be viewed as discriminatory unless the workplace is viewed as a public library or social center. I do not credit the testimony of Newton that she could not see the machines from the rear table. If so, she would not be able to know when the machines needed stocking. However, Newton never claimed that this was a problem. As for helping other operators, it is evident on the basis of Newton's own testimony that she was exercising selectivity in this regard. Under the circumstances, it is reasonable to expect that an employer would wish to exercise some control over the work performed by its employees. By reason of the nature of her work, Newton had ample opportunity to go from one machine operator to another during the course of her working day. Whether the Company discriminatorily prohibited her from talking to other employees is a matter that will be taken up at a later point in this decision. However, with respect to the present allegations, I find that the evidence is insufficient to show that the Company discriminatorily altered Newton's working conditions, and therefore I am recommending that the pertinent allegations of the complaint be dismissed.

4. Surveillance

Union organizer Daniel Glather testified that from June to September 1980, he distributed union literature to employees on the public sidewalk ajoining the Warren plant, and that while engaged in such activity, he saw Supervisor Pauline Stec come out of the plant with a notebook and pencil, watch him, and write on the pad. Glather's testimony was uncontroverted. I find nothing inherently incredible in his testimony. The Company correctly points out (Br. 28) that Stec had no apparent reason to do this for the purpose of obtaining information. In light of the Company's outspoken opposition to unionization, and its unlawful actions, some of which involved Stec, I find that Stec engaged in this activity in order to intimidate employees and thereby discourage them from receiving union literature. Therefore, the present situation is distinguishable from those cases in which the Board found that an employer did not violate the Act by observing union activity that was conducted in full public view outside the employer's premises, where the employer did nothing out of the ordinary. I credit Glather, and I find that the Company, by Stec, violated Section 8(a)(1) by engaging in surveillance of employee union activity.

The consolidated complaint alleges (par. 8(c)) that from the end of July through October 1980, the Company by its supervisors violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by scrutinizing union adherents more closely as they worked, following them around the plant and engaging in surveillance of the employees' union activities. The complaint also alleges (par. 7(m)) that about November 1980 the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) by increasing supervision on the night shift at Warren in order to engage in surveillance of union activity. The testimony of both the General Counsel and company witnesses indicates that there was increased supervision at Warren, but that the Company began this practice well before November. Therefore, I am considering both allegations under the heading of alleged unfair labor practices prior to the critical period. As previously discussed, employees Wilson, Savugot, and McMeans testified that Supervisors Stec, Littlefield, and Roblesky began a practice of constantly staring at them or following them. As a general rule, an employer may lawfully engage in surveillance of its employees at their work stations. Working time is for work, and the employer has the right to observe their employee's work or to determine whether they are performing that work. However, the employer cannot engage in such surveillance for unlawful reasons (e.g., in reprisal for the employee's union activities or for the purpose of obtaining pretextual grounds for disciplining the employee in reprisal for such union activities). See Brown & Root-Northrup, 174 NLRB 1048, 1058 (1969). As indicated, I have credited the testimony of the employees. I find in light of the credited evidence that the supervisors had no legitimate reason for closely scrutinizing the work and actions of the union adherents. Rather, the supervisors' conduct was motivated by the same considerations that led the Company to segregate prounion employees and place them in close proximity to the supervisors' office. I find that the Company, by its Warren supervisors, scrutinized openly prounion employees more closely as part of a campaign to isolate and harass the employees, and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by imposing more onerous and rigorous terms of employment on them.

Union activists Joan Hockenberry and Alan LaCava testified to a similar pattern of employer conduct at IDC, principally involving Assistant Plant Manager Carl Nelson and Vice President Carter. Hockenberry testified that one day in September, she began wearing a shirt with "Be wise—let's organize" on the back. Hockenberry testified that beginning about an hour later, a number of supervisors, including Carter and Nelson, individually passed by her work station and observed her. Hockenberry further testified that when she would use the pay phone or go to the cigarette machine, Nelson would stand nearby. LaCava testified that early in the campaign, when he would distribute union literature in front of the IDC facility, Carter and Nelson would stand in the cafeteria window and watch him. LaCava further testified that during this period Carter would frequently stand and stare at him at work. Nelson, in his testimony, denied that he engaged in surveillance of union activity or that he varied his routine during the organizational campaign. As indicated, substantially uncontroverted testimony indicates that at Warren, supervisors engaged in a campaign of conspicuously observing prounion employees, and of observing union distribution outside the plant. In light of this evidence, it is more likely than not that the Company engaged in the same kind of activity at IDC. I credit the testimony of Hockenberry and LaCava. I find that the Company, by its supervisors, engaged in a campaign of harassment against Hockenberry and LaCava by conspicuously and closely observing them at work. The Company thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) at IDC.[7] However, I find that Carter and Nelson did not act unlawfully by watching LaCava when he distributed literature in front of the plant, as their actions were not characterized by behavior that was "out of the ordinary." Metal Industries, 251 NLRB 1523 (1980).

It is undisputed that beginning some time during the period from July through September 1980, the Company increased the amount of supervision on the night shift at Warren. However, the Company's motivation for doing this is disputed. Assistant Vice President Stark testified that the Company was receiving complaints from the female employees about drinking and use of marijuana among mechanics on the night shift. According to Stark, he suggested to his then supervisor, Richard Kerven (who has since retired), that salaried supervisors, who normally worked days, should on a rotating basis return at night in order to help the night-shift supervisors. Kerven agreed, and the practice was instituted. According to Stark, this practice was still in effect at the time of the present hearing. Stark testified that as a result of the increased supervision, the Company learned that Mechanic Supervisor Martin was permitting mechanics to go home early, and consequently discharged him. Stark denied that supervision was increased for the purpose of spying on union activity. Vivian Newton, Barbara Wilson, and Diane Savugot testified, in sum, that the additional supervisors usually remained until 8 p.m., and did not appear to do anything except stare at the operators and talk to other supervisors.

I do not credit Stark's explanation. According to Stark, the problems developed because there were only two supervisors on the night shift. However, there were, in fact, at least five. Additionaliy, Stark did not pinpoint any alleged problems except those involving the mechanics. Therefore, it would seem that the problems could be resolved by adding another mechanic supervisor. Instead, the Company used some eight or nine additional supervisors, who covered the entire night-shift operation, and spent much of their time staring at the operators. The timing of this arrangement also coincided with other company actions, including surveillance, which were designed to harass and intimidate employees and thereby discourage them from engaging in union activity. I find that the Company increased supervision on the night shift at Warren for the same reason, and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. Restrictions on employee union solicitation and distribution and employee conversation and movement

a. Company policy and practice

The consolidated complaint, as amended, alleges that since about September 1980, the Company discriminatorily instituted, maintained, and enforced a policy prohibiting union solicitation, prohibiting employees from talking about the Union, and prohibiting employees from conducting union business on company time. The Company does not have any written rule or policy that expressly restricts talking, solicitation, or distribution on company time or premises. However, the employee handbook, which has been in effect since 1979 and is distributed to each employee, does refer to "visiting." The handbook instructs the employees as follows:

> DON'T WASTE OTHER PEOPLE'S TIME
> In other words, don't visit with your neighbors. Visiting not only stops your production but also the work of others. Visiting is a highly contagious disease. Don't start it. Non-business "visiting" during working hours can affect your advancement and even your job itself.

Assistant Vice President for Personnel Richard Zimmerman testified, in sum, that the term "visiting" covers ex-

[7] This is one of several allegations in the present case involving Hockenberry, who was the leading union activist at IDC. By letter dated January 19, 1982, the Acting Regional Director declined to proceed on certain aspects of the charge in Case 6–CA–14697, including the Union's contention that Hockenberry was constructively suspended from employment by virtue of the Company's harassment and attempt to restrict her union activity. The Acting Regional Director administratively determined that Hockenberry did not report to work for personal reasons and that "Hockenberry denies that the Employer engaged in such harassment or that she was instructed by the Employer to curtail her union activities." On appeal, the General Counsel sustained the Regional Director's action. The charge, which was filed on July 7, 1981, alleged that the Company violated Sec. 8(a)(1) "[o]n or about June 4, 1981 and at other times immediately preceeding and thereafter." However, the present allegations involving Hockenberry occurred well before June 4, 1981. Therefore the partial dismissal of Case 6–CA–14697 does not preclude litigation of the allegations of the consolidated complaint involving Hockenberry, and the Acting Regional Director's letter cannot be viewed as an administrative determination that Hockenberry made statements that were inconsistent with the present allegations.

cessive talking on the job, and possibly also solicitation. According to Zimmerman, the Company does not prohibit talking on the job. However, if others are busy, the employees should "hold down on the talking." Otherwise the talking becomes "excessive visiting," and the employee will be so informed. Zimmerman testified that the Company does not interfere with talking unless it is excessive or interferes with production. With respect to solicitation, Zimmerman testified that the Company's policy depends on the type of solicitation involved. The first type consists of collections on behalf of an employee or his or her family by reason of death, illness, or retirement. The second type consists of commercial or any other form of solicitation by company personnel (e.g., sale of cosmetics or raffle tickets and also includes union solicitation). According to Zimmerman, the first type of solicitation does not take much time and normally consists only of passing an envelope from one employee to another. However, Zimmerman admitted that it might be necessary for the solicitor to explain the purpose of the solicitation, and for employees to get money from their purses (which may be kept on the work floor). Zimmerman testified that the second type is permitted only before and after work and during breaks and lunch periods. According to Zimmerman, the Company's policies are enforced by its supervisors, persistent violations will result first in oral, and then in a series of written warnings, and excessive visitation will be noted on an employee's annual evaluation.

Zimmerman's testimony concerning the Company's alleged practices was contradicted by employee witnesses for the General Counsel. Employees Freeda Carr, Nancy Race, Cindy Dorotics Rossman, Donna Fehlman, Vivian Newton, and Barbara Wilson testified in sum that commercial solicitation was conducted on working time. Race testified that Supervisor Wilbur Mineweiser solicited orders for Christmas decorations from employees who were engaged at work, and Carr testified that Supervisor Randy Chase sold raffle tickets to employees at work. Mineweiser was not presented as a witness, and Chase, although presented as a company witness, did not deny Carr's testimony. I credit the testimony of the employees. I find in light of Zimmerman's testimony concerning the Company's alleged policy, and the testimony of the employees concerning its actual practices, that the Company instituted and maintained a policy that discriminatorily restricted union solicitation while permitting various forms of commercial, charitable, and other solicitation. The Company thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. St. Vincent's Hospital, 265 NLRB 38, 40 (1982). The policy as defined by Zimmerman was further discriminatory in that the policy could be interpreted as permitting on-the-job conversations between employees, while prohibiting such conversations concerning the Union, on the grounds that they constituted "solicitation" on behalf of the Union. As will be discussed, the evidence further indicates that the Company in fact enforced its policies in a discriminatory manner, by prohibiting various forms of employee expression on behalf of the Union, while permitting other comparable forms of expression, including opposition to the Union.

b. Restrictions on employee conversation and movement

The consolidated complaint alleges (par. 8(a)) that around July 1980, Supervisors Pauline Stec and Rick Arthur unlawfully prohibited employee Vivian Newton from talking to machine operators and other employees. Newton testified that in September, Stec told her in the presence of two other employees who were helping her to stock the machines, that she should not "talk to the operators" or "bother the operators." According to Newton, one of her helpers (Candy Remey) was also talking to an operator, but Stec said nothing to Remey. However, in her investigatory affidavit Newton said that Stec told her not to talk to the operators because it was slowing up production. Newton was the only witness to testify concerning this alleged incident. I am not persuaded that the General Counsel has made out a case of union-related discrimination on the basis of this incident. Newton's testimony did not indicate that she was talking about the Union, or that Stec had reason to believe that she was discussing the Union. Newton did not indicate whether the operator or operators were actually engaged in production. Therefore it is possible that Stec was in fact concerned that Newton's conversation was affecting production work. However, Newton's uncontroverted testimony concerning another incident involving Stec presents a different situation. Newton testified that one day in July, she was in the breakroom with two other employees during the 5-minute cleanup period at the end of the work shift. Supervisor Stec came into the breakroom and asked one of the employees for his union card, which he was holding and apparently had just signed. Newton said that he was allowed to sign the card. Stec replied that they were not allowed to sign anything between 5:30 and 10:30 p.m., but she would check with her superior. Stec did not confiscate the card, but she never withdrew her statement. The cleanup period was a time when the employees were not expected to be at work, and indeed, was a form of breaktime. I find that the Company, by Stec, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by telling the employees that they were not permitted to engage in union activity at times when they were properly not engaged in their work tasks.

Employee Frances Work testified without contradiction or corroboration that after she began wearing a union T-shirt, Supervisor Rulander told her that the operators were not allowed to leave their machines when in working order, in order to talk to employees across the aisle or at the next machine. Work testified that until then she occasionally left her work area to talk, but nothing was said. According to Work, she saw another employee, Joan Russ, who was not wearing union insignia, leave her work area. Work inquired of Rulander, who said that Russ had questions pertaining to her work. I credit the testimony of Work, but I am not persuaded that the General Counsel has made out a case of discriminatory conduct on the basis of this incident. Work did not claim that Rulander told her she could never leave her machine to talk to other employees. Rather, she simply testified that he told her not to leave when her machine was in working order. If the machine was in working order, then Rulander could reasonably expect and direct that Work be available for production. Work did not claim that Rulander previously permitted her to leave her machine when there was work to be done. Work also did not claim that Joan Russ had no work to do, or that she left her area to engage in personal conversation. Therefore, I am recommending that the pertinent allegation of the complaint (par. 8(d)) be dismissed.

c. Prohibiting display of signs

Forklift operator Donna Fehlman Wilcox,[8] who worked at IDC, testified that in the second week of October, she saw David Shaffer, another forklift operator, with an antiunion sign on his heister which said that "only idiots and crazy bastards would want a union." She testified that she saw Shaffer operating the vehicle in this manner both in the morning and afternoon. Fehlman and another employee then decided to put a prounion sign on Fehlman's heister, and they did so the next morning. However, within a few minutes Finishing Area Supervisor Kerry Gern told Fehlman that there would be no more signs because the practice was hazardous and the heisters were company property. Thereafter, Fehlman did not see any signs. Fehlman testified that the sign, which was taped to the front of the heister, did not interfere with its operation. The Company did not, either at that time or in the present hearing, offer any explanation regarding why such signs would constitute a safety problem. Stock Replenishment Supervisor Randall Chase testified that one morning, about 1-1/2 hours after starting time, Supervisor Charles Walters, who reported to him, said that Shaffer had an antiunion sign on his heister. According to Chase, he informed Vice President Carter, who instructed him that there could be no signs, either pro- or antiunion. Carter also testified that he instructed Chase that the sign should be removed. Carter admitted that he was informed when Shaffer first brought the sign into the plant, although he testified that he did not know what Shaffer intended to do with it. Carter and Gern each testified that Gern reported to Carter about the Fehlman sign, and Carter instructed him that it should be removed. However, in his investigatory affidavit, Gern indicated (as did Fehlman in her testimony), that Gern ordered Fehlman to remove the sign immediately on observing it. Neither Supervisor Walters nor employee Shaffer was presented as a witnesses. In light of the Company's failure to produce Walters, the supervisor who allegedly actually saw the Shaffer sign, I credit Fehlman. I find that the Company tolerated the display of antiunion signs on its equipment, and objected to such conduct only after prounion employees sought to display their own signs. I find that the signs presented no safety hazard, and that the Company's assertion in this regard was a pretext. The Company could not prohibit the signs simply because they were taped onto company property. The display of such signs does not constitute solicitation or distribution, but is a form of expression that is protected by the Act. Therefore, the Company violated the Act by prohibiting the display of both pro- and antiunion signs. Montgomery Ward & Co., 220 NLRB 373, 389 (1975), enfd. 554 F.2d 996 (10th Cir. 1977). Moreover, as indicated, the Company enforced its alleged policy in a discriminatory manner, by tolerating the display of an antiunion sign until prounion employees attempted to display their own sign.

[8] I shall refer to her as Fehlman, which was her name at the time of the events in question, in order to avoid confusion with Maintenance Supervisor Frank Wilcox, who also worked at IDC.

d. Breakrooms

The Company maintains breakrooms at Warren and a cafeteria at IDC, which are used by both employees and supervisory personnel. These are nonwork areas. At IDC there are lunch periods from noon to 12:30 p.m. and from 12:30 to 1 p.m. There was also a lunchbreak for the second shift. There is no general prohibition on personal literature in these locations, and in fact, such items as sales catalogues, notices of items for sale, and raffle tickets have been placed in the breakrooms and cafeteria. Barbara Wilson and Diane Savugot testified, in sum, that in September, shortly before the beginning of the evening shift, they placed copies of union literature on breakroom tables. Employees took some copies. A few minutes after the work bell rang, Supervisor Stec picked up the remaining copies and placed them in her pocket. The employees testified that they had not previously seen supervisors remove literature from the breakroom. Alan LaCava testified that at IDC, he saw supervisors pick up union literature that was left on tables after the first lunchbreak, although normally the tables were not cleaned until both midday lunchbreaks were completed. Vice President Carter, whose knowledge was limited to IDC, was the only company witness to testify concerning this matter. Carter testified that leaflets were left "helter-skelter" on tables, that the employee cleanup person would remove the leaflets, that this was not a supervisor's job, and that no special effort was made to remove union literature. If supervisors did not normally clean the tables, then it is evident from the uncontradicted testimony of the employees that the supervisors were performing a special and unusual function when they removed union literature from the breakroom and cafeteria, and that this function was unrelated to normal cleanup work. I credit the employees' testimony, and I find that the supervisors engaged in this unusual conduct as part of a company effort to minimize, wherever possible, communication between the Union and the employees. The Company thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by confiscating union literature. Photo-Sonics, Inc., 254 NLRB 567 (1981), enfd. 678 F.2d 121 (9th Cir. 1982).

e. Denial of use of bulletin boards

The complaint alleges (par. 7(j)) that about October 1980, the Company, by Supervisors Moore and Guthrie, at the Warren plant, denied the Union permission to post literature on the company bulletin board and removed literature from the company bulletin board while permitting other nonwork literature to be posted. In order to properly evaluate this allegation, it is necessary initially to consider the Company's asserted policy regarding employee use of bulletin boards. The Company has no written policy in this regard. Assistant Vice President Zimmerman testified that employees may use the plant bulletin boards to post personal notices, such as thank you cards and items for sale, but may not use the boards to post controversial notices, including pro- or antiunion literature or items derogatory or critical of the Company. Zimmerman testified that the procedure for posting notices differs at Warren from that at IDC. According to Zimmerman, at Warren the receptionist must first initial or date the proposed notice. If the receptionist has any problem, she will check with Zimmerman. The receptionist will take down any unapproved notices. Approved notices normally may remain up for a week. At IDC, prior approval is not required. However, according to Zimmerman, Vice President Carter and Assistant Plant Manager Nelson regularly police the boards. The employees were never generally informed of these alleged policies, although Zimmerman testified that an employee would be informed concerning the reason his or her notice was removed. Zimmerman testified that the Company uses the boards for legally required notices, notices relating to the company savings plan, and notification of merchandise available at the company store, but did not post any campaign literature on the boards.

Employees Barbara Wilson and Diane Savugot testified, in sum, that in September or October they posted two notices on a bulletin board at Warren. One purported to be the pay scale for company executives, and the other purported to be a company list of do's and don'ts for its supervisors with respect to the organizational campaign. They did so without obtaining prior permission. Within a few minutes Supervisors Moore and Guthrie removed the notices. Moore testified that on one occasion he removed posted union literature because it was not dated or initialed, and that no one ever asked him for permission to post union literature on the bulletin boards. However, Wilson testified that in October she asked Supervisor Stec to initial a union notice concerning alleged lack of employee seniority rights. According to Wilson, Stec answered: "You know we can't put stuff like this on the board"; adding that she never initialed anything, but would leave the notice for the receptionist or someone else. Wilson heard nothing more about the matter. Wilson testified that prior to the organizational campaign she often saw uninitialed notices on the bulletin boards, and Supervisor Moore admitted in his testimony that employees sometimes posted notices without permission. The Warren receptionist was not presented as a witness, although the Company presented testimony by the receptionist at IDC. No evidence was presented that would indicate that Company ever permitted or tolerated union notices on bulletin boards at Warren. With respect to IDC, Vice President Carter testified that he saw both pro- and antiunion literature on bulletin boards, that he saw union literature three times, that he removed the literature the first time, but that he never removed antiunion literature. Carter gave no explanation for this apparent change in practice.

I find that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) by denying employee access to the bulletin boards at Warren for the purpose of posting union literature. Having made its bulletin boards available for personal use by its employees, the Company could not lawfully exclude the posting of notices that fell within the ambit of union or concerted activity, on the grounds that it considered such notices to be "controversial" or otherwise distasteful. G. H. Base & Co., 258 NLRB 140, 142 (1981); Container Corp. of America, 244 NLRB 318 (1979). The notices that the union adherents sought to post at Warren, including the executive pay scales, fell within the ambit of protected activity. See Virginia Apparel Corp., 264 NLRB 207, 210 (1982), enfd. in pertinent part mem. 720 F.2d 673 (4th Cir. 1983). In light of Zimmerman's testimony concerning the Company's policy, and in light of what Supervisor Stec told Wilson, it is evident that the Company would not in any event have granted permission for the posting of union literature. Moreover, until the organizational campaign, the Company tolerated the posting of notices at both Warren and IDC without prior permission. Therefore, I find that the Company removed union notices at Warren and IDC, and denied permission for posting at Warren, because of the nature of the notices, and not because the employees failed to seek requisite permission. The Company's conduct was unlawful for the additional reason that notwithstanding its ostensible policy concerning "controversial" material, the Company precluded the posting of union notices at Warren, and at least for a time, at IDC, while permitting antiunion notices at IDC.

f. Written warning to Vivian Newton

In late September, the Company sent letters to some 25 employees, asserting that the Company was in possession of union authorization cards ostensibly signed by the employees. On October 1, when Vivian Newton reported to work, employee Barbara Ransom told her that prounion employees were in trouble because they allegedly forged union cards, and that some of the employees whose cards were allegedly forged were going to see Personnel Director Richard Zimmerman. Ransom mentioned the name of employee Chris Nuhfer. Newton then went over to Nuhfer and asked her about the matter. Newton testified that both of these conversations took place just before starting time (5:30 p.m.), and that she spoke to Nuhfer in the breakroom. About 5:50 p.m., Newton telephoned union organizer Joe Picarreto from a pay phone, which was located near Assistant Vice President Stark's office. Stark saw Newton on the telephone, but did nothing at this time. Newton then went over to Nuhfer, who was at her machine, and asked if she could see Nuhfer's card. Nuhfer said that she wanted to talk to Zimmerman first. Newton testified that during this period she was caught up in her work and had nothing to do. About 6:30 p.m. Newton was summoned to Zimmerman's office. Zimmerman, Stark, and Mailing Supervisor Moore were present. Stark told Newton that they received complaints from several employees that Newton was conducting union business on company worktime. (In fact, only Nuhfer complained to the Company.) Newton denied the accusation, saying that she was only talking to employees, but Zimmerman responded that they had witnesses. The supervisors gave Newton a written "employee warning record," prepared by Stark, which was placed in Newton's personnel file. The warning for "misconduct" stated that: "It has been reported that Vivian Newton has been conducting union organizing business while on Company time rather than doing her work. Continuance of union organizing business on company time may result in dismissal." However, shortly after the interview Stark struck out the phrase "rather than doing her work," because, according to Stark, Newton was doing her work and normally did perform her job functions.

Nuhfer was not presented as a witness in this proceeding. Stark testified that Nuhfer complained to him that while she was at work, Newton approached her and was "badgering" her to give her a letter and authorization card, and that Newton said the union organizer told her to ask for them. Stark testified that he reported the matter to Zimmerman, and that Company Secretary Robert Blair instructed them to give Newton a written warning because she "was engaged in union business during Company work time and badgering an employee at their work station, when the employee was supposed to be working."

The General Counsel correctly points out (Br. 30) that as a general rule, in the absence of a formal and valid no-solicitation rule, an employer may discipline an employee for solicitation only if the solicitation resulted in actual work interference. Midwest Stock Exchange, 244 NLRB 1108, 1116 (1979), enfd. in pertinent part 635 F.2d 1255, 1270 (7th Cir. 1980). In the present case, the Company could reasonably believe, on the basis of Nuhfer's complaint, that Newton was interfering with her work. Nevertheless, I find that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by issuing the written warning to Newton. First, the Company did not give Newton a warning for interfering with Nuhfer's work. Indeed, Assistant Vice President Stark admitted in his testimony that he attempted to conceal Nuhfer's identity by telling Newton that he received complaints from several employees. Rather, as the warning plainly indicated on its face, Newton was given a warning and threatened with discharge for "conducting union organizing business while on Company time." The Company did not make clear to Newton, either through the language of the warning or the accompanying statements by the company officials, that Newton had the right to discuss union matters with her fellow employees during periods of the workday when they were properly not engaged in their work tasks (not limited to formal break periods). The term "company time," like the term "company working hours," is so broad as to encompass periods from the beginning to the end of work shifts, including lunch and break periods and other times when employees are properly not engaged in their work tasks. See Campbell Soup Co., 159 NLRB 74, 82 (1966), enfd. as modified 380 F.2d 372, 373 (5th Cir. 1967), cited with approval in Our Way, Inc., 268 NLRB 394 fn. 3 (1983). Therefore the warning was overly broad and unlawful. Second, the warning was discriminatory and therefore unlawful because it was given pursuant to a policy that tolerated "badgering" by antiunion employees while severely disciplining lesser conduct by union adherents. In December, union adherent Joan Hockenberry complained to Finishing Area Supervisor Kerry Gern that employee Paul Williams intentionally stacked pallets in such a manner as to block a sign posted by Hockenberry that read "Merry Christmas from Local 1." Gern reported the matter to Vice President Carter. However, although Williams was engaging in antiunion activity in the guise of performing a work function, he was not disciplined. Instead, Gern advised Williams "not to be so obvious." Gern characterized Hockenberry as a troublemaker and suggested to Carter that Hockenberry "might lose control and help us" because (as testified by Carter), Hockenberry was "thin-skinned." The same could be said of Nuhfer. As indicated, this was not the only instance in which the Company tolerated antiunion activity while suppressing comparable forms of union activity. Additionally, as previously discussed the Company tolerated commercial and other forms of solicitation even when such conduct interrupted employees engaged at work. I find that the Company gave Newton a written warning because she was engaged in union, as distinguished from some other form of activity. Therefore the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by disciplining Newton.

g. Transfer of Joan Hockenberry

Joan Hockenberry was the leading union adherent at IDC. She was closely identified with the Union. As indicated, the Company even regarded her personality as a potential campaign issue. Hockenberry had a practice of wearing union slogans and notices of union meetings on the back of her shirt. However, beginning on Tuesday, October 2, Hockenberry wore a sign which declared that the Company was "unfair" and "discriminates." The sign referred to the situation of Freeda Carr and Nancy Race, who had just quit their jobs after being transferred to the returns department, and were now seeking reinstatement. As will be discussed, the matter of Carr and Race soon became a major issue in the organizational and election campaigns. At this time Hockenberry worked on the multiple packing line in the finishing area. She was on the day shift, and Kerry Gern was her immediate supervisor. There were 32 to 34 employees on the multiple packing line. They were seated on both sides of a conveyor belt, in an open area, and generally in view of each other. Hockenberry began wearing the "unfair . . . discriminates" sign after the lunchbreak. Hockenberry testified that about one-half hour later, Gern told her to go to the sportcoat line, which was some 50 to 60 feet away. There were about 12 employees on the sportcoat line. Hockenberry testified that the employees could not see her back. The same would also normally be true of the multiple packing line, as the employees were seated in rows facing each other. However there was less opportunity for employees to move about the sportcoat line. That line was located in a closed area, and it was necessary for Hockenberry to crawl under the conveyor in order to leave her seat. Hockenberry testified that in the same week she was also assigned to the nylon line, where the employees could not see each other without turning around. There were six employees on the nylon line. Like the sportcoat line, this line was located in a closed area, and it was difficult for Hockenberry to leave her seat. The next week Hockenberry stopped wearing the "unfair . . . discriminates" sign, and she returned to the multiple packing line. However, Hockenberry admitted that as of Friday, October 10, she was posted to work on the multiple packing line the following week, although on October 10 she was still wearing the sign.

Supervisor Gern testified that he normally rotated employees in the finishing area, usually every third week, and that each Friday he prepared a schedule for the following week. Gern denied that he transferred Hockenberry because of her sign. However, Gern failed to explain why Hockenberry was suddenly switched to the sportcoat line in midweek, and why she was transferred to yet another line during the same week. I find that the Company, by Gern, transferred Hockenberry from the multiple packing line in order to minimize employee communication concerning the Race-Carr matter, and to prevent possible galvanizing of employee sentiment for Carr and Race during the crucial period immediately following their departure. As will be discussed, on the same day that Hockenberry began wearing her sign, the Company caused the arrest of union organizers who sought to distribute union literature concerning the Carr-Race matter to employees at IDC. I find that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discriminatorily transferring Hockenberry from the multiple packing line to the sportcoat and nylon lines.

6. Company threats of reprisal and solicitation to inform on union activities

In October, the Company sent a two-page letter to its employees, signed by President Jack Blair, concerning the union organizational campaign. The second page, captioned "Our Labor Relations Policy," began with the statement: "We firmly believe that our employees, our customers and the company have nothing to gain through union representation, and, in fact, have much to lose." The General Counsel contends that by such statement, the Company threatened its employees with unspecified reprisals if they joined or selected the Union as their bargaining representative. The standards governing the legality of such statements are set forth in Greensboro Hosiery Mills, 162 NLRB 1275, 1276 (1967), enf. denied in pertinent part 398 F.2d 414, 417 (4th Cir. 1968). (The court of appeals accepted those standards, but disagreed with the Board on their application to the facts in Greensboro.) Applying the Greensboro standards to the facts of the present case, I find that the statement, when viewed in the context of the letter and the Company's contemporaneous conduct, constituted a threat of reprisal if the employees designated or selected the Union as their bargaining representative. The first page of the letter centered on a list of alleged costs and obligations incurred through union membership. If the letter said nothing more, then the statement at issue might reasonably be construed as a reference to these obligations. However, on the second page, immediately following the statement, the Company set forth its purported personnel policies as a "non-union organization." An employee could reasonably infer from "our labor relations policy" that if the employees chose union representation, the Company would no longer be so magnanimous in dealing with its employees (e.g., it would no longer treat the employees as individuals, it would not recognize and reward individual effort and contribution, it would not permit employees to deal directly with management, and it would not assure its employees of equal opportunity). Second, as has been and will be discussed, the letter was sent to the employees in the context of numerous unfair labor practices, including acts of discrimination against union adherents. These acts included, as found, infra, the Company's discriminatory refusal to reinstate Freeda Carr and Nancy Race. The Company's discriminatory pattern of conduct was apparent to the employees by the time they received this letter. In sum, the letter plainly inferred that if the employees chose union representation, the Company's discriminatory policy toward union adherents would become its standard policy in dealing with all its employees. Therefore, I find that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening its employees that they had "much to lose" if they chose union representation.

Personnel Director Zimmerman testified that the Company distributed to some of its supervisors, a memorandum captioned "DO'S and DONT'S for NPC Supervisors." The memorandum stated in pertinent part that supervisors "CAN . . . tell employees no one has the right to threaten or pressure them. The Company should be informed of any such threats or pressure and will take all necessary steps to prevent it." The General Counsel contends that the Company, by its supervisors, unlawfully solicited employees to report on the union activities of fellow employees. The General Counsel would be correct if in fact any supervisor actually told an employee to report instances of union "pressure." See Union Carbide Corp., 259 NLRB 974, 978 (1982); J. H. Block & Co., 247 NLRB 262 (1980). The difficulty with the General Counsel's contention is that the present record fails to indicate that any supervisor actually did so. Under questioning by the General Counsel, Zimmerman testified that pursuant to the "Do's and Don'ts," supervisors "would have" so informed the employees. However, it does not follow from the admission that any supervisors actually did so. Therefore, I am recommending that the pertinent allegation of the complaint (par. 7(x)) be dismissed.

7. Refusal to reinstate Freeda Carr and Nancy Race

The consolidated complaint, as amended, alleges that since about October 6, 1980, the Company has violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act by refusing to reinstate Freeda Carr and Nancy Race because of their union and concerted activities and because of the charge filed on their behalf in Case 6–CA–13933.

At the beginning of October 1980, Carr and Race were working in the housewares department at IDC. Rick Arthur was their immediate supervisor. Carr had been continuously employed by the Company since 1972. She worked at several jobs, and at one time was a supervisor. Since September 1979 she had been working as order giveout girl in housewares, where her duties included training of new employees. Her personnel file indicates that she progressed in her work performance over the years, and was rated as an above-average employee in all respects except attendance, for which she was rated average. Nancy Race Nee Poole began working for the Company in June 1978. She worked as an order filler in housewares. By July 1979 Race had received three warning notices for unsatisfactory attendance. However, much of her attendance problem was related to her pregnancy. In May 1980 Race returned from maternity leave. Thereafter, her attendance improved substantially, and she received no further warnings. Race was rated as an average or above-average employee in all respects except attendance.

Carr and Race were not leading union adherents prior to their separation from employment, but they did actively support the Union. They each signed a union card and wore union T-shirts and pins to work. Carr solicited other employees to sign cards. Both Carr and Race made their prounion views known to Supervisor Arthur. By October 1, top management at IDC (specifically, Vice President John Carter and Assistant Plant Manager Carl Nelson) were aware of what they regarded as friction among the housewares department employees, and they specifically viewed Carr, Race, and Donna Fehlman as part of a prounion clique within the department, with Carr as the leader of the clique. Management was also aware that Supervisor Arthur was himself a principal source of controversy within the department, primarily because of his lack of tact in dealing with the female employees under his supervision (Arthur subsequently went on sick leave, and returned to the Company in a nonsupervisory capacity). On October 1 and 2 Carter and Nelson met individually with the department employees. Immediately following this series of meetings, Carter informed Carr that he would give Arthur "another chance" but would transfer Carr to the returns department, where she had worked when she began at IDC. Carter then assembled a meeting of all department employees except Carr, and informed them that Elaine Fox (an outspoken antiunion employee) was replacing Carr as giveout girl. Carter then loudly and repeatedly asked Nancy Race what was her problem. Race had said nothing up to this point. She initially remained silent, but then asserted that she did not have to answer. Carter disagreed, whereupon Race told him that he could shove the job up his "ass." Carter invited Race to leave the meeting, and she did. After the meeting, Carter asked Race if she quit. Race indicated that she did not, but that Carter could fire her if he wanted. Carter said that he would if she did not get along with the other employees. The next morning (Friday, October 3), Race was summoned to the conference room, where Carter and Nelson gave her a written warning notice for "misconduct" based on her outburst at the October 2 meeting, and informed her that she would be working in returns. Carr and Race viewed returns as unpleasant work, because it involved handling of used, and sometimes unclean clothing. Race reported to returns, but that same morning, after consulting with her husband, she informed Carter that she was quitting. In the meantime Carr, who had taken the day off, came to IDC and met with Carter and Nelson to ask if they would reconsider their decision. They refused. Carr said she was quitting, and would use her accumulated leave time as 2 weeks' notice. Carter urged her to reconsider, but she insisted that she was leaving because she felt she had been treated unfairly. At no time did Carter or any other company official tell her that she failed to give adequate notice, or that she could not use her accumulated leave time for notice purposes.

Vice President Carter testified that he decided to transfer Carr and Race because in his opinion Carr and to a lesser extent Race were causing a split between Supervisor Arthur and the employees. The evidence fails to indicate whether Carr and Race consulted with each other before they decided to quit. However, shortly thereafter they decided to enlist the Union's help in order to regain their jobs. On Monday morning, October 6, they met with union organizer Dan Glather at the Holiday Inn in Warren. Glather advised them to request reinstatement. He telephoned Carter and informed him that Carr and Race wanted to return to work in the returns department. Carter told Glather that he would have to speak to the Company's attorney. Glather attempted to speak to Assistant Vice President Zimmerman, but Zimmerman refused to accept the call. That same day, the Union's attorney sent a telegram to Zimmerman, which was received on October 8. The telegram stated that Carr and Race were ready, willing, and able to return to work "at their most recent assignments," and requested that the Company contact them to arrange for a time to resume work. The Company did not respond to the telegram. On the afternoon of October 6, and again on October 7, several union organizers, accompanied by Carr, Race, and a former employee, attempted to distribute union literature and cards at the IDC premises. The literature included a handbill signed by Carr and Race, which protested their transfer "without regard to seniority." (The Company's responses to these efforts are alleged as unfair labor practices, and will be discussed under the next heading of this decision.) As found, Joan Hockenberry also attempted to publicize the Carr-Race matter inside the plant.

On October 13 Carr and Cindy Durotics Rosman, who quit her job in housewares on October 10, met with Assistant Vice President Zimmerman and Personnel Assistant Rodney Henry. Much of the meeting was taken up with a discussion of Supervisor Arthur. However, one aspect of the meeting is sharply disputed. Carr and Durotics testified in sum that Carr asked about getting her job back, whereupon Zimmerman answered that she would have to fill out a new application in order to be considered. Zimmerman and Henry testified, in sum, that Carr asked if there was work available at Warren, whereupon Zimmerman answered no, but that she could go across the hall (i.e., to the personnel office) and update her application. Carr did not go to the personnel office until February 27. Carr testified that she did not go because she did not think she should have to return as a new employee. On October 15 the Union filed its charge in Case 6–CA–13933, alleging among other things that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by discriminatorily transferring Carr and Race, thereby constructively discharging them, and by refusing to reemploy them, even in returns. Within the next 3 days, two letters crossed in the mail. On October 16 or 17, Carr sent a letter to Zimmerman, which he received on October 18.[9] Carr reasserted her request, as set forth in the Union's telegram, to continue working "at the assignment last given to me in returns." However, she restated her position that her transfer was unfair, and reserved her right to take other legal means to get back her job. However, by letter dated October 16, Zimmerman informed Carr as follows:

> Re: Our meeting of October 13, 1980
> Please be advised that as of this date we received a charge through the National Labor Relations Board which appears to encompass the circumstances of your resignation. I have determined that your case is better left in the hands of the National Labor Relations Board for investigation and resolution.

There was no further communication between Carr and Zimmerman.

I credit the testimony of Zimmerman and Henry concerning the October 13 meeting. It is unlikely that Zimmerman would have advised Carr to fill out a new application, because even applicants who had never worked for the Company were not required to follow this procedure. Rather Zimmerman, Henry, or another personnel assistant filled out the application. Zimmerman's version of the meeting reflected the Company's usual procedure for former company employees who were reapplying for work. Under this procedure, the former employees would in an informal manner, usually by telephone or in person, indicate their availability for reemployment and indicate any changes in name, address, telephone number, employment history, and physical capabilities. The information would be entered in their personnel file, which would then be placed in an active file together with the applications of new job applicants and the files of other former employees seeking reemployment. However, for reasons that will be discussed, I find that Zimmerman injected an unnecessary obstacle by telling Carr to follow this procedure, and that absent a discriminatory motive, Zimmerman would have promptly accepted Carr's offer to work in returns. I further find that after Zimmerman sent his October 16 letter to Carr, such procedure would have amounted to an exercise in futility, because Zimmerman made clear that by reason of the pending unfair labor practice charge, the Company would not reemploy Carr unless it was ordered to do so by the Board.

Thereafter the Union pursued various legal avenues on behalf of Carr, in addition to the unfair labor practice charge on behalf of Carr and Race, and suffered repeated rebuffs in the process. With the Union's assistance, Carr filed a claim for unemployment compensation, and also filed a complaint with the Pennsylvania Human Relations Commission, alleging sexual harassment. On February 24, following a hearing, a referee of the Pennsylvania Unemployment Compensation Board of Review held that Carr was ineligible for compensation because there was no necessary or compelling reason for her to quit.[10] Immediately on receiving the referee's decision, Carr went to the Company's personnel office and informed Personnel Assistant Henry that she was reapplying for work. Henry then pulled her personnel folder and placed it in the active file with those of other applicants. There were no changes with regard to pertinent information. Carr indicated a preference for clerical work, but did not rule out any job or either plant. Thereafter Carr called in about her application. On July 15, 1981, the sexual harassment charge was administratively dismissed for lack of probable cause. In the meantime, on January 30, the Regional Director declined to proceed on the Carr-Race matter; however, on January 29, 1982, the General Counsel granted the Union's appeal with respect to the Company's refusal to reinstate the employees. Meanwhile, during the election campaign the Carr-Race matter became a company issue as well as a union issue. In a series of captive audience speeches that he delivered to assembled employees shortly before the election, Company Vice President Robert Blair repeatedly hammered home the theme that the Union demonstrated its ineptitude by failing to get Carr and Race reinstated to their jobs. In the following or similar language, Blair told the employees:

> Now they have also, these union organizers, have also been going around telling certain people, people that used to work at the company and no longer work here, they will, we'll show them, we're going to get you your job back here. Just watch us. We're going to get you your job back here. And they've said to certain individuals, you worried about your unemployment comp? Well, don't worry about it. We'll see that you get unemployment comp. They've said, we're going to file a flock of charges against the company in front of various state agencies like the Pennsylvania Human Relations Commission. And they did, they filed charges against us in front of the Pennsylvania Human Relations Commission. Well, the fact of the matter is not one single person that they said they'd get their job back is back here working. Not one single person that they said—don't worry we'll get you unemployment comp—got unemployment comp.

Although Blair did not mention names, Assistant Vice President Zimmerman testified that he was referring to Carr and Race.[11]

[9] The letter is dated October 10, and Carr testified that she mailed it the next day. However, the letter was postmarked October 17.

[10] The referee found that Carr was instructed to complete an application for employment in order to be considered for reemployment. For the reasons previously discussed, I do not agree with this finding. The referee noted Carr's assertion that the Company disapproved of her union activities. However, the referee did not consider the question presented in this case, namely, whether the Company refused to reinstate Carr because of her union and concerted activities or because of the pending unfair labor practice charge.

[11] The foregoing quotation is taken from a transcript of a company tape recording. Both the Company and the Union tape recorded captive audience meetings during the week of June 1, 1981. Generally the company transcripts are more accurate with respect to the statements of com-

The Company never offered reemployment to either Carr or Race. Assistant Vice President Zimmerman testified that the Company did not offer reemployment to Carr because (1) she did not give notice to the Company that she was leaving, and (2) her reason for leaving (i.e., her transfer to another job) was not a good reason. Zimmerman testified that the Company did not offer reemployment to Race because (1) she never reapplied, (2) she had a poor attendance record, and (3) she told Carter to shove the job up his "ass." In fact, as indicated, Zimmerman informed Carr by his letter of October 16 that the Company would not consider her request for reemployment because of the pending unfair labor practice charge. Neither Carr nor Race was ever given any other reason. The October 16 letter constituted an admission that the Company was refusing to consider Carr for reemployment because the Union had filed a charge on her behalf. Therefore the letter evidenced that the Company was violating Section 8(a)(4) of the Act. See NLRB v. Syracuse Stamping Co., 208 F.2d 77, 79–80 (2d Cir. 1953). The letter further evidences that the reasons advanced by Zimmerman for refusing to reemploy Carr simply constituted a rationalization for a decision that the Company made when it received the charge. As the language of the letter was sufficiently broad to also encompass the situation of Nancy Race, the inference is warranted, and I so find, that the charge was also at least a factor in the Company's refusal to consider Race for reemployment.

The evidence further indicates that the reasons advanced by Zimmerman, both as to Carr and Race, lacked any credible factual basis, or did not normally constitute grounds for refusing to consider an applicant for reemployment, or both. The Company contends that Carr did not apply for reemployment until February 27, and that Race never reapplied. In fact, as Zimmerman was well aware, both Carr and Race applied for work by telephone and by telegram on October 6, and Carr further applied in person on October 13 and by letter on October 16 or 17. Neither Carter nor Zimmerman, in his testimony, gave any explanation for their refusal to accept organizer Glather's call as a good-faith request for reemployment. If the company officials believed that such request should have come personally from Carr and Race, then it would have been a simple matter for either official to request that the employees be placed on the telephone. But for the fact that the initial caller was a union organizer, Carter or Zimmerman probably would have done this. Zimmerman testified that he did not regard the October 6 telegram as a valid reapplication because he never received such a request by telegram, and because the telegram did not come from Carr and Race, and that he did not consider Carr's letter as a valid request. Zimmerman gave no explanation for the latter assertion. In fact, the Company had no established manner for submission of requests for reemployment. Rather, such requests could be and were often received in an informal manner (e.g., by telephone call). Moreover, on October 13 Carr came in person to request reemployment. Although Carr inquired about the Warren plant, Zimmerman was aware, by reason of Glather's call, the Union's telegram, and Carr's subsequent letter, that Carr was willing to work in returns. As indicated, Zimmerman told Carr to go to the personnel office to update her application. Had she done so, she would have ended up talking to either of the same officials who were present in the conference room (i.e., Zimmerman or Henry). In view of the short time that had elapsed since Carr quit her job, it was obvious that there was no need for Carr to update her application. Indeed, the Company's own records indicate that absent a discriminatory motive, the Company would have immediately returned Carr and Race to their jobs on their request to return, without telling them to update their application or otherwise go on a waiting list.[18] The situation of Mary Lou Rigby, which is documented in a series of memos in her personnel file (G.C. Exh. 178) is illustrative. Rigby began working for the Company in order handling in September 1972. In February 1974 Rigby was assigned to work as giveout in returns. Rigby complained loud and long about the transfer, and then informed the Company that she was quitting. Her resignation was accepted. The file memo indicates management's view that Rigby's attitude was "completely negative," that she had "a history of job changing," and that "It's best she leaves NPC." However, prior to the effective date of her resignation, Rigby changed her mind. Rigby thereafter retained her job, without being asked to reapply or update her application. Thereafter Rigby worked for the Company until September 1979, when she quit her job in order to obtain a better job with National Forge Company. During much of the intervening period Rigby's attendance was rated as unsatisfactory. She was frequently absent or tardy. By 1979 Zimmerman was personnel director and Rodney Henry was personnel assistant. Nevertheless, having had the benefit of the foregoing information in Rigby's personnel file, they recommended her without qualification for future reemployment (Rigby was given a "Yes" rating, which will be explained, infra).

In sum, the Rigby file demonstrates that absent a discriminatory motive, the Company will excuse an employee who quits (for whatever reason), but shortly thereafter changes his or her mind, and will not require the employee to reapply and wait for reemployment. Therefore, Freeda Carr was correct in concluding that by directing her to the personnel office to update her application, Zimmerman was, for discriminatory reasons, avoiding an offer of reemployment by placing her on a waiting list with other applicants. The Rigby file further demonstrates that the Company does not view employee dissatisfaction with job assignments as a bar to reemployment, even when such dissatisfaction becomes a habit, or when the employee quits as a result of a transfer. As will pany officials, whereas the union transcripts tend to more accurately reflect questions or statements by employees. The difference probably reflects the location of the recording devices.

[18] Some of the evidence discussed here was adduced at the reopened hearing on April 27, 1983. To the extent relevant, such evidence may be considered with respect to the matter of Carr and Race, just as evidence adduced in the original hearing may be considered with respect to the additional alleged discriminatees. See Air Express International Corp., 245 NLRB 478, 483 fn. 10 (1979), enfd. as modified 659 F.2d 610 (5th Cir. 1981).

be discussed, the Rigby file is also evidentiary with respect to other alleged discriminatees in the present case.

Zimmerman testified that Carr failed to give adequate notice of quitting because the Company "appreciate[s]," but does not require, 2 weeks' notice, and that accumulated vacation time cannot be used for notice purposes. According to Zimmerman, the reason for this policy is to give the Company sufficient time to obtain a replacement. Interestingly, the Company does not contend that it refused to rehire Race because she failed to give adequate notice. The Company's employee handbook is silent with respect to notice of quitting. However, alleged discriminatee Barbara Morgan testified without contradiction that Supervisor Pauline Stec told her that she could use accumulated leave time for notice purposes. As indicated, Vice President Carter did not object when Carr made the same request. I credit the testimony of Morgan, and I find that the Company has no consistent policy with respect to notice. Rather, the Company will accept accumulated leave time as notice unless the Company informs the employee otherwise. In Carr's situation, the matter of notice was plainly a sham, because Carr did not lose even 1 day from work before she requested reemployment. Carr quit on Friday, October 3, which was her day off, and immediately notified the Company, thru organizer Glather, on Monday morning, October 6, that she was willing to accept her assignment in returns. Moreover, the Company's records indicate that failure to give notice, even in an extreme situation, does not constitute a bar to reemployment of an otherwise qualified employee. Chris Nuhfer, who complained to management about Vivian Newton's union activity, failed to return from pregnancy leave in early 1979, and her name was removed from the personnel roster. She was rehired in December 1979. She stopped coming to work after April 29, 1981, and on June 10, 1981, her name was removed from the personnel roster. On June 3, 1980, she was given a written warning for unsatisfactory attendance. Nevertheless, Nuhfer was rated as recommended for reemployment, and she was rehired in the mailing department on August 24, 1981. The personnel files of Kathy Reist and Debra Frank indicate that they gave no notice before they quit, but instead, gave notice after they stopped working. Nevertheless, both employees were recommended for reemployment, and Proctor was subsequently twice rehired (the second time, after having refused work at IDC in lieu of a layoff). Similarly Nancy Naser, who had a poor attendance record throughout her career at the Company, was rehired after having quit her job without notice.

Approximately 30 percent of the Company's work force consists of reemployed employees who formerly worked for the Company. It is not unusual for employees to work two, three, or even four separate times for the Company. The Company's records indicate that employees leave for a variety of reasons (e.g., family responsibilities, relocation, and better employment). When an employee leaves, the personnel office evaluates the employee's eligibility for future reemployment, and the rating is entered on the employee's personnel file. However, the employee is normally not notified of such rating. Personnel Assistant Henry normally makes the evaluation, subject to review and revision by Assistant Vice President Zimmerman. The ratings are as follows. "Yes" means that the employee is eligible for rehire. "Yes?" means that there is a small problem, but the employee could be eligible for reemployment. "No?" means that there is a more serious problem, but the employee could still be eligible. "No" means that it is unlikely that the employee would be rehired. The ratings are sometimes accompanied by an explanation, qualification, or other notation. The overwhelming majority of rehired employees received a "Yes" rating when they left. It is unusual for the Company to rehire an employee with a "No" or "No?" rating. Zimmerman testified that over a 3-year period, only two employees were rehired with a "No" rating, and that one of them was rehired as a result of a personal appeal by her husband, who was then working for the Company, and who pleaded financial hardship. In sum, a "Yes?" rating places the applicant at a disadvantage when competing with other applicants, a "No?" rating makes reemployment unlikely, and a "No" precludes consideration for reemployment. The Company's records indicate that poor attendance is usually the indicated reason for a qualified or unfavorable recommendation.

Freeda Carr's personnel file indicates that she was rated as follows: "Yes? See REZ, JMC CHN" (i.e., see official Zimmerman, Carter, or Nelson). No other explanation was given. It is evident that Personnel Assistant Henry was hard put to explain any qualified rating for this longtime and valued employee. Notwithstanding the "Yes?" rating, Zimmerman, as indicated, testified that the Company did not offer her reemployment because of the alleged lack of notice and inadequate reason for leaving. Nancy Race's personnel file indicates a rating of "No. Attendance." However, Race's attendance record was better than that of other employees who were given a "Yes" or "Yes?" rating on their departure. For example, Edith Falconer Fehlman was given a "Yes" rating, although she had seven absences, totaling 103 days during a 1-year period. Race's absences were caused substantially by pregnancy, which, as testified by Zimmerman, constituted a mitigating factor. Moreover, Race's attendance record improved to an acceptable level following her return from maternity leave. As for Race's emotional outburst on October 2, the evidence indicates that Vice President Zimmerman testified that in considering former employees for reemployment, the Company looks at those factors that reflect stability of employment (e.g., attendance and continuity of employment). If so, then it is difficult to see why Zimmerman would attach much significance to one emotional outburst. The Company's records indicate that normally it does not. Employee Laura Zaffino's file indicated that she assaulted a fellow employee, splitting her lip. Zaffino also demonstrated a repeated reluctance to follow the instructions of her supervisors. On leaving the Company, Zaffino was given a "Yes?" rating.

I find that the reasons advanced by the Company for refusing to rehire Carr and Race, except for that advanced by Zimmerman in his letter to Carr, were pretextual. The Company refused, and continued to refuse, to rehire Carr and Race because they actively sought the Union's assistance in regaining their jobs, which assistance included the filing of an unfair labor practice charge in Case 6–CA–13933. Indeed, Company Vice President Blair came close to conceding as much in his speeches to the employees in June 1981. Blair made clear that he regarded the Union's inability to obtain reinstatement for the employees as an issue in the campaign. By so doing, the Company boxed itself into a position whereby even if it were inclined to reinstate Carr and Race, it could not do so without appearing to give the Union a victory. Compare, in the context of an 8(a)(5) violation, General Electric Co., 150 NLRB 192, 196 (1964), enfd. 418 F.2d 736, 755 (2d Cir. 1969), cert. denied 397 U.S. 965 (1970).

It is undisputed that on and after October 6 there was work available for Carr and Race in the returns departments. Pursuant to a department request on October 6, the Company, during the period from October 13 to 20, hired nine new employees for work in returns. Most worked as returns inspectors. Personnel Assistant Henry testified that the Company continued to hire employees after February 27, 1981 (when the Company formally acknowledged Carr's reapplication) and that Carr would have been qualified for some of the positions. I find that but for the actions of Carr and Race in seeking union assistance, the Company would have reinstated them when, acting through organizer Glather, they requested reinstatement on October 6. Therefore, the Company violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act, and Carr and Race are entitled to reinstatement and backpay from that date. I further find that the Company's discriminatory actions with request to Carr and Race may properly be considered as evidence with respect to the other alleged discriminatees.

8. Denial of access by nonemployee organizers to IDC premises

On the afternoon of October 6, union organizers Dan Glather and Frank LaCotta, accompanied by Freeda Carr, Nancy Race, and former employee Chris Branstrom, entered on the premises of IDC for the purpose of distributing union literature and talking to employees as they left the plant. Vice President Carter told Glather that this was private property, and he requested that they leave. Glather asserted that they were exercising their rights under the Act to communicate with the employees. Carter responded that if they returned the next day the Company would contact "the authorities" and have them removed. The next day (October 7) union organizers Glather, Joe Picarretto, and James Gilmartin, accompanied by Carr, Race, and Branstrom, again went to the IDC premises. They were confronted by a state trooper who was present at the Company's request. The trooper told them that if they did not leave they would be arrested. The group temporarily left. However, the three professional organizers returned to the premises (while the others waited on a public road), and they proceeded to distribute union literature to employees leaving the plant. The trooper again threatened them with arrest, but they persisted. The trooper asked Company Maintenance Supervisor Frank Wilcox if he wanted them arrested. Wilcox said that he did. However, the trooper's supervisor advised him to "continue the arrest by summons." The organizers left after they finished distributing their literature. Within a few days the organizers were served by mail with a summons, prepared by the trooper, charging them with criminal trespass by entering the Company's property and refusing to leave on request. The matter did not go to trial, because the district attorney and the Union's attorney worked out an agreement whereby the charges were dropped against Glather and Picaretto, Gilmartin pleaded guilty to disorderly conduct and paid a fine, and the Union agreed that it would not return to the Company's property unless it could prove through Board processes that it had a right to be there. The district attorney took the position that the Union's alleged statutory right was a matter for the Board, and not the state courts. The Company did not object to all charges being dropped, but the district attorney insisted on the guilty plea by Gilmartin, because of his alleged disrespectful behavior toward the state trooper. By letter dated February 26, 1981 (during the pendency of the election petition in Case 6–RC–8922), the Union requested permission from Carter "to hand bill the Irvine employees to give our side of Freeda's case or in liu [sic] of your permission we would formally request a current list of the names and addresses of the Irvine employees." The Company did not respond to the letter.

The consolidated complaint alleges (pars. 7(k), (l), and (o) that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) on October 6 by threatening union organizers with arrest because they distributed union literature on company property, on October 7 by causing their arrest for the same reason, and on February 26 by refusing to permit the Union to handbill at IDC. The first two allegations are factually inaccurate. The Company threatened to call the police and have the organizers removed, but did not threaten to have them arrested. The Company caused the organizers to be evicted, and caused criminal proceedings against them, but they were not arrested (i.e., placed in police custody). However, what is significant is that the Company refused to permit the Union to distribute literature and communicate with employees on the IDC premises, and threatened to and did initiate police action to expel and keep nonemployee union organizers from its premises. (The Company's actions with respect to Carr and Race will be discussed at a later point in this decision.) In sum, the issue presented by all three allegations is whether the organizers had a statutorily protected right to distribute literature and communicate with employees on the IDC premises, and consequently whether the Company violated the Act by interfering with the Union's exercise of that right. Therefore, although paragraph 7(o) alleges a violation during the pendency of the election petition, I shall consider all three allegations together at this point.

The General Counsel and the Company agree, and correctly so, that the governing standards are set forth in NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105, 112–113 (1956). In Babcock & Wilcox, the Supreme Court held as follows:

> . . . an employer may validly post his property against nonemployee distribution of union literature if reasonable efforts by the union through other available channels of communication will enable it to reach the employees with its message and if the employer's notice or order does not discriminate against the union by allowing other distribution. In these circumstances the employer may not be compelled to allow distribution even under such reasonable regulations as the orders in these cases permit.
> This is not a problem of always open or always closed doors for union organization on company property. Organization rights are granted to workers by the same authority, the National Government, that preserves property rights. Accommodation between the two must be obtained with as little destruction of one as is consistent with the maintenance of the other. The employer may not affirmatively interfere with organization; the union may not always insist that the employer aid organization. But when the inaccessibility of employees makes ineffective the reasonable attempts by nonemployees to communicate with them through the usual channels, the right to exclude from property has been required to yield to the extent needed to permit communication of information on the right to organize.
> The right of self-organization depends in some measure on the ability of employees to learn the advantages of self-organization from others. Consequently, if the location of a plant and the living quarters of the employees place the employees beyond the reach of reasonable union efforts to communicate with them, the employer must allow the union to approach his employees on his property.

I have studied numerous case decisions involving application of the Babcock & Wilcox standards, including Babcock & Wilcox itself. These decisions tend to reflect certain distinct currents in the developing body of law. First, as the Supreme Court itself has recognized, the courts, including the Supreme Court, have demonstrated great reluctance to compromise employer property rights by finding that an employer violated the Act by excluding nonemployee organizers from its premises. See Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Carpenters, 436 U.S. 180, 205 (1978). I am unaware of any court decision affirming such a finding by the Board under Babcock & Wilcox standards, except in situations where the employees lived on the employer's premises. Even in such situations, the courts have sometimes declined to find a violation. See NLRB v. Tamiment, Inc., 451 F.2d 794 (3d Cir. 1971); NLRB v. Kutsher's Hotel & Country Club, 427 F.2d 200 (2d Cir. 1970). However, the courts have indicated a greater willingness to grant temporary union access as a remedy for serious unfair labor practices. See Conair Corp. v. NLRB, 721 F.2d 1355 (D.C. Cir. 1983); Decaturville Sportswear Co. v. NLRB, 406 F.2d 886, 889 (6th Cir. 1969). Both the Board and courts have tended to attach significance to a union's efforts, or lack of effort, to communicate with the employees by other means. See Tamiment, Inc., supra at 798–799; Lee Wards, 199 NLRB 543, 545–546 (1972). Generally, Board decisions in this area do not tend to attach the same weight to employer property rights, vis-a-vis Section 7 rights, as the court decisions. However, it is evident from the history of Board litigation that the whole question of union access to employer property has been a highly controversial one, with the result sometimes depending as much on the makeup of the Board as the facts involved in particular cases. See and compare Monogram Models, 192 NLRB 705 (1971) (majority and dissenting opinions); Hutzler Bros. Co., 241 NLRB 914 (1979), enf. denied 630 F.2d 1012 (4th Cir. 1980); Ameron Automotive Centers, 265 NLRB 511 (1982) (majority and dissenting opinions).

In the present case, unlike many others, the evidence indicates that the Union made extensive efforts to communicate with IDC employees by alternative means. For this if no other reason, careful consideration must be given to the feasibility of such means, including the Union's efforts and relative success or lack of success in reaching the employees. As will be discussed, the present case involves other factors that make it somewhat sui generis; specifically, (1) the large number of employees involved, coupled with continuing turnover among the employees; (2) the Company's extensive and unlawful interference with employee organizational activity; and (3) denial of access to alternative means away from the Company's premises (i.e., radio, newspapers, and meeting locations).

The first question to be considered is whether the Union could have communicated with the IDC employees at IDC entrances or exits without entering onto company property. A comparison of the Warren and IDC locations is in order. The Warren plant is located in downtown Warren; its entrances, exits, and parking lots are immediately adjacent to the public sidewalks. There is no contention that the location of the Warren plant poses any obstacle to union communication with employees in the plant area, although as found, supra, the Company engaged in unlawful surveillance of union distribution at Warren. However, IDC is located on a large, company-owned tract of land in a semirural area, adjacent to a highway (U.S. Route 62). No employees walk to work at IDC. The plant building, a roadway in front of the plant (known as the "Main Road"), dirt roads on either side of the plant, a walkway from the front entrance to the employee parking lot, the lot itself, the grounds around the plant, and the access roads to and from Route 62 are all located on company property. The access roads form a cloverleaf-type intersection with Route 62. The speed limit on Route 62 is 55 miles per hour. Much testimony and documentary evidence, including photographs, diagrams, and maps, were introduced concerning the physical situation at IDC. In addition, with the concurrence of the parties I personally visited the IDC premises, and I did so between 3:55 and 4:30 p.m. on October 20, 1982, a rainy afternoon when employees were leaving at the end of their workday (4 p.m.). On consideration of the evidence, including but not limited to my own observations, I find that there was no feasible way in which union organizers could communicate with employees at or near the IDC premises, without actually entering onto company property. The only suggestion offered by the Company is that the union organizers could have stood on the grassy right-of-way adjacent to Route 62 at points where the access roads intersect with Route 62. The evidence is inconclusive regarding the width of the right-of-way. I agree with the testimony of organizers Glather and Gilmartin, in sum, that any attempt to distribute union literature and talk to employees at these locations would have been dangerous and impractical. Vehicles leaving the plant approach Route 62 at a high rate of speed; indeed, they move at a steadily increasing rate of speed from the time they leave the employee parking lot. If they did not, there would be a backup. An organizer who attempted to distribute literature at the intersections with Route 62 would not only risk injury to himself (particularly at times of bad weather or poor visibility) but might cause a backup or collision between vehicles if a driver stopped to receive literature or ask questions. Many of the drivers were not employees, but individuals who came to the plant to drop off or pick up employees (e.g., spouses) and therefore might not be personally interested in stopping to talk to union organizers. Additionally, since October 1981 some employees have traveled to and from work by bus. As of the present hearing, approximately 25 percent of the IDC employees commuted in this manner. The buses dropped off and picked up their passengers at the front entrance to the plant. Therefore, there is no way that the organizers could distribute literature or talk to these employees in the vicinity of IDC without entering onto plant premises.[13] In these circumstances, the Union cannot be faulted for failing to attempt distribution on the right-of-way. There is no question that the Company would not in any circumstance permit union organizers to enter onto its premises to distribute literature or otherwise communicate with employees. As found, the Union formally requested such permission, but the Company failed to respond. Assistant Vice President Zimmerman testified in sum, that the Company does not permit outsiders to make solicitations on its property, and that such property includes the access roads and land adjacent thereto, as well as land on both sides of Route 62.

The next question presented concerns the feasibility of alternative means of communication away from the IDC premises. I shall first consider the use of the media (radio, television, and newspapers) and meeting locations. There are no television stations in the Warren area. The nearest stations are in Erie, Pennsylvania, and Buffalo, New York. Organizers Glather and Gilmartin testified in sum that the media was unsatisfactory for their purposes because they lacked personal contact with the employees, the Union could not determine which employees it was reaching, and the media could not be used expeditiously (i.e., radio time and newspaper space must be reserved). Additionally, radio and television were too expensive. Nevertheless, the Union attempted to use the local media, but was rebuffed in the process.[14] There is one radio station and one newspaper in Warren. There is also an advertising periodical. The newspaper and the advertising periodical refused to accept the Union's ads, ostensibly because they regarded the matter as one between the Company and its employees and not for public display. The radio station discontinued the Union's ads in January, ostensibly because of complaints from within the community. The Union used a country and western radio station in Jamestown, New York, although it was more expensive than the Warren station, and few company employees lived in the Jamestown area.

The Union held regular weekly meetings in a motel meeting room in Warren.[15] The Union also held meetings in employees' homes. There is no allegation that the Company interfered with these meetings by surveillance or in any other manner. However, the Union encountered difficulty when it attempted to rent an auditorium for a mass rally shortly before the election. There were few locations in the Warren area that were adequate for such purpose. The Union initially attempted to rent a semipublicly owned theatre, but learned that the requisite procedure was time consuming, and that if permission was eventually denied, the Union might be left with nothing. Eventually through the area Combined Labor Council, the Union was able to obtain a school auditorium the movie "Norma Rae," and an appearance by Crystal Sutton, the real Norma Rae. However, under conditions added to the rental agreement, the council was not permitted to use the auditorium as a "place of rally" or for the distribution of union literature. The Warren newspaper refused to accept union notices of the presentation. The day before the presentation, a news article referred to the presentation, but gave the wrong time.

This brings me to the alternative means of communication on which the Supreme Court in Babcock & Wilcox placed the greatest emphasis; namely, the use of home visits, mailings, and telephone calls.[16] Unlike the methods discussed above, these methods presuppose that the Union knows the names and addresses or telephone numbers of the employees. In the present case, compilation [13] The violations alleged in this case are continuing in nature (i.e., the Company refused and continues to refuse to permit union access to its premises). Therefore, developments since February 1981 may properly be considered in determining the feasibility of alternative means of contact.

[14] With respect to the charge in Case 6–CA–14403, the Regional Director administratively determined that there was insufficient evidence to proceed on allegations that the Company unlawfully prevented union access to the media by causing the local newspaper and radio station to cease or refrain from carrying the Union's advertisements. The General Counsel denied the Union's appeal, and thereby precluded litigation of such allegations in the present case. However, the refusal of the media to carry union ads, regardless of causation, may properly be considered in this case, because the Babcock & Wilcox standards are not limited to consideration of factors within the employer's control.

[15] I do not credit the testimony of organizer Gilmartin that these were simply organizing committee meetings. The Union informed employees through its mailings and by word-of-mouth that these were regular meetings that were open to all employees. In any event, the Union could have used the motel for general meetings if it wished, subject to limitations of space.

[16] In Babcock & Wilcox, the Court also referred the Union's ability to meet with employees on the public streets. In the case of IDC, that would not be a viable alternative. There are no public sidewalks near IDC, the employees eat and take their breaks on the Company's premises, and come from and return by vehicle to their homes, which are scattered over a large, semirural area.

of such information was no easy task. By the fall of 1980, the Union with the assistance of its employee organizing committee, compiled a list of the names of approximately 1200 employees, and the addresses of approximately 800 of those employees. The Union utilized its lists for house calls and mailing literature. However, the Union did not obtain a complete and accurate list of names and addresses until it received the Company's Excelsior list following the direction of election. In the meantime, the Union was constantly confronted with the need to maintain and update its lists. This was no modest task, in light of the large number of employees involved, and constant employee turnover.[17] Organizer Glather testified in sum that about 25 percent of the Union's mailings went to a wrong address or were sent to individuals who no longer worked for the Company. As found below, when members of the employee organizing committee attempted to assist the Union by copying names from timecards, the Company unlawfully disciplined them. In compiling lists of employees, the Union was heavily dependent on its employee committee. The predominantly female work force included many women whose telephone numbers and automobiles were listed and registered in their husbands' names. Therefore, telephone directories and auto registration records did not provide an adequate basis for obtaining employee names, addresses, or telephone numbers. The Union did not have any paid organizers within the plant. In these circumstances, it is significant, in considering the feasibility of alternative means of communication, that the Company countered the Union's organizational campaign with unlawful acts and conduct, which were directed at restricting communication by union adherents, and isolating and intimidating those employees. The Company thereby engaged in conduct that tended to increase the Union's need for communication by nonemployee organizers, while restricting the ability of prounion employees to assist the organizers (e.g., by furnishing them with the names and addresses of employees).[18] The Union's inability to maintain a complete and accurate list of names and addresses or telephone numbers of employees limited the effectiveness of home visits, mailings, and telephone calls.[19] The Union encountered additional frustrations when it went out into the field to make house calls.[20] During the lengthy campaign the Union made some 1000 house calls. However, the house calls were inadequate for establishing and maintaining contact with many of the employees. The employees' homes were scattered over a 40-mile radius from Warren, in a predominantly rural and hilly area of northwestern Pennsylvania and adjacent New York State. Most of the employees lived in Warren County. However, only about one-half lived in Warren, and many of these had rural addresses. The Company's Excelsior list indicates that nearly one-third of the employees gave rural delivery or box number addresses. Many employees were not at home when an organizer called. Some of the female employees were unwilling to accept visits from the male organizers while their husbands were at work or otherwise away from home. Moreover, even when home visits were effective to establish initial contact, the large number of employees, and the large area involved, precluded the use of house visits as a means of conveying the Union's position throughout the campaign. In contrast, it would have been relatively easy and inexpensive for the Union to convey its position (e.g., as it unsuccessfully sought to do with regard to the separation from employment of Carr and Race), by distributing literature and talking to employees as they left work at IDC. Indeed, the situs of employment would seem to be the logical place for such communication.

The General Counsel contends (Br. 76–78) that in part the Union is entitled to access to the IDC premises because, to a limited extent, the Company has permitted or tolerated the presence of nonemployees on IDC premises for nonbusiness-related reasons (e.g., former employees sometimes came to visit their friends). The General Counsel witnesses testified that food vendors sometimes came onto the premises, although Vice President Carter testified that such vending was not permitted. However, the General Counsel's argument misconstrues the Bab-

[17] At the representation case hearing in February, Assistant Vice President Zimmerman testified that the Company had an annual employee turnover rate of 50 percent. However, Zimmerman's testimony indicates that he included in this figure transfers between departments and plants. Figures introduced in evidence in the present hearing indicate that from February 1, 1980, through April 30, 1981, the Company hired about 190 employees within the election unit (i.e., excluding temporary help and retail outlet employees), including 102 at IDC; from May 1, 1981, through October 12, 1982, hired about 484 unit employees including about 155 at IDC. This would indicate an average annual turnover rate, excluding transfers, of between 15 and 20 percent. Zimmerman testified that over a 2-year period, approximately 250 employees transferred between departments, but not more than 25 transferred between Warren and IDC.

[18] Organizer Glather testified in sum that as the Company increasingly engaged in unlawful conduct, the Union lost the active support of its committee members, particularly at IDC, until it reached a point where Joan Hockenberry, who was herself a controversial personality, was the only employee who was actively and openly engaging in union activity at IDC. It is not necessary or proper for me to probe the employees' mental processes by determining whether, and if so why, the Union lost support among its committee members. Rather, for purposes of determining the feasibility of alternative means of communication, the question presented is whether the Company engaged in unlawful conduct that tends to coerce and restrain employees in the exercise of their Sec. 7 rights, and thereby reduce the opportunities for communication between the Union and the employees. See and compare Emerson Electric Co., 247 NLRB 1365–1370 (1980), enfd. 649 F.2d 589 (8th Cir. 1981); Michigan Products, 236 NLRB 1143, 1147–1148 (1978). As has been and will be discussed, I find that the Company did engage in such conduct.

[19] In Babcock & Wilcox, supra, 351 U.S. at 107 fn. 1, the Court noted that the union there had been able to contact a substantial minority of the employer's employees. However, Babcock & Wilcox, unlike the present case, involved an organizational campaign in its incipient stages. In the present case, the campaign was long underway, and the Union was attempting to establish and maintain itself as the representative of the employees in a unit that was much larger than that originally contemplated. Therefore, it was not enough for the Union to be able to reach a substantial number of employees. Rather, the Union would be seriously inhibited if as here, it was unable to communicate with or even locate or identify substantially less than all the employees.

[20] The municipality of Warren has a so-called Green River Ordinance, which prohibits door-to-door solicitation. No evidence was introduced that would indicate that the ordinance has been interpreted or enforced in such a manner as to prohibit union solicitation. With respect to the charge in Case 6–CA–14403, the Regional Director declined to proceed on an allegation that the Company unlawfully told employees to notify local law enforcement agencies if they did not want union home visits. The General Counsel denied the Union's appeal from this decision, thereby precluding litigation of this matter in the present case. I adhere to my ruling at the hearing in this regard.

cock & Wilcox standards. As indicated, the Supreme Court held that an employer may exclude nonemployee organizers if other channels of communication are available and adequate and the employer "does not discriminate against the Union by allowing other distribution" (emphasis added). The Court said nothing about the extent to which the employer opened his premises to the public for reasons other than such distribution. In Ameron Automotive Centers, 265 NLRB 511, 512 fn. 10 (1982), the Board held in essence, that an employer did not engage in discriminatory conduct under Babcock & Wilcox, by excluding organizers while permitting commercial vending on its premises. In the present case, the evidence fails to indicate that the Company permitted any other kind of solicitation or distribution. Moreover, Supreme Court decisions since Babcock & Wilcox involving retail establishments that are generally open to the public in a very real sense make clear that a union has no more right of access to the premises of such establishments than it does to those of nonretail firms that are not generally open to the public. See Central Hardware Co. v. NLRB, 407 U.S. 539, 547–548 (1972); Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507, 521–523 (1976). However, I agree with the General Counsel's argument that the Union's ability to conduct regular meetings at the motel was not an adequate alternative to access to the IDC premises. Attendance at union meetings presupposes an interest in unionization on the part of the attending employees, and the Union, under Babcock & Wilcox standards was entitled to a reasonable opportunity to generate such interest. Hutzler Bros., supra, 241 NLRB 914 fn. 2. Moreover, many of the IDC employees were dependent on other persons for their transportation to and from work. Therefore they may not have been able to attend union meetings in Warren.

On consideration of the evidence in this case, I find under Babcock & Wilcox standards, that notwithstanding conscientious efforts, the Union did not have a viable alternative to communication with IDC employees by entering IDC premises to distribute literature and talk to the employees. Therefore, the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) by excluding the organizers from its premises. As indicated, I am mindful of judicial reluctance to require such access. However, I am also mindful of the Supreme Court's admonition that this is not a problem of "always open and always closed doors," and that there should be an accommodation between organizational and property rights. As discussed, the courts have indicated greater willingness to require temporary access as a remedy for serious unfair labor practices. In the present case, the name of the game was communication. Propaganda on both sides was intensive. In finding that the Company unlawfully excluded union organizers from the IDC premises, I have attached great significance to the fact that the Company frustrated alternative means of communication by its own unfair labor practices directed against the employees. In these circumstances, I find that temporary union access to the IDC premises, coupled with company compliance with the recommended Order in this case, should provide an adequate remedy without unduly compromising the Company's property rights. Therefore, I am recommending that the Company be ordered to grant such access for a period of 6 months. I find that union access during this period, coupled with company compliance with the remedial order including provisions discussed above, would enable the Union to develop adequate alternative means of communication, and would allow sufficient time for establishment of conditions under which the employees can make an informed choice in a second election.

B. Alleged Violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) and Objections to Employer Conduct During the Critical Period from October 27, 1980, to June 9, 1981

1. Restrictions on employee talk

The complaint alleges (par. 8(b)) that about January 12, the Company by Finishing Area Supervisor Gern discriminatorily prohibited Joan Hockenberry from talking to employees during worktime. Hockenberry testified that on that date, she was working on the multiple packing line when the box boy came to her and asked questions about the Union. Hockenberry answered his questions while continuing to work. After the box boy left, Supervisor Gerns came to her and said that he did not want "anymore of that union arguing going on during working time." Hockenberry explained that she was not arguing, but was answering questions. Gerns responded that this was a warning, and the next time she would get a written warning. Gern initially testified that he did not recall the incident. Gern subsequently admitted that he might have told Hockenberry to stop talking about the Union on working time. Thereafter, Gern attempted to back away from this admission, asserting that he simply told Hockenberry to stop talking.

I credit the testimony of Hockenberry, and I find that Gern discriminatorily and in disregard of the Company's usual policy gave Hockenberry a verbal warning because she was talking about the Union. First, Hockenberry's testimony indicates that the box boy initiated the conversation, and that Hockenberry did not stop work while talking. If the box boy was neglecting his own duties, or was interfering with Hockenberry's work, then absent a discriminatory motive Gern probably would have reprimanded the box boy. Instead, Gern reprimanded Hockenberry, who had done nothing wrong. Moreover, absent a discriminatory motive, the subject matter of the conversation would be irrelevant. Nevertheless Gern pointedly, falsely, and in a disparaging manner accused Hockenberry of "union arguing" during working time. Therefore, the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by discriminatorily prohibiting Hockenberry from talking about the Union under circumstances in which company policy permitted other forms of conversation. Fluid Packaging Co., 247 NLRB 1469 (1980), enfd. 649 F.2d 860 (3d Cir. 1981). The incident further tends to indicate that as suggested by the testimony of Assistant Vice President Zimmerman, the Company was treating prounion conversation as union "solicitation," which, unlike other forms of conversation and solicitation, was strictly limited to lunch and formal break periods, and times before and after the employees' work shift.[21]

2. Denial of access to timecard racks and warnings to Joan Hockenberry, Sheila Mack, and Dawn Dickson

The complaint alleges (pars. 10(e), (f), and (g)) that in January and February the Company discriminatorily issued warnings to employees Joan Hockenberry, Sheila Mack, and Dawn Dickson. The incidents involved actual or apparent copying of names from timecards. Mack and Dickson worked at Warren and Hockenberry at IDC. Organizer Glather testified that he asked the three employees to get the names of employees from timecards, as part of a union effort to compile an accurate and complete list of employees for contact purposes. Mack and Dickson testified in sum that in late January, pursuant to Glather's request, they stood at the timecard rack during their lunch break. Mack read off names and Dickson wrote them down. They did not touch any cards other than their own. After they returned to work, Supervisor Mary Bloom approached each of them. Bloom accused each employee of tampering with the timecards, asserting that they could not do this. Mack and Dickson each protested that they did not touch the cards. Bloom did not indicate that this would excuse their conduct. However, no further disciplinary action was taken against them. Bloom, who was retired at the time of the present hearing, was not called as a witness, and the testimony of Mack and Dickson stands uncontradicted. However, Supervisor Gern testified concerning another incident involving Joan Hockenberry, which occurred at IDC about the same time that Mack and Dickson were warned at Warren. According to Gern, Supervisor Randall Chase reported to him that he saw Hockenberry standing in front of the timecard rack, lifting her head up and down, and writing. Gern reported the matter to Vice President Carter, who instructed him to give Hockenberry an oral warning, which he did. According to Gern, they did not discuss the reason for Hockenberry's conduct, but he suspected that she was doing it for the Union. Gern asked Hockenberry if she was writing down names. Hockenberry said she was not. Gern accepted the denial, but warned her that the cards were company property, and the information on the cards was not for anyone else's use.

On February 19 Gern received another report about Hockenberry. Supervisor Mark Wilson told Gern that he saw Hockenberry standing at the timecard rack with paper in hand, looking at the board, and writing down names. Gern summoned Hockenberry to the breakroom where, in the presence of Wilson, he gave her a written warning notice for "misconduct," which was placed in her personnel file. The warning implied, on the basis of Wilson's report, but did not directly state, that Hockenberry was copying names from the timecards. Hockenberry denied that she copied names, but Gern insisted, on the basis of Wilson's report, that she was observed engaging in such conduct. The next day, at Hockenberry's request, she met with Vice President Carter. Hockenberry again denied that she was copying names, and asserted that she was giving directions. Carter indicated that he did not believe her, and stated that the warning would stand.

Neither Hockenberry nor Supervisor Chase testified concerning the January incident. Hockenberry testified that she did not receive any warnings about the timecards prior to February 19. Supervisor Wilson was not presented as a witness. Hockenberry testified that prior to February 19 she copied names from the timecards for the Union, but that she was not doing this on February 19. According to Hockenberry, she was standing near the rack, holding her timecard and writing directions to an employee's house for the benefit of another employee who was making house calls on behalf of the Union. It is undisputed that whatever Hockenberry was doing, occurred prior to the start of the work shift (i.e., on nonworking time). Vice President Carter testified that the Company has a policy of not releasing names and addresses of employees, and that Hockenberry received a written warning because Supervisor Wilson saw her copying names. Assistant Vice President Zimmerman testified that the Company does not give out names, addresses, and phone numbers of employees for privacy reasons and because such information is sometimes sought to compile lists (e.g., for fundraising). Zimmerman also testified that new employees are instructed that they cannot tamper with other employees' timecards (e.g., by signing another employee's card). However, the evidence fails to indicate that employees are normally informed that they cannot look at other employees' timecards, or copy information from the cards.

I find, as admitted by Mack and Dickson, that they were engaged in copying names of employees from timecards for union organizational purposes. I further find that they were warned against engaging in such activity. Although Supervisor Bloom referred to tampering with cards, it is evident from the testimony of Zimmerman, Carter, and Gern that the Company regarded copying of names as tampering. It is also evident from the testimony of Gern, that by late January the Company had reason to believe that union adherents were engaging in such activity for organizational purposes. Regarding the January incident involving Joan Hockenberry, in the absence of direct testimony the evidence is inconclusive as to just what she was doing on that occasion. As Gern accepted her denial, I am proceeding on the premise that she was not then copying names, but was warned that she could be disciplined for engaging in such activity even if it involved union activity. Regarding the February 19 incident, Hockenberry was the only eyewitness to testify as to what she was actually doing. Gern's testimony is hearsay regarding the incident. Therefore, I credit Hockenberry, and I find that she was writing directions for the purpose of facilitating union visits.

I find that Mack and Dickson were engaged in protected concerted activity under Section 7 of the Act, and [21] The consolidated complaint alleges (par. 7(v)) that in early June 1981, the Company permitted employees to sell antiunion buttons while preventing communication about the Union. No evidence was presented in support of this allegation. Therefore, I am recommending that the allegation be dismissed.

specifically, that they did not attempt to copy information from private or confidential records. The timecards were located in open areas where they could be and were regularly viewed by employees arriving at work or leaving work. The only pertinent information on the cards consisted of employee names. They did not even indicate addresses. The timecards were used to record employee attendance at work, and to that extent were used to compute pay. Therefore, new employees were informed, as part of their orientation, that they could not sign other employees' cards. However, until the incidents described above, the Company did not inform its employees that they could not look at the cards or copy the names of employees. The employees had a legitimate reason to copy names (i.e., to facilitate lawful organizational activity), and the evidence fails to indicate that they sought the names for any improper purpose. Therefore, the activity was protected under Section 7. See Ridgely Mfg. Co., 207 NLRB 83 (1973), enfd. 510 F.2d 185 (D.C. Cir. 1975); Gray Flooring, 212 NLRB 668 (1974). I do not agree with the Company's argument (Br. 79) that the Board policy set forth in Excelsior Underwear, 156 NLRB 1236 (1966), precludes such finding. Ridgely and Gray Flooring, supra, were both decided after Excelsior. In Excelsior, the Board held: "A list of employee names and addresses is not like a customer list, and an employer would appear to have no significant interest in keeping the names and addresses of his employees secret (other than a desire to prevent the union from communicating with his employees—an interest we see no reason to protect)." (Id. at 1243.) That rationale is applicable to the present case. Moreover, the Board emphasized that the policy enunciated in Excelsior constituted an exercise of its authority to establish rules governing the conduct of Board elections, and did not preclude any finding, in an appropriate proceeding, that an employer commits an unfair labor practice by failing or refusing to make available the names and addresses of its employees (156 NLRB at 1245–1246).

I further find that the Company unlawfully interfered with Section 7 rights, and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, by giving oral warnings to Hockenberry, Mack, and Dickson and a written warning to Hockenberry. As discussed, the Company had reason to believe that the employees were engaged in union activity. Nevertheless the Company took the position that they had no right to copy names, regardless of the purpose. Therefore, it would have been futile for the employees to tell the Company that they were engaged in union activity. It is evident that this would not have changed the Company's course of action. The oral warning to Hockenberry was unlawful because regardless of what she was then doing, Gern in essence warned her that she could not engage in protected concerted activity, i.e., copying names for the Union. As for the written warning, Hockenberry's testimony indicates that she was engaged in undisputedly protected activity, i.e., giving directions for a union house call. Therefore, the warning was unlawful, either as interference with such activity, or as discipline imposed by the Company under the mistaken belief that she was engaged in other, albeit also protected activity. See NLRB v. Burnup & Sims, 379 U.S. 21, 23 (1964).

3. Surveillance

The complaint alleges (par. 7(p)) that about March 16 the Company by its supervisors engaged in surveillance of the union activities of its employees at IDC. The evidence indicates that on March 18 several supervisors watched from the window of the IDC reception area while employees Joan Hockenberry, Freeda Carr, Donna Fehlman, and Kay Davis distributed union literature in front of the plant. As the evidence indicates that the supervisors simply watched the distribution without engaging in any unusual conduct that might be viewed as coercive, I am recommending that this allegation be dismissed. See Metal Industries, 251 NLRB 1523 (1980).

4. No-trespassing policy against employees

On March 19, the day after the handbilling described above, Assistant Vice President Zimmerman sent a letter to Freeda Carr, advising her that "as a individual who no longer enjoys employee status" with the Company, "you are not permitted to enter upon New Process Company property without permission." Zimmerman asserted that should she do so, "we will be obliged to resort to legal recourse." The General Counsel contends that the Company thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

As found, the Company discriminatorily refused to reinstate Carr on and after October 6. Therefore Carr enjoyed the status of an employee under the Act, including the rights of an off-duty employee. Specifically, Carr was entitled, under Section 7 of the Act, to engage in union solicitation and distribution at parking lots, gates, and other outside nonworking areas of the Company's premises. Tri-County Medical Center, 222 NLRB 1089 (1976). Therefore, the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) by refusing to permit Carr to engage in such activity on its premises, and by threatening her with legal recourse if she engaged in such activity. The Company could not properly rely on the Regional Director's administrative refusal (on January 30) to proceed on her case. Rather, her status as an employee, and her rights as an employee (e.g., her right to vote in the election and her entitlement to reinstatement and backpay) are dependent, retroactively, on the ultimate merits of her case. Moreover, even after the General Counsel administratively determined that a complaint should issue based on the Company's refusal to reinstate Carr and Race, Zimmerman did not withdraw his letter or otherwise inform Carr that she could engage in union activity on outside nonworking areas. Assuming arguendo, that Carr's case did not have merit, then she would be entitled to the rights of a nonemployee organizer as discussed above.

5. Company speeches and other statements to employees

a. Statements alleged as unfair labor practices

In mid-November, Finishing Area Supervisor Gern assembled and spoke to small groups of employees about the Union. Joan Hockenberry asked to and did attend one of these meetings. According to Hockenberry, Gern said that if the Union came in, the Company would bargain for a contract, but did not have to start at the current rate, and "could start at the bottom." Gern testified that he did not say that the Company would bargain from scratch, and that he did not think he said that the Company would bargain from the bottom. According to Gern, he answered employee questions by referring to a booklet entitled "What every union free supervisor should know about unions." In pertinent part, the booklet stated in question-and-answer form as follows:

> Q. Is it possible that an agreemen between a union and an employer could call for less in wages and benefits than employees had before?
> A. Yes. An employer is under no obligation to agree to a union's proposals or to grant concessions to the union. The employer is only required to bargain in good faith. And bargaining can be a "two way street." Employees' wages and benefits can go up, but they can just as easily go down.

I credit the testimony of Gern that he read the above-quoted excerpt from his booklet. Hockenberry testified that he had a booklet in front of him when he was speaking. However, I credit the testimony of Hockenberry that Gern said that bargaining could start from the bottom. As indicated, Gern was somewhat equivocal about whether he made such a statement. In his investigatory affidavit to the Board, Gern stated that he did not remember saying that the Company would start bargaining at the bottom. Gern's testimony indicates that although he referred to the booklet, he did not limit his statements to the booklet text, e.g., when referring to the selection of union stewards.

Under Board law, employer statements to the effect that bargaining can start at the bottom, may or may not be unlawful, depending on the surrounding circumstances. "Such statements are objectionable when, in context, they effectively threaten employees with the loss of existing benefits and leave them with the impression that what they may ultimately receive depends in large measure upon what the Union can induce the employer to restore. On the other hand, such statements are not objectionable when additional communication to the employees dispels any implication that wages and/or benefits will be reduced during the course of bargaining and establishes that any reduction in wages or benefits will occur only as a result of the normal give and take of collective bargaining. White Stag Mfg. Co., 219 NLRB 1246, 1246-1251 (1975) (Member Fanning, dissenting); Computer Peripherals, 215 NLRB 293, 293-294 (1974) (Member Fanning, dissenting); C & K Coal Co., 195 NLRB 1038, 1038-1039 (1972). The totality of all the circumstances must be viewed to determine the effect of the statements on the employees." Plastronics, Inc., 233 NLRB 155, 156 (1977).

Applying the foregoing standard to the instant matter, I find that Gern did not unlawfully threaten the employees with loss of benefits. Gern told the employees that the Company could start at the bottom. However, by reading the quoted language in his booklet, Gern lawfully indicated that any losses would occur as a result of the normal give and take of collective bargaining (i.e., in the words of the booklet, that bargaining can be a "two-way street"). Therefore, I am recommending that the pertinent allegation of the consolidated complaint (par. 7(n)) be dismissed.

In mid-April, Assistant Vice President for Mailing George Stark assembled and addressed the department employees in small groups. Stark, who took charge of the department in January, testified that he conducted the meetings to answer the many employee questions about the Company's review system, raises, benefits, and other matters, which he found difficult to answer individually. Laurie Conklin Hockenberry, Joan's daughter-in-law, attended one of the meetings. Hockenberry testified that in response to employee complaints that typists were paid at a higher level, Stark said that the Company would like to raise the level of the machine operators, but could not at that time because it would be an unfair labor practice. (In her affidavit, she said that Stark said the Union might call this an unfair labor practice.) Stark testified that in response to the employee complaints, he said that he favored an in-depth review of the situation, but that such review and its results might be construed as an unfair labor practice. Stark testified that he did not believe he said that he would like to raise the level of machine operators. Stark explained that under company policy there could not by any general upgrading without an in-depth review. In fact, no such review was conducted even after the election.

I credit the testimony of Stark concerning his statement to the employees. Stark may have also expressed his personal opinion that the operators should get a raise. However, it is unlikely that Stark would have suggested that the Company favored such a move, because he was in no position to make such a statement in the absence of a complete study. The mailing department employees were not scheduled to receive either a general raise in grade level or a review of their situation prior to the election. Stark did not state or infer that the Union was preventing the employees from receiving a general increase in pay. He did not even promise that the employees would receive either a raise or a review of their situation after the election. I find that Stark correctly stated the applicable law, and that he did not, as alleged in the complaint, threaten the employees "with a loss of benefits because they selected, supported or joined the Union." Uarco, Inc., 169 NLRB 1153, 1154 (1968); Xidex Corp., 238 NLRB 1208, 1215-1216 (1978). Therefore, I am recommending that the pertinent allegation of the consolidated complaint (par. 7(r)) be dismissed.

During the week of June 1, company officials addressed captive audience meetings of employees who were assembled in groups of 20 to 25 at each meeting. The General Counsel contends that during the course of these meetings, Company Officials Robert and Steve Blair violated Section 8(a)(1) by telling employees that if they selected a union to represent them (1) they would always have to go through a shop steward to speak to a supervisor, and (2) that the Union would seek a closed shop and all employees in the bargaining unit would be required to join the Union. In support of these contentions, the General Counsel relies (Br. 26) on the Company's transcripts of its tapes of these meetings (previously discussed regarding the matter of Carr and Race).

I have examined and considered both the alleged unlawful statements and the context in which these statements were made. With reference to the first alleged statement, the Company correctly points out (Br. 43), that in each instance the speaker (Company Vice President Robert Blair) expressed his opinion of what the Union allegedly wanted; in sum, to come between the employees and management through the functions of a shop steward. However, the difficulty with the Company's premise is that Blair did not confine himself to this line of argument. Rather, Blair went on to suggest that if the Union came in, the employees would in fact be precluded from communicating with management except through a steward or business agent. The following transcript excerpt is illustrative (G.C. Exh. 31A at 8):

> The unions hate meetings like this, they just hate them. They want to turn management against the employees and they want to turn the employees against management. They'd like to have someone in here right now standing between us so we can't talk to you and you can't talk to us. They want to put somebody like a shop steward right in between us, or a business agent. If we wanted to talk to you, we'd have to talk to the steward and the steward would talk to you. And if you wanted to talk to us, and your supervisor and your department head or copersonnel, you'd have to go to the shop steward, the shop steward would come to us. They want to have somebody doing your thinking and your talking for you. We hope you won't let them do that; we hope you won't let them get control of your lives. We hope you don't need anybody to do your thinking and your talking for you. [Emphasis added.]

The plain implication of the above language, which was similarly stated by Blair in his other speeches, was that if the employees voted for union representation, the Union's alleged wish would become fact, and the employees would be deprived of direct access to management, contrary to Section 9(a) of the Act and the Company's existing open door policy. The Company thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) by threatening to deprive the employees of an existing open door policy. Cardio Data Systems Corp., 264 NLRB 37, 38 (1982); Tipton Electric Co., 242 NLRB 202, 205–206 (1979), enfd. 621 F.2d 890 (8th Cir. 1980).[22]

Regarding the closed shop allegation, the transcripts indicate that Vice President Blair repeatedly used the terms "closed shop" and "union shop" interchangeably. Thus, Blair asserted in the following or similar language:

> . . . there's some things that they [the Union] want first that right away they want a union shop and that simply means that's a closed shop, a union shop. That means that all employees in the bargaining unit, in the voting unit, would have to, would have to join the union whether they wanted to or now [sic]. That's what a closed shop is and unions want that.

The Company contends (Br. 47 at fn. 35), that such references were innocuous, and that in fact Blair defined both a "closed shop" and "union shop" in terms of a union shop as permitted under Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. However, the transcripts indicate otherwise. The transcripts indicate that Blair categorically equated lack of union membership for any reason with loss of employment, and that the employees would be subject to such conditions if they selected the Union as their representative. Thus Blair stated in the following or similar language (G.C. Exh. 30A at 12–13):

> We have here the UFCW International constitution and I'd like to quote from it. I have a copy in case you'd like to take a look at it later. I've taken some of the more important aspects out of it. Here we go: "Members may be disciplined for violating provisions of either the local or international bylaws, failure to pay dues, fines, assessments, fees, advocating withdrawal, disrupting meetings, mishandling funds, interfering with an officer in the performance of his duties, crossing a UFCW picket line, crossing other union picket lines sanctioned by UFCW. Any member found guilty may be censured, fined, suspended, expelled. Now if you're suspended, expelled—particularly if you're expelled—that means also that you lose your job, if, in the contract, a union shop clause is negotiated. And we don't know of a contract that we've seen that does not have a union shop clause in it. And the Company can have nothing to do with getting your job back. [Emphasis added.]

The above language goes substantially beyond the kind of misstatement of law that the Board has held to constitute objectional conduct for election purposes, but not an unfair labor practice. See Daniel Construction Co., 257 NLRB 1276 (1981). Rather, the evidence indicates that Blair threatened the employees that if the Union came in, the Company would negotiate a contract that would cause them to lose their jobs if they lost their union

[22] The company officials spoke at both Warren and IDC. The complaint, in its present form, alleges that the unlawful statements concerning union representation and closed shop were made at Warren. During the hearing, I denied the General Counsel's belated motion to amend pars. 7(t) and (u) of the complaint for a second time, this time to allege that the unlawful statements were also made at IDC. I anticipated that the General Counsel would present its evidence in the form of disputed testimony, and that it would be unfair to confront the Company with a new allegation at this point in the hearing. However, I ruled that the speeches at IDC could be used as evidence in support of the Union's objections to the election. In retrospect, it is apparent that the General Counsel was relying on the Company's transcripts, that the evidence was undisputed, and therefore that the Company would not have been prejudiced by the proposed amendment. Blair made substantially the same speech at IDC as he did at Warren, asserting that: "We have to talk to them through the stewards or the business agent and they'll talk to you. They want to get between us. We hope you won't let us, we hope you won't let them do that to you. We hope you'll vote no." I find that the Company thereby threatened its employees with loss of access to management if they selected the Union as their representative, and thereby, as alleged in Union Objection 2, interfered with the conduct of the election. See Hahn Property Management Corp., 263 NLRB 586 (1982).

membership for any reason whatsoever, and not simply because of failure to pay dues and initiation fees under a valid union-security agreement. In K-F Products, 170 NLRB 366, 367 (1968), the Board held that such statements constitute objectionable misrepresentations. K-F Products was a representation case, and the Board was not called on to decide whether such statements are also violative of Section 8(a)(1). However, in other cases the Board has held statements of comparable or even lesser gravity to constitute unfair labor practices. Thus, in H. A. Kuhle Co., 205 NLRB 88, 104–105 (1973), the Board held that an employer violated the Act by telling his employees that a checkoff clause "includes assessments the union may authorize." And in M. O'Neill Co., 211 NLRB 150, 151 (1974), enfd. sub nom. Retail Clerks Local 698 v. NLRB, 514 F.2d 894 (D.C. Cir. 1975), the Board held that an employer violated Section 8(a)(1) by telling an employee that a union contract would require a health examination that he could not pass. I find that the Company, by Blair, violated Section 8(a)(1) by threatening its employees with loss of job security under unlawful conditions if they selected the Union as their representative and that such threats also constitute objectionable conduct.

b. Statements not covered by the complaint, but alleged by the Union as objectionable conduct

As previously discussed, the Union's objections to the election are so broadly worded to encompass virtually every form of potentially objectionable conduct. During the hearing, I directed union counsel to specifically define conduct alleged to be objectionable, to the extent that such alleged con .uct was not already identified in the consolidated complaint or otherwise identified with specificity in the record of this proceeding. Union counsel did so in statements at the close of the General Counsel-Union case and at the close of the original hearing. These allegations consisted of numerous alleged unlawful or otherwise improper statements in company speeches and letters. I informed the parties that this statement was intended for informational purposes (i.e., to inform Respondent and the administrative law judge of the specific allegations), and that I did not regard the statement as a substitute for full legal argument, including citation of case authorities. Nevertheless, although the allegations are numerous, and in many instances novel (and, I might add, ingenious), the Union presented no further argument on the merits of its objections, either by way of oral argument or in its posthearing brief.[23]

Before proceeding to the specific allegations, two pertinent Board policies should be restated. The first, previously discussed, is that the Board dismisses as a matter of form, objections to an election that are mere reiterations of unfair labor practice charges that have been dismissed. The second concerns current Board policy on misrepresentations during an election campaign. In Midland National Life Insurance Co., 263 NLRB 127, 133 (1982), the Board held as follows:

> In sum, we rule today that we will no longer probe into the truth or falsity of the parties' campaign statements, and that we will not set elections aside on the basis of misleading campaign statements. We will, however, intervene in cases where a party has used forged documents which render the voters unable to recognize propaganda for what it is. Thus, we will set an election aside not because of the substance of the representation, but because of the deceptive manner in which it was made, a manner which renders employees unable to evaluate the forgery for what it is. As was the case in Shopping Kart, we will continue to protect against other campaign conduct, such as threats, promises, or the like, which interferes with employee free choice.

The Board further held that: "In accordance with our usual practice, we shall apply our new policy not only 'to the case in which the issue arises,' but also 'to all pending cases in whatever stage.'" Midland overruled General Knit of California, 239 NLRB 619 (1978), which overruled Shopping Kart Food Market, 228 NLRB 1311 (1977), which overruled Hollywood Ceramics Co., 140 NLRB 221 (1962). It is possible that by the time the present litigation has completed its course, Hollywood Ceramics will once again be revived as Board policy. In the meantime, I do not have discretion to choose between the "sound rule announced in Shopping Kart" (majority opinion in Midland) and the "flexible and balanced Hollywood Ceramics standard" (dissenting opinion). Rather, it is my obligation to apply the latest pronouncement of Board policy as set forth in Midland. That policy, in sum, precludes noncoercive misrepresentation as a ground for objecting to the conduct of an election, except under limited circumstances that are not present in the instant case.[24]

Most of the stated objections concern statements made by company officials at the captive audience meetings in early June. The Union contends that the expression "God forbid if the Union wins the elections" belied the Company's assertion that it would bargain in good faith with the Union and contained an implicit threat of reprisal. I do not agree. The above expression was immediately followed by an assertion that if the Union won the [23] This fact tends to demonstrate the wisdom of the Board's policy set forth in Times Square Stores, supra. Sound administrative practice is not effectuated when novel propositions of law are presented in litigation without benefit of consideration or briefing by the General Counsel. It could well be argued that none of the statements made in the captive audience speeches in June 1981 should be considered under this heading, because the speeches themseleves were the subject of the charge in Case 6-CA-14697. However, I have given the Union the benefit of the doubt, and have considered those allegations not expresly covered by the Region's dismissal letters.

[24] Under Board policy as set forth in General Knit and Hollywood Ceramics, "[A]n election should be set aside only where there has been a misrepresentation or other similar campaign trickery, which involves a substantial departure from the truth, at a time which prevents the other party or parties from making an effective reply, so that the misrepresentation, whether deliberate or not, may reasonably be expected to have a significant impact on the election." 140 NLRB at 224. In the present case, the Union might well have argued that under that standard, a substantial misrepresentation would be objectionable regardless of its timing, because at least in part by reason of the Company's unlawful conduct, the Union lacked the means to make an effect reply. However, the present case is controlled by Midland.

election the Company would bargain in good faith. I find that the speaker used a figure of speech that expressed the Company's strong opposition to unionization without conveying a threat of reprisal or promise of benefit and therefore did not engage in objectionable conduct. Compare Valiant Moving & Storage, 204 NLRB 1058, 1066 (1973), in which the Board held that an employer did not act unlawfully by asserting: "I'll be damned if a union gets in there. . . . You can't have a union in this shop."

The Union further contends that the Company unlawfully conveyed the impression that "if the Company had to bargain with the Union, the employees would be, in effect, stuck with certain provisions of these local supermarket contracts [Quality and Super-Duper] that would detract from benefits that the employees already had at NPC." With respect to the charge in Case 6–CA–14697, the Acting Regional Director administratively determined that "a review of the plain language used by Employer spokesmen fails to establish that the employees were, in fact, promised increased wages and/or benefits or that the employees were threatened with lower wages or a loss of jobs if they selected the Union to act as their representative." The General Counsel denied the Union's appeal from this determination, and thereby precluded litigation of the present allegation as a basis for objecting to the conduct of the election. However, for reasons that will be discussed, I find that the statements regarding area supermarkets are evidentiary with respect to the matter of the additional alleged discriminatees in Case 6–CA–15995. The General Counsel's disposition of the charge in Case 6–CA–14697 also precludes litigation of the Union's assertions that the Company (1) unlawfully stated that "every single decision that the [Board] has issued on these charges has been in favor of the Company and against the Union," and (2) unlawfully accused union representatives of forging authorization cards. If the Union is contending that the Company thereby engaged in something less than unfair labor practice conduct (i.e., misrepresentation), then such contention would be precluded under current Board policy. Moreover, the statements in question would not even constitute misrepresentation under Hollywood Ceramics. As of June 1981 the statement regarding disposition of charges was at least arguably true, depending on one's own concept of "decision." Concerning the matter of forged cards, there has never been any adjudication of this matter, and the Union failed in this proceeding to prove that the accusation was false. The Union cannot rely on the Acting Regional Director's administrative dismissal (sustained by the General Counsel) of the Company's charge in Case 6–CB–6241, as proof of falsity, because the facts are in dispute, and therefore there must be an evidentiary hearing on the matter before the Company can be found guilty of improper or unlawful conduct. See NLRB v. Lawrence Typographical Union Local 570 (Kansas Color Press), 376 F.2d 643, 648–649 (10th Cir. 1967). The General Counsel's administrative disposition of a charge may be used as a shield, but not as a sword.

The Union contends that the Company engaged in misrepresentation and an implied threat by asserting that "if the Union gets in here, it's going to cost you money." For the reasons discussed above, I find that the General Counsel's disposition of the charge in Case 6–CA–14697 precludes litigation of this statement as a threat, and Midland precludes a finding of misrepresentation. The Union further contends that the Company unlawfully solicited employee grievances when the speaker, at the conclusion of his opening remarks, asked the employees if they had any questions. The Union similarly contends that the Company unlawfully solicited grievances when the speaker, in response to an employee's complaints, told the employee that if she had such problems, she should call him on the phone and they would look into it. These contentions misconstrue applicable Board law. Solicitation of grievances is not per se unlawful; rather, such solicitation is unlawful to the extent that it carries an express or implied promise to correct the grievances to discourage support for the Union. Uarco, Inc., 216 NLRB 1 (1974). An employer does not violate the Act by reminding its employees of benefits that they already enjoy. Rather, this is legitimate campaign propaganda. In the context of the disputed statements, it is evident that the speaker was engaging in just such propaganda. The speaker simply answered questions about existing working conditions. With regard to his response to the employee's complaints, the speaker made clear that this was the Company's usual way of dealing with such problems, asserting "that's what we're going to continue to do." The speaker also indicated that he was not making any promises, asserting that "It may not be resolved in the manner that you want it to be resolved, but we're going to look into it." Therefore, I find no merit in these objections.

The Union further contends that the Company interfered with the election by its assertions, previously discussed in connection with the matter of Freeda Carr and Nancy Race, that the Union had been unable to obtain reinstatement of these employees. This contention is also precluded from litigation by the General Counsel's refusal to proceed by way of complaint on the basis of company statements to the effect that the Board had ruled in favor of the Company on the Union's charges. However, for the reasons previously discussed, the Company's statements are evidentiary with respect to the merits of the Company's refusal to reinstate Carr and Race. The Union also contends that the Company improperly misrepresented the Union's dues structure and history regarding fines. This contention is precluded from litigation by the Regional Director's refusal to proceed on the Union's charge in Case 6–CA–14615, containing those allegations, which refusal was sustained by the General Counsel; and is further precluded by current Board policy under Midland, supra.

The Union's next two contentions are interrelated. The Union contends that the Company interfered with the election when its offficial read aloud a letter from a named antiunion employee, and then praised the employee as "very sweet" and courageous. The Union contends that the Company also interfered with the election by a letter to its employees, dated May 11, in which it referred to prospective union stewards as "easily deceived and usually ill-informed . . . . [U]nlike the majority of NPC employees." The Union contends that the Company thereby demonstrated a tendency to vilify and demean prounion employees while lauding or rewarding antiunion employees. The Union argues that "the Employer is prohibited from favoring one group against another group whether it's pro- or anti-union." The argument is only partially correct. The Act prohibits an employer from favoring one group over another with regards to hire or tenure or terms and conditions of employment, or to discriminatorily restrict activity by either group. As found in this decision, the Company did in fact unlawfully discriminate against union adherents. However, the Act does not prohibit an employer from expressing its opinion concerning the pro- or antiunion activities of its employees, provided that it does so in a restrained manner, without harrassment or abusive language or actions that could properly be characterized as coercive, and without express or implied threats of reprisal or promises of benefit. Indeed, in some cases the Board has declined to find that an employer acted unlawfully by referring to union adherents in arguably abusive terms (e.g., by referring to them as "clowns," "trash," or "dumb-dumb"). See respectively Hospital Products, 245 NLRB 703, 707 (1979); Serv-U-Stores, 225 NLRB 37 fn. 7 (1976); Montgomery Ward & Co., 187 NLRB 956, 964 (1971). In contrast, the Company's language was moderate and restrained. I find that the Company did not exceed the limits of permissible propaganda, and that the objection is without merit.

The Union further contends that the Company interfered with the election (1) when the speaker allegedly adopted by reference, a statement in the employee's letter that, "if I belonged to the Union now, I could be heavily fined for just writing this," and (2) when the speaker asserted that an employee could be fined or expelled from the Union for filing a decertification petition. I agree that the statements were objectionable, because in the context in which they were made, they constituted unlawful threats of loss of job security. The statements were partially incorrect as a matter of law. A union may expel, but cannot fine a member for filing a decertification petition. Molders Local 125 (Blackhawk Tanning), 178 NLRB 208 (1969), enfd. 442 F.2d 92 (7th Cir. 1971). A union also cannot impose "heavy" (i.e., unreasonable) fines on its members for engaging in antiunion activity, such as the employee's letter (assuming that it can impose any fine at all, which is questionable). See Scofield v. NLRB, 394 U.S. 423, 430 (1969); Operating Engineers Local 965 (Elcon Pipelines), 247 NLRB 203, 210 (1980). The company official did not disavow any or all of the employee's letter. Rather, he read the letter with expressed approval, thereby indicating to the assembled employees that the Company endorsed the statements contained therein. As previously discussed, the Company made these statements in the context of the same series of speeches in which the Company conveyed the message that any collective-bargaining contract would provide for closed shop conditions under which loss of union membership for any reason would result in loss of employment. In context, I find that the Company unlawfully threatened its employees with fines and loss of job security if they voted for the Union, and thereby interfered with the conduct of the election.

The Union further contends that the Company unlawfully suggested that the employees form an independent union. I do not agree. In one instance, the suggestion was made by union adherent Joan Hockenberry, who asked the company official what the Company's policy would be if employees tried to form an independent union. The official's response, in sum, was that the Company was willing to "sit down and discuss anything that affects the employees of the company with the employees," but did not feel "obligated to sit down and discuss unionization, with some outsiders from Utica, New York." This was a lawful statement of the Company's position. It is not unlawful for an employer to state that it opposes one union or one kind of union, rather than all unions. The second and third allegedly unlawful statements had nothing to do with independent unions, but simply purported to be descriptions of the Company's existing policy for dealing with employee grievances. The Union contends that the Company unlawfully threatened that wages would be frozen according to classifications if the Union were successful and were to negotiate a contract. This contention is precluded by the General Counsel's refusal to proceed in Case 6–CA–14697 on allegations that the Company threatened lower wages. The General Counsel's disposition of Case 6–CA–14697, in which the General Counsel declined to proceed on allegations that the Company threatened plant closure and loss of jobs, precludes litigation of the Union's contention that the Company threatened plant closure in the captive audience speeches. The disposition of Case 6–CA–14697 also precludes allegations that the Company promised increased wages or benefits. The remaining objections as set forth in union counsel's statements on the record, comprise allegations that are substantially similar to those discussed above in this section. Except to the extent indicated, I am recommending that the Union's objections be overruled as being without merit, or precluded from litigation under Board policy. As indicated, I have recommended that most of the Union's allegations regarding the captive audience meetings and company letters be overruled. However, the speeches and letters are significant among other reasons, because they demonstrate that the Company was engaging in a barrage of propaganda covering the entire spectrum of issues important to the employees, at a time when the Union, by reason of the Company's unlawful conduct, was deprived of effective means of presenting its own arguments to all the employees.

6. Denial of union access to company premises

As discussed, the consolidated complaint alleges that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) by refusing to grant the Union's request of February 26 to handbill at IDC. For the reasons previously discussed, I find that the Company violated the Act, and I further find that the Company thereby interfered with the conduct of the election.

By letter dated May 7 to the Company, the Union requested an opportunity to respond to alleged "captive audience" addresses by Assistant Vice President Stark at Warren in April and by Supervisor Gern at IDC in November. The Union indicated that its request also applied to any future such meetings. The Company did not respond to the letter. As discussed supra, Gern and Stark did address groups of employees in November and April, respectively, at which they stated the Company's position with regard to matters relevant to the election campaign.

The General Counsel contends that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) by refusing to accede to the Union's request. I agree. In Montgomery Ward & Co., 145 NLRB 846 (1964), enfd. as modified 339 F.2d 889 (6th Cir. 1965), the Board held in sum that an employer violates Section 8(a)(1) during a union organizational campaign and while maintaining or enforcing an unlawful no-solicitation rule, by making antiunion speeches to employees during working hours on employer premises without according, on reasonable request, the union against whom the speeches are directed, a similar opportunity to address the employees.[25] For the reasons previously discussed, I have found that the Company maintained and enforced a policy that discriminatorily and unlawfully restricted employee solicitation on behalf of the Union. I do not agree with the Company's argument (Br. 40) that this allegation should be dismissed at least in part because the meetings conducted by Stark and Gern were not true "captive audience meetings" as alleged in the complaint. The Company correctly points out that employees were not required to attend the November meetings, and that although employees were summoned to the April meetings, Stark discussed a variety of matters. However, the Montgomery Ward rule applies to any antiunion speeches during working time on employer premises. The November meetings were conducted for antiunion speeches by Gern (albeit informal and to small groups of employees), and the April meetings featured antiunion statements on matters of substantial interest to the employees. I find that the Montgomery Ward rationale applies to those meetings. Moreover, the Union made clear that its request also applied to any future meetings. There is no question that the meetings conducted by company officials in early June were "captive audience meetings" in the strictest sense of that term. I find that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) by failing to grant the Union's request under the unlawful conditions that prevailed during the election campaign. Therefore, the Company also unlawfully interfered with the conduct of the election.

C. The Complaint in Case 6–CA–15995: Refusal to Recommend for Rehire, and to Rehire, Pamela Damon, Debra Nuhfer, Rhonda Gross, Barbara Morgan, Floyd Monticue, and Rebecca Stuart Walton

The General Counsel contends and the complaint in Case 6–CA–15995 alleges in sum, that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by refusing to recommend for reemployment, i.e., giving less than a "Yes" recommendation, to Pamela Damon, Rhonda Gross, Barbara Morgan, Debra Nuhfer, Floyd Monticue, and Rebecca (Bower) Stuart Walton on their voluntary separation from employment, and by refusing to rehire them when they subsequently applied for reemployment. The complaint further alleges that the Company violated Section 8(a)(4) insofar as the Company's actions were also allegedly based on the fact that Damon and Gross were subpoenaed to testify as witnesses for the Union in the representation hearing in February 1981. Morgan was allegedly denied employment in January 1981. The remaining alleged discriminatees all applied for reemployment after the election in June 1981. I find that Morgan's case may properly be considered as grounds for setting aside the election under Union Objection 4 (discrimination against union supporters). However, as the General Counsel is alleging, in sum, a pattern of unlawful conduct, it is necessary to consider all six cases together.

During the hearing on the consolidated complaint, the Company presented in evidence a list of names in its active file of former employees who reapplied for work during the period from October 1, 1981, through September 30, 1982. The General Counsel contends that this list includes the names of eight former employees who were identified as union committee members during their employment (Freeda Carr, the six alleged discriminatees in Case 6–CA–15995, and Donald Saporito), that all but Saporito were given less than a "Yes" rating, that the Company knew that Saporito was not an active committee member, that in contrast, nearly 40 percent of the employees on the entire list received "Yes" ratings, and that therefore the list reflects a pattern of discrimination against applicants who were active union adherents during their former employment. However, the General Counsel's reliance on this list begs the question. The Company would not know at the time each employee quit, whether that employee would eventually apply for reemployment. Therefore, any analysis must take into consideration the ratings given to all former employees who were identified as committee members, regardless of whether they subsequently applied for reemployment. The Company's records indicate that several committee members were given "Yes" ratings, including Martha Asp, Sheila Mack, and Fran Peterson, who were identified by organizer Dan Glather in his testimony, as being active union adherents. In contrast, several committee members who were allegedly not active union adherents were given less than favorable ratings. The General Counsel's contention is also based on a presumption that the Company knew precisely which committee members were not active union adherents. Although there is evidence of knowledge in specific cases, the evidence is insufficient to establish a general presumption. Moreover, the evidence is not always consistent with the General Counsel's theory even where knowledge is shown. Thus, Alan LaCava was given a less than favorable rating, although the Company knew that he had abandoned his early support for the Union. Therefore, it is necessary to examine the evidence with respect to the individual cases in order to determine whether, as alleged by the General Counsel, there was a pattern of discrimination.

[25] The Board's decision also applied to denial of access under a "broad privileged no-solicitation rule." However, that aspect of the Board's decision applies only to retail stores, as there is no broad, privileged rule applicable to nonretail businesses.

Barbara Morgan began her employment with the Company in October 1978. She worked in the mailing department at Warren, on the second shift. Morgan was generally rated as an average employee. Her attendance record declined somewhat after her first year, but was nevertheless rated as average. Morgan joined the Union in the summer of 1980, and was active on its behalf. She wore union insignia to work and once distributed union literature outside the plant. As found, Morgan was one of the union adherents who were subjected to harassment by Supervisor McWilliams when they wore union T-shirts to work. She was also one of the prounion mailing department operators who were segregated at their workplace. By letter to the Company dated August 21, the Union identified Morgan, Debra Nuhfer, Rhonda Gross, and another employee as members of its committee.

Morgan quit her job on September 25, 1980, in order to take other full-time employment. Morgan testified without contradiction that Supervisor Pauline Stec told her that she could use her accumulated 2 weeks' vacation time as notice. Morgan was rated for reemployment as: "Yes? No Notice Given." As discussed, Personnel Assistant Rodney Henry normally made these evaluations. However, Henry was not called as a witness at the reopened hearing. Assistant Vice President Zimmerman was the Company's only witness. Nevertheless, with respect to all six alleged discriminatees, Zimmerman failed to explain who made the evaluation, or the reason or reasons for the evaluation, or why the employee was not rehired. Instead, Zimmerman substantially confined his testimony to a recitation of what he regarded as "negative reemployment considerations" in each individual's personnel record. With respect to Morgan, Zimmerman was able to point out only one negative consideration, namely, her alleged failure to give notice before quitting her job. For the reasons discussed in connection with Freeda Carr, I find that this alleged consideration was false, and that in fact Morgan gave acceptable notice. Morgan's personnel record reflected the type of reliable worker that, according to Zimmerman, the Company normally sought. Morgan worked continuously for the Company for nearly 2 years, and she had an acceptable attendance record. At the least, she made an effort to give notice before she quit, in contrast to other employees, e.g., Chris Nuhfer, who simply stopped coming to work without giving any notice whatsoever, but were nevertheless recommended without qualification for reemployment. I find that absent a discriminatory motive, Morgan would have been given a "Yes" rating.

Morgan testified without contradiction that in December 1980 she telephoned Zimmerman and asked if she could get her job back, indicating that she would take "either shift or any job he had open." Zimmerman told her that she would have to come in and update her application, although the Company normally permitted former employees to update their applications by telephone. Zimmerman also told Morgan that the Company was not hiring, although in fact the Company was hiring temporary help in December. Morgan went to the personnel office to update her application and she subsequently called several times to indicate her continuing interest, but she was always told that they were not hiring. The Company's records indicate that she initially applied on December 19. Notwithstanding her asserted willingness to accept any job on any shift, the Company's records indicate only that she was interested in the second shift in the mailing department at Warren. Morgan was never told of any problem with her record. I credit the testimony of Morgan, and I find that the manner in which the Company, and particularly Zimmerman, dealt with her reapplication tends to indicate an unwillingness to accept her for reemployment. The Company's records indicate that the Company hired some 51 permanent employees during the period from January 5 through February 16, 1981, including 8 in the mailing department (day shift).

Debra Nuhfer began working for the Company in June 1976, and she continued in the Company's employ until she quit in January 1981. She worked in the mailing department. Nuhfer was generally rated as an average or slightly above-average employee. In 1978 her attendance was rated as below average, and in May 1979 and February 1980 she was given warnings for excessive absenteeism. However, in 1979 and 1980 her attendance was rated as average, and attendance was not listed as a weak point in her annual evaluations. In the summer of 1980 Nuhfer joined and became active in the Union. Nuhfer joined the organizing committee, attended union meetings, and wore union insignia at work. Her last day of work was January 16, 1981. She had been working part time for Quality Markets. Nuhfer testified that 2 weeks before she quit work, she told Supervisors Stec and Littlefield that she was quitting her job to work full time for Quality, because she was unhappy with her pay scale and would probably make more money at Quality. Thereafter, Nuhfer was summoned to a meeting with Stec and Assistant Vice President for Mailing George Stark, who asked her what they could do to help her remain with the Company. Nuhfer adhered to her decision. She complained that she was making less money than employees in other departments, and that her brother-in-law was making more money as a stock boy, although she had more seniority. Nuhfer was given a reemployment rating of "No. see REZ." Therefore, pursuant to company policy, Nuhfer was effectively precluded from reemployment with the Company. The notation "see REZ" indicates that Zimmerman personally made the decision to give her a negative rating. Nevertheless Zimmerman in his testimony simply referred to the "negative reemployment considerations" in her personnel file. Zimmerman testified that these considerations were (1) that her reason for leaving (i.e., "unhappy with rate of pay") was "not acceptable," and (2) that she failed to give notice. Zimmerman also noted the two attendance warnings in her file. Zimmerman's assertion regarding lack of notice was patently false. The personnel file does not contain any statement that Nuhfer left without giving notice. Zimmerman based his assertion on the fact that the file contains a memo from Stark, dated January 14, indicating that Nuhfer would be quitting on January 16. However, Nuhfer testified credibly and without contradiction that she gave 2 weeks' notice to Stec and Littlefield. Zimmerman admitted that the dates of such memoranda do not necessarily indicate the date of notice, because they may be written several days after notice is given. Moreover, entries in Nuhfer's personnel file tend to corroborate Nuhfer's testimony. The file contains a memo, dated January 2, which lists her grievances and states, that "She feels if nothing can be done she will give her notice and look elsewhere. Last night would be the 16th." The file also contains a memo from Stark to Stec dated January 6, consisting of a point-by-point rejection of Nuhfer's complaints.

Assuming that the Company were evaluating Nuhfer in a nondiscriminatory manner, it is difficult to see why her professed reasons for leaving the Company, either standing alone or in conjunction with other factors, would warrant a recommendation against reemployment. The Company's personnel records indicate that other employees who expressed dissatisfaction with their working conditions and/or left to obtain better employment elsewhere were given either "Yes" or "Yes?" ratings for reemployment purposes. Thus, Thomas Nansen, who "never seemed happy at NPC," and Judith Donnell, who was "not very happy with our line of work," and left to work in a restaurant, were each given "Yes?" ratings. Sandra Katzbauer, who quit to become a Tupperware manager, and William Brunecz and Dan Johnson, who each left for a "better job," were all given unqualified "Yes" ratings. (Johnson's file contains a memo indicating that he was quitting and his "last night is tonight.") See also my discussion of Mary Lou Rigby in connection with the matter of Freeda Carr, above. However, in the context of the organizational and election campaigns, including the Company's vehement and often unlawful opposition to unionization, the Company's motivation for its treatment of Nuhfer becomes apparent. Nuhfer was in effect, voicing the Union's position on issues that the Company regarded as crucial. The employees at Quality Markets were covered by a collective-bargaining contract with the Union. During the campaign the Company repeatedly argued that the terms and conditions of employment at Quality were unfavorable in comparison to those at the Company. Plainly the Company did not wish to hear or let it be known that an employee left the Company to make more money at Quality. Nuhfer's complaints about pay inequity also echoed the Union's position. Therefore, Assistant Vice President Stark attempted to mollify Nuhfer and persuade her to remain. However, once she left the damage was done. I find that the Company effectively precluded Nuhfer from reemployment by giving her a "No" rating in reprisal for what it regarded as her outspoken support for the Union. I further find, in light of her lengthy and generally satisfactory work record, that absent a discriminatory motivation the Company would have recommended her without qualification for reemployment.

On September 10, 1982, Nuhfer telephoned the personnel office to request reemployment. She spoke to Personnel Assistant Donna Farone. Nuhfer did not request any specific department or shift. She said that she would "even" work nights, not that she would only work nights. Nevertheless, the Company's records indicate that Nuhfer was "Int. in Nights—clerical or mailing." Farone discussed the reason Nuhfer left, but failed to disclose that this was a bar to her reemployment. Farone said that they were not hiring then. This was false. During September 1982 the Company hired a substantial number of employees to work nights in the mailing department. Specifically, the Company hired six employees on September 7, six on September 13, five on September 20, and four on September 27.

Rhonda Trawick Gross began working for the Company in July 1973. In September 1973 she left to return to high school. In January 1975 she returned to the Company and worked in the order handling department at Warren. In April 1977 she went on pregnancy leave, and she returned to work in January 1978, when she commenced working in the mailing department. Thereafter, Gross remained continuously in the Company's employ until February 12, 1982. Gross was initially regarded as a slow worker, but she progressed to the point where she was rated as average or above average in all categories, including average in quantity of work. Her annual evaluation for the year 1981, prepared in October of that year, described her as a fast and good worker, but indicated that her attendance needed improving. In fact, Gross' attendance record had gradually improved over the years, although it declined during 1981, when she had 14 absences totaling 16-1/2 days, including 4 days at the representation hearing. Her file does not contain any attendance warnings.

Gross joined the Union and its organizing committee, and by October 1980 she was actively engaged in the Union's campaign. She wore union insignia to work, attended union meetings, talked in favor of the Union to other employees, and distributed union literature at the Warren plant on three or four occasions during the period from October to January. Gross was present at the representation proceeding in February pursuant to union subpoena, but she was not called to testify. In February 1982 Gross was pregnant. However, instead of taking pregnancy leave, Gross informed the Company that she was quitting because of the pregnancy and because her husband had a good job. She was rated for rehire as follows: "No. See REZ. Not Happy Here." Gross' personnel file fails to disclose any basis for concluding that she was not happy in her job. On the contrary, her last annual evaluation indicated that she was above average in personality. In view of the notation on her file, it is evident that Zimmerman personally made the decision to recommend against reemployment, that he would know why the Company regarded her as "not happy here," and that this was at least the principal reason for his recommendation. Nevertheless, Zimmerman failed to explain the notation. Instead, Zimmerman testified, in sum, that the "negative employment considerations" were "the stability factor; the fact that she has already worked for us before at prior times, and the attendance factor." Both asserted grounds were patently false. Gross' record reflected the kind of stability and steady progress that the Company normally desired in its employees. Gross quit her employment on two occasions. The first time was in September 1973, when she returned to school. Perhaps I am being naive, but I consider it unlikely that the Company would regard as unstable or unreliable, a 17-year old person who left work at the end of summer in order to complete her high school education. Although Gross left work in 1979, she did so by taking pregnancy leave; and the Company's records indicate that the Company does not regard such leave as a quit. Thereafter, Gross worked continuously for over 4 years. As Zimmerman conceded in his testimony, it is quite common for employees to work more than once for the Company, and also common for employees among the predominantly female work force to leave for personal reasons (e.g., marriage, family responsibility, or relocation). Zimmerman further conceded that the Company does not regard such departures as indicating that the employee is "not happy here." The Company's records are replete with the names of employees who were recommended for reemployment, notwithstanding that they worked as many as three or four times for the Company, or who were given a "Yes" or "Yes?" recommendation, notwithstanding that such multiple employment was accompanied by other ostensibly negative factors such as a poor attendance record. For example, Carol Leach was given a "Yes" rating, notwithstanding that her personnel file indicated that she quit three times (possibly without timely notice on each occasion) in addition to two pregnancy leaves, and that she was described as a "good worker but attendance could have been better." Janice Muscaro, who quit her employment six times over a period of slightly more than 6 years, was also given a "Yes" rating. Mary Sherwood also received a "Yes" rating, notwithstanding that she quit three times and had an attendance record comparable to that of Gross. As for Gross' allegedly poor attendance record, the Company's records indicate that where attendance is regarded as a problem, the personnel office will normally make an appropriate notation with the recommendation on reemployment, regardless of the recommendation itself. However, in the case of Gross the only notation concerns her alleged unhappiness. Moreover, Gross' attendance record, even when considered with her employment history, was equal to or better than that of numerous other employees who received "yes" or "Yes?" ratings. I find in light of (1) the Company's vehement opposition to unionization, (2) its pattern of discriminatory conduct, including its refusal to rehire or recommend for rehire, Freeda Carr, Nancy Race, Barbara Morgan, and Debra Nuhfer, (3) Zimmerman's failure to explain the notation that Gross was "not happy here," and (4) the demonstrably false explanation given by Zimmerman for her negative rating; that Zimmerman gave her the negative rating because of her active support for the Union, which Zimmerman translated as reflecting a lack of happiness with the Company. I further find, in light of Gross' employment history and the comparable records of other employees, that absent a discriminatory motive, Zimmerman would have recommended her without qualification for reemployment.

Gross testified that in August 1982 she came to the personnel office and asked Personnel Assistant Farone about a job. Farone answered that there was no opening, whereon Gross responded that she would take anything they had. The Company's records indicate that on October 15, 1982 (by telephone), Gross said she was interested in part-time employment, and that she again expressed interest on November 8 and December 30, 1982. Farone did not testify in this proceeding. I credit Gross. As discussed, supra, the Company hired a substantial number of employees in the mailing department in September 1982. Zimmerman testified (apparently in reliance on the October 15 date), that since October 15, 1982, the Company has not hired anyone in the mailing department, except for one electronics technician. However, Zimmerman admitted that the Company has hired employees in merchandise handling (i.e., at IDC), and that these positions did not require any more training than that required for order handling or mailing.

Rebecca (Bower) Stewart Walton began working at IDC in February 1975 as an order filler in merchandise handling. In August 1975 she was denied leave for the purpose of taking an extended vacation. Instead she quit her job. She was recommended for rehire, and was rehired and returned to work in October 1975. Walton went on pregnancy leave in September 1976 and returned to work in February 1979. Thereafter, she remained continuously in the Company's employ until June 19, 1981. During her employment she worked both at IDC and Warren. She was generally rated as an above-average employee. Her file fails to disclose any criticism of her attendance. Walton testified that she joined the Union and its organizing committee in February 1980, and that she frequently wore union insignia to work. The record fails to indicate that the Union ever notified the Company that Walton was a member of its committee. However, Walton served as a union observer at the June 9 election. Shortly after the election the Company requested volunteers for temporary layoff. Walton volunteered, and was laid off on June 19. About October she was recalled to work. However, in the interim Walton had remarried and her husband was transferred to Erie, Pennsylvania. Walton so informed the Company, and said she could not return to work. Walton's rating for reemployment was: "No? Doubt if she would be happy here." As with Rhonda Gross, her personnel file fails to disclose any basis for this conclusion, and Zimmerman failed to explain the notation in his testimony. Rather, her personnel file indicates that she was regarded as an employee who "can be depended upon to get the job done quickly, neatly and accurately," and a "fast learner who is willing to help out where needed" and who "works well with others." Zimmerman was able to come up with only one "negative reemployment consideration," namely, her "stability . . . because of the three prior quits." In fact, Walton quit only twice, as the third absence was an extended pregnancy leave. Walton's personnel file indicates that she was a longtime employee with a good work and attendance record, who was scrupulous in keeping the Company informed of planned departures from work. Her record for "stability" compared favorably with that of numerous other employees who received "yes" ratings. For example, Michelle Booth, Barbara Boutelle, Pamela Grettenberger, Georgia Leonard, and Sheryl Dipierro were all given "yes" ratings, notwithstanding a demonstrated proclivity to repeatedly quit their employment for a variety of reasons. Walton's negative rating, when considered with that of other active union adherents, tends to indicate a pattern of evaluation for such employees. Thus, during the election campaign Debra Nuhfer was ostensibly disqualified because she was unhappy with her rate of pay. Shortly after the election, the Company disqualified Walton because it doubted that "she would be happy here." Eight months after the election, the Company disqualified Rhonda Gross because she was "not happy here." It is evident that the Company equated active support for the Union with lack of happiness with nonunion conditions at the Company, and used this equation as an excuse for disqualifying the employees from future employment. I find that the Company gave Walton an adverse rating in reprisal for her active union support, as manifested most recently by her service as a union observer, and thereby rendered reemployment unlikely. I further find in light of her own record and comparable records of other employees that absent a discriminatory motive the Company would have recommended her without qualification for reemployment.

Walton testified that in June 1982 on returning to her home area of Youngsville, Pennsylvania, she telephoned the personnel office about reemployment. According to Walton, a woman (probably Farone) told her that she did not have to come to the plant to update her application, that her card would be placed in the active file, but that the Company was not then hiring. Walton said that she would work either shift or plant, but preferred IDC. Walton testified that she called several times thereafter, but was always told that they were not hiring, except on one occasion in early 1983, when Personnel Assistant Henry told her that the Company was obligated to first hire temporary employees who worked during the holiday season. No other evidence was adduced in this proceeding that would indicate that the Company had such a policy. The Company's records indicate that Walton inquired about reemployment on August 31, September 22, and December 6, 1982, and on March 7, 1983, and that she indicated willingness to work at either plant, including part time, but preferred IDC. I credit the testimony of Walton. However, as the complaint alleges that she was denied reemployment about August 31, 1982, I shall use that date as the date of her initial request. As discussed, supra, the Company has hired employees at both Warren and IDC since that date.

By letter dated October 1, 1980, the Union notified the Company that Pamela Damon and Floyd Monticue were members of its organizing committee. Damon began working in the mailing department in January 1977. In May 1977 she quit because she was moving to Corry, Pennsylvania. In March 1979 she was rehired and returned to work as an order filler at IDC. In September 1979 she received a warning memorandum for unsatisfactory attendance. In November 1979 she quit in order to take another job in Corry. At that time Damon was given a recommendation for rehire, subject to review of her attendance. In February 1980 Damon was rehired with her promise that she would make a good attendance record. However, her subsequent attendance record was still rated as deficient. In her annual evaluation for 1980, prepared in January 1981, Damon was rated as below average in attendance, and the evaluation indicated that her "attendance could improve." During the evaluation year she had 11 absences totaling 14 days. Otherwise she was generally rated as an above-average employee. Damon testified that she joined the Union and the organizing committee in September 1980. In December she was subpoenaed by the Union for a representation hearing on December 11 (on the first union petition). She was present at the hearing but was not called to testify. She was again subpoenaed by the Union for the representation hearing in February 1981. She was present throughout the hearing and testified as a union witness. In September 1981 Damon again wished to leave her employment. Damon's husband had obtained a temporary second job that promised training for a new skill, and she wished to remain home rather than hire a babysitter. Damon testified that she gave 2 weeks' notice to her supervisor, Ernie Dollinger. However, Dollinger suggested that she apply for a leave of absence. By memo dated September 1, 1981, Damon formally requested a leave of absence from September 7 to November 1, 1981. Vice President Carter and Assistant Vice President Zimmerman rejected the request, indicating that Damon would have to quit and then reapply when she was available. Damon followed this course. She left work on September 4. She was given a "No" rating, with the comment: "Has worked 3 times in 4 years—unstable. Also attendance should have been better."

Damon testified that beginning in November 1981 she contacted the personnel office, spoke to Donna Farone, and requested reemployment. She asked for temporary work during the Christmas season, but was told that the Company already hired its temporary help. Damon expressed a preference for IDC on any shift. Damon testified that in August Zimmerman told her that the Company had a lot of applicants and was not then hiring. The Company's records indicate that Damon inquired about reemployment on November 23, 1981, and August 20, 1982.

Zimmerman testified that the negative reemployment considerations in Damon's file were (1) stability, in that she worked three times for the Company, (2) poor attendance record, and (3) failure to give notice when she quit in September 1981. Zimmerman based this last assertion on a file memo, dated September 3, indicating that Damon's last day of work would be September 4. As discussed above, Zimmerman admitted that such memos are not a reliable indication of lack of notice. Moreover, Damon testified that she gave 2 weeks' notice and Zimmerman knew by reason of her request for leave that she had to leave work. I credit Damon, and I find that Zimmerman knew that she gave advance notice of her departure.

Damon's situation presents a closer case than those discussed above. Unlike those cases, Damon's does not involve evidence in the form of overt discriminatory words or actions against the employee, unexplained evaluations that tend to indicate discriminatory motive, or alleged negative considerations that totally or substantially lack any factual basis. However, Damon's evaluation, when viewed in the context of those of employees with comparable records, tends to indicate that the Company was applying a double or even triple standard, by holding active union adherents to a higher standard, and antiunion employees to a lower standard, than that normally followed in evaluating departing employees. The case of Chris Nuhfer has already been discussed in connection with Freeda Carr. During the evaluation period from July 1980 to July 1981, Nuhfer had 14 absences totaling 29 days (i.e., a worse record than that of Damon), and she was also rated as below average in attendance. Nevertheless, Nuhfer was recommended for rehire when her name was removed from the personnel roster. Typically, employees with records comparable to that of Damon are given "Yes?" (i.e., qualified recommendations for reemployment), although some (heretofore discussed) were recommended without qualification. The records of Ruth Ann Walter, Donna Hice, Linda Wilhelm, Sandra Morse, Normajean Driscoll, and Katherine Correlli (all given "Yes?" ratings) are illustrative. I find that but for her activities on behalf of the Union, including her testimony at the representation hearing, Damon probably would have received a "Yes?" rating. Since November 23, 1981, the Company has hired very few former employees who have less than a "Yes" rating. With respect to positions at IDC for which Damon would be qualified, the Company's records indicate that on August 3, 1982, the Company hired Elyane Blaire, a former employee with a "No?" rating, for the day shift in merchandise handling. At Warren, the Company on August 20, 1982, hired Laurie Crossley, a former employee with a "Yes?" rating, for the day shift in merchandise handling, and on August 25, 1982, hired Amy Paden, a former employee with a "No" rating, for the night shift in mailing.

Floyd Monticue began his employment with the Company in May 1977, and he continued to work for the Company until he quit on May 15, 1981. He worked as a mechanic in the mailing department. Monticue testified that he joined the organizing committee and wore union paraphernalia. Monticue also testified that Supervisor Pauline Stec accused him of wasting time in the parking lot by talking to Rhonda Gross about the Union, and questioned him about why he supported the Union. However, in his investigatory affidavits Monticue stated that no one from the Company ever spoke to him about his support for the Union, that Stec never told him that he was not supposed to speak to Gross because she was a union supporter, and that he joined the Union after the incident involving Gross. Therefore, I do not credit Monticue's testimony concerning his alleged conversation with Stec, and I find that although the Company was on notice that Monticue was a member of the organizing committee, no one from the Company ever spoke to him about his union activity.

Monticue testified that he quit his job on May 15, 1981, because the "pressure was too great." Monticue went to work for National Forge Company in Irvine, Pennsylvania. His new job paid substantially more than he was earning at the Company. The Company's records indicate that Monticue quit in order to work at National Forge. Monticue was given a "No" rating, unaccompanied by any explanatory notations. Monticue testified that he was laid off at National Forge in January 1982, recalled in May 1982, and laid off again in July 1982. Monticue further testified that probably in the winter of 1982–1983 he initially contacted the Company about reemployment. According to Monticue, he told Zimmerman that he was laid off and looking for work, and would take anything, but that Zimmerman said there was nothing, and the personnel office subsequently told him they were not hiring. The Company's records indicate that Monticue inquired about reemployment on September 15, November 10, and December 7, 1982, and on February 1, 1983, and that he expressed willingness to work in either building on any shift, but preferred maintenance or janitorial work.

Assistant Vice President Zimmerman testified that the negative reemployment considerations reflected in Monticue's file were (1) an incident of reported violence between Monticue and then mechanic Charles Martin in October 1978, (2) a workmen's compensation claim by Monticue in September 1977, which was subsequently denied, and which, on the basis of the Company's investigation, did not involve any injury at work, (3) a probability that Monticue would return to National Forge if he were recalled from layoff, and (4) a poor attendance record. The fourth alleged consideration is contradicted by Monticue's personnel file. Monticue's attendance was evaluated as average for the period from May 11, 1980, to May 11, 1981, when he had seven absences totaling 14 days (including 5 days hospitalization and 4 days when his home burned), and as above average for the period from May 11, 1979, to May 11, 1980, when he had four absences totaling 28 days (including 25 days for surgery). Monticue's file fails to indicate any attendance warnings. On the contrary, until 1981 his attendance was always rated as above average, superior, or outstanding. Zimmerman testified that the Company expects that an average employee will have 5 or 6 absences per year, and that 10 to 12 incidents of "call-in absences" would be regarded as excessive, but that a prolonged absence (e.g., for pregnancy) would not be held against the individual. Therefore, even by this professed standard, Monticue's attendance record would be regarded as acceptable. The third alleged consideration, based on Monticue's layoff in July 1982, plainly had nothing to do with his evaluation in May 1981.[26] Moreover, as previously discussed in connection with Debra Nuhfer, the Company does not reject applicants for reemployment because they left the Company to obtain better jobs elsewhere. For example, Ernest Carlson, who quit the Company in September 1981 to work for National Forge, was given a "Yes" rating for reemployment. The first and second alleged considerations are demonstrably pretextual, when viewed in light of Monticue's overall record and evaluations of employees who engaged in similar alleged misconduct. Both matters occurred early in Monticue's employment. He filed the compensation claim while still a probationary employee. Therefore, it is probable that the Company would have terminated Monticue if it believed that he committed a serious offense. Instead the Company gave him a raise and made him a permanent employee. The second incident, which did not involve injury to either employee, occurred in October 1978. Notwithstanding both incidents, which were documented in his file, the Company in January 1980 placed Monticue in charge of a group of mechanics on the night shift, in effect as an assistant foreman to Supervisor Randy McWilliams. Monticue subsequently asked to be taken off this job. If the Company refused to recommend Monticue for reemployment because it viewed him as an individual who could not control his temper or who would knowingly cheat the Company, then it is unlikely that given the same information, it would have promoted him to a position of responsibility over other employees.[27] Moreover, the Company's negative recommendation on Monticue contrasts with its treatment of personnel who were involved in comparable or more serious incidents. See the discussion of Laura Zaffino in connection with the case of Nancy Race, above. See also the discussion of the Company's failure to discipline Supervisor Randy McWilliams for his assaults on prounion employees. Additionally, in June 1980 the Company gave former employee Shawn Jukes a "Yes?" rating for reemployment, notwithstanding that her personnel file indicated that she (1) apparently forged a dental appointment slip in order to get time off from work, (2) had an attendance record that was rated as unsatisfactory, and (3) suffered from poor health that limited her ability to perform her job.

As discussed, I find that two of the four asserted negative considerations lacked any credible factual basis, and that all of them were pretextual.[28] It is evident that the Company regarded Monticue as a competent and reliable employee. I find, in light of Monticue's overall employment record, the false and pretextual reasons advanced by Zimmerman for his negative rating, the comparable records of other employees, and the discriminatory pattern of conduct that is evidenced by the Company's treatment of the other alleged discriminatees, that but for his union activity, Monticue would have been rated as eligible for reemployment. As discussed, the Company has hired employees since September 15, 1982, in positions for which Monticue would be qualified.

In sum, the evidence indicates that for discriminatory reasons, the Company effectively precluded Damon, Gross, Nuhfer, Walton, and Monticue from consideration for reemployment by recommending against their employment. The Company's course of conduct with respect to Barbara Morgan, including an unwarranted qualified rating, further indicates that the Company was, for discriminatory reasons, also refusing to consider her application for reemployment. I am not persuaded that there is no basis for finding discrimination because some union adherents were recommended for reemployment or because the Company did not discriminate against union adherents in every conceivable manner (e.g., by denying them pay raises, transfers, or promotions). The evidence indicates that most of the active committee members who quit their jobs were given qualified or unfavorable ratings for reemployment. With respect to the six alleged discriminatees in Case 6–CA–15995, the evidence indicates that the Company knew that they were active on behalf of the Union and that the professed "negative reemployment considerations" in their files were for the most part demonstrably false or otherwise pretextual. Two of the personnel files (Gross and Walton) contain unexplained entries that indicate that their negative ratings were based on their active support for the Union. As discussed, the Company is a large employer in a predominantly rural area, with a work force that includes many employees who have worked more than once for the Company. It is evident that the prospect of reemployment is an important consideration for the employees, and that the discriminatory denial of reemployment, or consideration for reemployment, is conduct that would tend to intimidate not only active union adherents, but also any employees who might otherwise be inclined to become active on behalf of the Union.

I agree with the Company that on the basis of the evidence in this proceeding, it is not possible to determine whether in fact, and if so when, the Company would have rehired the six discriminatees. As found, the Company discriminatorily refused to consider them for reemployment, thereby depriving them of an opportunity to compete with other applicants. Where, as here, a respondent employer or union has engaged in misconduct that might have prevented an employee from obtaining or regaining a job, but the evidence is inconclusive on this point, the Board will normally resolve the doubt against the wrongdoer rather than against the wronged employee. Therefore the Board will find that the employee was discriminatorily denied employment, and will direct that the employee be offered employment with backpay from the time that a job became available for which the employee was qualified. Yong Hinkle Corp., 244 NLRB 264, 268 (1979); Alexander's Restaurant & Lounge, 228 NLRB 165, 179 (1977), enfd. 586 F.2d 1300 (9th Cir. 1978); Madison South Convalescent Center, 260 NLRB 816, 832 (1982); Associated Truck Lines, 239 NLRB 917, 921 (1978), enfd. as modified 653 F.2d 241 (6th Cir. 1981).

I find that the Company discriminatorily refused to recommend for rehire, and to rehire, Morgan, Gross, Nuhfer, Walton, Damon (as qualified herein), and Monticue, because of their known and active support for the Union. The Company thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. As that support included the presence of Damon and Gross as prospective union witnesses in the representation proceedings, and Damon's testimony on behalf of the Union, I find that the Company also violated Section 8(a)(4). NLRB v. AA Electric Co., 405 U.S. 117, 124–125 (1972); Royal Mfg. Co., 177 NLRB 264, 266 (1969). The General Counsel submits (Br. 95) that the dates of rehire should be left for determination at the [27] In his May 1981 evaluation, the Company criticized Monticue as being antagonistic toward other employees. Nevertheless, Monticue was rated as above average in personality.

[28] In view of the foregoing findings, I find it unnecessary to decide whether by reason of Federal of state law, the Company was precluded from taking any adverse action against Monticue by reason of the fact that he filed a workmen's compensation claim that the Company considered to be false. See Firestone Textile Co. v. Meadows, 114 LRRM 3559, 3561 (D.C. Ky. 1983).

compliance stage of this proceeding. However, the evidence adduced in this proceeding affords an adequate basis for determining when, after their respective reapplications, positions became available for which the discriminatees were qualified. I find that the discriminatees were entitled to reemployment and are entitled to backpay as follows: Barbara Morgan, who initially reapplied on December 19, 1980, was entitled to employment as of December 29, 1980, when the Company hired employees for merchandise handling. (Although most were hired as temporary help, the Company hired a substantial number of permanent employees in January 1981.) Debra Nuhfer, who initially reapplied on September 10, 1982, was entitled to reemployment as of September 13, 1982, when the Company hired six employees in the mailing department. Rhonda Gross, who initially reapplied some time in August 1982, was entitled to employment as of September 7, 1982, when the Company hired six employees in the mailing department. Rebecca Walton, who for reasons discussed is regarded as having initially reapplied on August 31, 1982, was also entitled to employment on September 7, 1982. (Walton expressed a preference for IDC, but did not exclude work in the mailing department.) Pamela Damon, who initially applied for reemployment on November 23, 1981, but whose record fell short of the Company's normal standard for a "Yes" rating, was entitled to employment as of August 3, 1982, when the Company hired a former employee with a "No" rating for merchandise handling. Floyd Monticue, who initially reapplied on September 15, 1982, was entitled to employment as of September 20, 1982, when the Company hired five employees in the mailing department. (Monticue expressed a preference for maintenance or janitorial work, but did not exclude any other kind of work.)

V. CONCLUDING FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS WITH RESPECT TO THE OBJECTIONS TO THE ELECTION; AND THE UNION'S REQUEST FOR A REMEDIAL BARGAINING ORDER

The Union objected to the election on the grounds that the Company engaged in the following enumerated alleged misconduct.

1. Conducted or aided in illegal pool of the employees concerning their sympathies in the election.
2. Threatened reprisals and intimidated and coerced employees concerning union activities.
3. Granted, promised, and/or withheld raises, bonuses, and other rewards.
4. Discriminated against supporters of the Union.
5. Discriminated against employees who have testified on behalf of the Union.
6. Engaged in surveillance of union supporters and other employees.
7. Misrepresented material facts concerning the nature, organization, and operations of the Petitioner and other matters.
8. Generally vilified the Union, its officers, and agents.
9. Solicited the grievances of employees and promised to remedy them.
10. Solicited antiunion support from individual employees.
11. (withdrawn)
12. Discharged or refused to rehire Freeda Carr and Nancy Race on account of their union activities.
13. Prevented union access to its property in order to communicate with employees, and denied employees the use of company bulletin boards for union materials, and interfered with the Union's use of the media.
14. Mischaracterized the Labor Board and its processes.
15. Instilled in employees the fear of plant closure if the Union won.
16. Conducted captive audience meetings while maintaining rules against distribution and solicitation, and denied union representatives an opportunity to respond.
17. And in other ways has interfered with the free choice of employees in selecting a collective-bargaining agent.

Objection 1 is overruled for failure of proof of such conduct during the critical period. Objection 2, which is broad enough to cover any violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, is sustained by reason of the Company's threats to deprive its employees of access to management, and of loss of job security under closed shop conditions, and is further sustained to the extent specifically found under other objections. Objection 3 is overruled for the reasons set forth in section IV,B,5,b of this decision. Objection 4 is sustained by reason of the following unlawful conduct during the critical period: discriminatory prohibition (directed to Hockenberry) against talking about the Union; denial of access to the timecards, the oral warnings to Hockenberry, Mack, and Dixon, and the written warning to Hockenberry; denial of access by Freeda Carr to IDC premises; and refusal to rehire Barbara Morgan.[39] Objection 5 is overruled for failure of proof of such conduct during the critical period. Objection 6 is overruled for failure of proof of such conduct during the critical period, as discussed in section IV,B,3 above. Objection 7 is overruled for the reasons discussed above. Objection 8 is overruled for failure of proof of any such conduct that would constitute grounds for setting aside an election under appropriate Board law. Insofar as such vilification would rise to the level of threats, they are covered under Objection 2. Objection 9 is overruled for failure of proof, as discussed in section IV,B,5,b, above. Objection 10 is overruled in accordance with my ruling at the hearing. (See Tr. 698, 702, 704.) Objection 12 is overruled, as the objection is predicated on events that occurred prior to the critical period. Objection 13 contains three allegations. The first is sustained by reason of the Company's unlawful refusal to grant the Union's request for access in February 1981. The second is overruled as based on events that occurred prior to the critical period. The third allegation is precluded by the General Counsel's refusal to proceed on such allegations by way of complaint. Objections 14 and 15 are overruled for the reasons discussed in section IV,B,5,b. Objection 16 is sustained for the reasons discussed in section IV,B,6, supra. Objection 17 is overruled for failure of proof of any other unlawful or improper conduct that would constitute grounds for setting aside the election.

In sum, I am recommending that Union Objections 2, 4, and the first part of 13 and 16 be sustained, and that the remaining objections be overruled. The objectionable conduct included unfair labor practices that tend to seriously impede the right of employees to communicate with, and to receive communication from, the Union. The conduct also included discriminatory personnel actions, including denial of employment, against active union adherents. The objectionable conduct also included threats of loss of job security and denial of access to management, which threats were communicated by top company officials in a series of captive audience meetings at both the Warren and IDC plants. These unfair labor practices occurred against a background of other unlawful conduct that occurred or commenced prior to the filing of the first election petition and that involved violations of comparable gravity, the effect of which continued throughout the critical period. These earlier violations lend "meaning and dimension" to the unlawful conduct during the critical period. Dresser Industries, 242 NLRB 74 (1979). Conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) is, all the more, conduct that interferes with the exercise of a free and untrammeled choice in the election. Therefore, the Board will normally direct a new election whenever an unfair labor practice occurs during the critical period, unless the violations are such that it is virtually impossible to conclude that they have affected the results of the election. Enola Super Thrift, 233 NLRB 409 (1977). The Company's unfair labor practices constitute the kind of conduct that warrants setting aside an election. Therefore, I am recommending that the election be set aside on the basis of Union Objections 2, 4, 13, and 16.

The Union requests (Br. 6–11) a remedial bargaining order instead of a new election. The Union initially made this request at the close of the original hearing.[30] In United Dairy Farmers Assn., 257 NLRB 772 (1981), following a remand from the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, the Board reversed prior policy by (1) granting a remedial bargaining order in a case involving "outrageous" and "pervasive" unfair labor practices, notwithstanding that the union involved never obtained a card majority, and (2) granting the order at the request of the charging party, without any allegation in the complaint that the employer violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. The two circuit courts with potential venue over the present case are in disagreement as to the applicable law. In United Dairy Farmers Assn. v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 1054, 1069 (3d Cir. 1980), the court held that the Board had authority to issue remedial bargaining orders in such cases. However, in Conair Corp. v. NLRB, 721 F.2d 1355 (D.C. Cir. 1983), the only other case in which the Board issued a nonmajority remedial bargaining order, the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit held that the Board lacked such authority. I am proceeding on the premises that the Board's decision on remand in United Dairy Farmers constitutes Board policy that is binding on me. In evaluating the propriety of a bargaining order in the present case, I have taken into consideration the Company's entire course of conduct, and not simply those unfair labor practices that were committed during the critical period prior to the election. Nevertheless, and regardless of whether the present case be regarded as a class I Gissel[31] case (i.e., an "exceptional" case marked by "outrageous" and "pervasive" unfair labor practices), or a class II case (i.e., a "less extraordinary" case "marked by less pervasive practices which nonetheless still have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election processes"), I find that a bargaining order is not warranted. It is evident that from the beginning of its campaign, the Union was pessimistic about its ability to obtain majority status in the unit ultimately found appropriate by the Regional Director. Even before the Company began its campaign of unlawful activity, the Union sought to organize a relatively small unit, and it eventually agreed only with reluctance, to an election in a large unit that included most of the personnel at both plants. The Union lost the election by an overwhelming vote (231 to 1049). There is an administrative presumption that the Union obtained authorization cards or other showing of support from at least 30 percent of the employees in the appropriate unit. However, the Union's private demonstration does not constitute evidence in an unfair labor practice proceeding. The only evidence in this proceeding of the extent of the Union's support at any time consists of the 231 votes that it received in the election. In United Dairy Farmers, supra at fn. 22, the Board held that a close election was not a condition of a bargaining order, but the Board did not exclude the result of the election as a factor for consideration. Moreover, many of the violations in the present case involved interference with communication between the Union and the employees. It is anticipated that removal of these barriers by an appropriate remedial order, would enable the employees to make an informed choice in a rerun election campaign. However, a bargaining order would in the present circumstances defeat the purposes of the Act by imposing on the employees a representative that never demonstrated either majority or near majority support, or even the probability of such support. Therefore, I am recommending that a new election be directed at such time as the Regional Director deems appropriate.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[30] This fact is another illustration of the questionable wisdom of practices that would permit a charging party to inject a major issue into litigation without the benefit of briefing or even a statement of position by the General Counsel. By waiting until the close of the hearing to make its request, the Union effectively precluded the other parties and the administrative law judge from adducing evidence that might be relevant to the propriety of a bargaining order, albeit not relevant to the specific allegations of the complaint and the objections to the election.

[31] NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 613–615 (1969).

3. By interfering with, restraining, and coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act, the Company has engaged and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By refusing to reinstate Freeda Carr and Nancy Race, by refusing to recommend for reemployment and to rehire Pamela Damon, Rhonda Gross, Barbara Morgan, Debra Nuhfer, Floyd Monticue, and Rebecca Stuart Walton, by discriminatorily transferring Joan Hockenberry, by issuing written warnings to Vivian Newton and Joan Hockenberry and oral warnings to Hockenberry, Sheila Mack, and Dawn Dickson because of their union activity, and by imposing more rigorous and onerous terms and conditions of employment on union adherents among its employees, by segregating them at work, conspicuously and closely observing and scrutinizing them at work, and discriminatorily prohibiting them from talking at work, thereby discouraging membership in the Union, the Company has engaged, and is engaging, in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

5. By refusing to reinstate Carr and Race because they filed charges under the Act, and by refusing to recommend for reemployment and to rehire Pamela Damon and Rhonda Gross because they gave testimony under the Act, the Company has violated and is violating Section 8(a)(4) of the Act.

6. Union Objections 2, 4, and the first part of 13 and 16 in Case 6–RC–8922 have been sustained by the evidence, and the Company thereby interfered with the Board election on June 9, 1981. Objections 1, 3, 5–10, 12, and the second and third parts of 13–15 and 17 are without merit or precluded by law or Board policy from consideration as objectionable conduct.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Company has committed numerous violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom, to post appropriate notices, and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that the Company discriminatorily refused to reinstate Freeda Carr and Nancy Race on their offer to return to work in the returns departments, I shall recommend that the Company be ordered to offer each of them immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs, or if such jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and benefits they may have suffered from October 6, 1980, when they initially requested to return to work, until the date of the Company's offer of reinstatement. Having found that the Company discriminatorily refused to rehire Pamela Damon, Rhonda Gross, Barbara Morgan, Debra Nuffer, Floyd Monticue, and Rebecca Stuart Walton, I shall recommend that the Company be ordered to offer each of them immediate and full employment, in a nondiscriminatory manner, to positions for which they are qualified, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges to which they would be entitled, absent the discrimination against them. I shall further recommend that the Company be ordered to make each of them whole for any loss of earnings and benefits from the date of the Company's discriminatory refusal to rehire them, as determined in this decision, until the date of the Company's offer of reemployment. Backpay shall be computed in accordance with the formula approved in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest computed in the manner and amount prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[32] It will also be recommended that the Company be required to preserve and make available to the Board, or its agents, on request, payroll and other records to facilitate the computation of backpay due. I shall further recommend that the Company be ordered to remove from its files the negative or qualified reemployment recommendations for each of the above-named employees, to revoke, and remove from its files the written warnings that were given to Vivian Newton in October 1980 and to Joan Hockenberry in February 1981, and any reference to the oral warnings that were given in January 1981, to Hockenberry, Sheila Mack, and Dawn Dickson, and to give written notice of such expunction to each of them, and to inform each of them that its unlawful conduct will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them. See Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

With regard to remedies involving union access to employees, I am, for the reasons discussed above, recommending that the Company be ordered to permit access by union organizers to outside nonworking areas of the IDC premises for a period of 6 months from the effective date of the order in this case. I am also recommending that the Company be ordered to make available to the Union a list of the names, addresses, and telephone numbers of all employees currently employed, and to keep such list current for a period of 6 months. This provision is without prejudice to the Union's rights under Excelsior Underwear, supra, in the event of a rerun election. These provisions, coupled with company compliance with the prohibitive and other provisions of the order in this proceeding, should enable the Union to develop adequate means of communication with the employees in an atmosphere free of coercive employer conduct. I am not persuaded that the policies of the Act would be effectuated by granting these remedies for a longer period of time or by granting other extraordinary remedies involving access by nonemployee union representatives. The Company does not have a prior history of unfair labor practice conduct, and the unlawful conduct in the present case does not equate in severity or intensity with that involved in cases in which the Board granted such extraordinary relief. Additionally, I am not persuaded that it would effectuate the purposes of the Act by in effect placing the Board's imprimatur on another long, drawn-out organizational campaign. The unit is defined. The Union correctly asserts (Br. 12) that the present case involves a relatively large unit. However, the Board has conducted elections in far larger units. Compare, e.g., Newport News Shipbuilding, 239 NLRB 82 (1978).

The Union also requests reimbursement for its organizational expenses (Br. 14–18). Here again, the present case fails to meet the conditions that are required for such an extraordinary remedy. In determining the propriety of reimbursement, the Board will consider (1) whether the employer's defenses to the complaint were "patently frivolous," and (2) whether there is a "demonstrable 'nexus' between extraordinary expenses for such purposes and the unlawful conduct." Conair Corp., 261 NLRB 1189, 1287–1288 (1982), enfd. in pertinent part 721 F.2d 1355 (D.C. Cir. 1983); J. P. Stevens & Co., 244 NLRB 407, 457, 458 (1979). The present case involves difficult questions of fact, law, and policy, and the Company's defenses cannot accurately be characterized as frivolous. The Union has also failed to prove a substantial nexus between extraordinary organizational expenses and the Company's unlawful conduct, to the extent that it should be reimbursed for its expenses. Indeed, the Union's arguments in its brief are based in large part on assertions of fact that are not evidenced in the present record, and therefore must be disregarded. Moreover, the Union's position is characterized by contradictions that cast serious doubt on whether such a nexus can be proven. Thus, the Union argues (Br. 2) that as a result of the Company's unfair labor practices, which began as early as June or July 1980 "[T]he signing of authorization cards was reduced to a trickle"; but then asserts (Br. 4) that when the Regional Director directed an election in a "virtually 'wall-to-wall unit,'" the Union was able to produce signed authorization cards from 30 percent of the total number of eligible employees. In sum, the Union is conceding that renewed organizational activity was dictated by the Regional Director's ruling, rather than by the Company's unlawful conduct. The Union also places great emphasis on employer conduct that was directed at inhibiting organizational activity by prounion employees. However, with respect to the issue of access to the IDC premises, the Union, through the testimony of its organizers Glather and Gilmartin, also emphasized the need for personal contact between the employees and the organizers. In sum, even if the members of the employee committee were not subjected to employer interference, the Union would nevertheless find it necessary to make extensive use of its organizing staff. Glather also testified, in sum, that certain employer conduct affected the Union's efforts and consequent expenses. However, his assertion was based to a substantial extent on matters that were not alleged or not proven as unfair labor practices in this proceeding. Thus, Glather testified that the conduct included the "discharge" of Carr and Race, and the Company's assertions regarding the Union's history and policy on fines and dues. Glather also testified that at IDC, the Union's committee dissolved because (1) an employee's T-shirt was torn off her back, (2) two employees were discharged for wearing union T-shirts, and (3) Joan Hockenberry was ostracized and moved around. Except for Hockenberry's temporary transfer in October 1980, none of these assertions are based on any alleged unfair labor practices in this proceeding. An organizational campaign among a large complement of employees may require substantial expense and utilization of professional organizers, but the Union must be willing to undertake that effort if it is seriously interested in organizing the employees. An employer cannot be expected to subsidize the Union's campaign. Therefore I am recommending that the Union's request for reimbursement be denied.

However, on consideration of the facts in this case, I find that the unfair labor practices proven here are sufficiently broad in scope and intensive in nature as to demonstrate that the Company has a general disregard or hostility to the Act. These unfair labor practices, extended over a long period of time, were committed, approved, or condoned by high management officials and involved not only discrimination and harassment of employees who sought to exercise their Section 7 rights, but also discrimination against employees who sought redress through Board proceedings. In particular, the Company's discriminatory treatment of prounion employees, even after the election, tends to indicate a vindictive course of conduct. Therefore, I shall recommend that the Company be ordered to cease and desist from infringing in any manner on the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act. See Delta Faucet Co., 251 NLRB 394, 407 (1980).

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On December 21, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Donald R. Holley issued the attached original decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The General Counsel filed cross-exceptions, a supporting brief, and an answering brief.

On July 24, 1986, the Board issued an order remanding this proceeding to the judge for further consideration consistent with Res-Care, Inc., 280 NLRB 670 (1986), and Long Stretch Youth Home, 280 NLRB 678 (1986). On March 23, 1987, after a reopening of the record, the judge issued the attached supplemental decision asserting jurisdiction over the Respondent. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The General Counsel filed a reply brief and motion to strike, in whole or in part, the Respondent's exceptions and supporting brief, and the Charging Party filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief and an answering brief to the Respondent's exceptions.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision, the supplemental decision, and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] in both decisions, as modified, and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The Respondent is a research consulting firm that obtains most of its work through subcontracts with the Small Business Administration (SBA). As set forth in the judge's decisions, during 1981 and 1982[4] the Respondent, as a minority subcontractor for the SBA, performed services for the National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH) at its Morgantown, West Virginia facility, pursuant to four contracts with U.S. Government agencies.[5]

In late March or early April, Cindy Moore, one of the Respondent's technicians, approached Michael Zulkoski, a NIOSH maintenance employee and the president of the Union, to ascertain whether the Union could represent the Respondent's technicians. Zulkoski replied affirmatively and gave Moore authorization cards that she distributed among technicians. On April 7, a majority of the Respondent's employees gave Zulkoski signed cards. On April 14, the Respondent's project coordinator Ed McCabe overheard a conversation concerning unionization of the Respondent's employees. He, thereafter, unlawfully interrogated employees both individually and as a group concerning, inter alia, who had solicited them.[6] Employee Long told McCabe that Moore had solicited him.

[1] The General Counsel's motion included a request that the Board strike exhibits attached to the Respondent's brief in support of its exceptions to the judge's supplemental decision. The General Counsel contends that "Exhibits" 1, 2, 7, and 8 were not presented as evidence at the reopened hearing or subjected to cross-examination, have not been shown to constitute newly discovered evidence, and should not be made a part of the record in this proceeding. We find merit in the General Counsel's contention and grant the motion to strike such material.

[2] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[3] The judge relied on T.R.W., Inc., 257 NLRB 442 (1981), in finding that the Respondent promulgated and distributed an unlawfully overbroad no-solicitation rule. In Our Way, Inc., 268 NLRB 394 (1983), which issued subsequent to the judge's decision, the Board overruled T.R.W. We rely on Our Way to reach the same result. We note that the Respondent's rule fails to distinguish adequately between duty time and duty hours and does not state with sufficient clarity that employees may solicit on their own time.

[4] All dates refer to 1982 unless otherwise indicated.

[5] These contracts are subject to the Service Contract Act. The fact that an employer is a contractor subject to the terms of the Service Contract Act does not mean, however, that the Board will decline to assert jurisdiction over that employer. See Dynaelectron Corp., 286 NLRB 302 (1987).

In its exceptions to the judge's supplemental decision, the Respondent also disputes the judge's finding in his supplemental decision that none of these contracts contain provisions controlling the maximum wages and fringe benefits it can award to its employees, specifically citing references in one of the contracts to maximun total compensation for each hour a librarian and library aide worked. We reject this argument because there is no evidence that the exempt entity can disallow the payment of higher wages than the hourly maximum provided for in the contract. See Old Dominion Security, 289 NLRB 81, 82 (1988). To the contrary, a Government contract procurement specialist testified that under any one of the contracts the Respondent could set wages higher than contract compensation rates, which might be paid, for example, out of corporate profits. Further, as salaries, expenses, overhead, and profit compose the compensation rates under the library contract, with no provisions as to their allocation, it is apparent that the Respondent has some measure of control in determining benefit amounts even within the specified hourly rates. See Community Interactions—Bucks County, 286 NLRB 1029, 1030 (1988). Accordingly, we conclude, in agreement with the judge, that the Respondent's discretion in determining its employees' wages and benefits under any one of the four contracts, including the library contract, combined with its broad independent authority in labor matters other than employee remuneration, demonstrates that it retains sufficient control over its employees' terms and conditions of employment to engage in meaningful collective bargaining.

[6] In agreement with the judge, we conclude that McCabe unlawfully polled employees concerning union membership and activities on April 14. We note, in addition, that McCabe's individual questioning of employees on that same date constituted unlawful interrogations under the standards enunciated in Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984), enfd. sub nom. Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 11 v. NLRB, 760 F.2d 1006 (9th Cir. 1985), which issued subsequent to the judge's decision.

On April 9, Moore experienced discomfort while working in the pathology lab under a ventilation hood designed to remove gaseous fumes from the work area. NIOSH employees working in the area noticed an excessive buildup of formaldehyde fumes. NIOSH employee Tucker advised Moore to leave the room if the fumes persisted. Moore testified that Tucker suggested she "might call maintenance." Shortly thereafter, Moore telephoned the NIOSH maintenance office to report the defective hood. Moore requested that Mike Zulkoski be dispatched because he was familiar with that hood's problems.[7] Zulkoski was absent from work on April 9.

Approximately 3 hours after Moore reported the defective hood, NIOSH facility engineer Louis Smith dispatched NIOSH maintenance employee Jack Riley to examine the hood's fan system, which was located on the roof of the lab. After ascertaining that the fan was by then working properly, Riley proceeded towards the pathology lab where he asked Moore what her problem was. Moore responded that she had no problem and had asked for Mike.[8] Riley testified that he reported to Smith that the fan was running properly and Moore wanted to see Mike. Smith testified that Riley reported the fan was fine and that Moore said that she only wanted to see Zulkoski. Although Moore testified that she told Riley there had been a problem that cleared up, Riley did not mention this in his report to Smith. Smith testified that he deduced from Riley's report that Moore must have made a false report.

On April 14, Smith informed Supervisor Charlotte Dalton, the administrative officer of the Morgantown NIOSH facility, that his office had received a false report of a defective hood. Also about April 14, Dalton informed McCabe about the incident and expressed her concern that Ebon do something about it, but she did not suggest that Moore be discharged. On either April 14 or 15, McCabe discussed the hood incident with Hicks and investigated the report by consulting NIOSH employees Smith and Riley.

On April 16, Hicks telephoned Moore at work to discuss the hood incident. Technician Bryant was with Moore in the lab during this conversation. Moore testified that she tried to explain to Hicks that she had not filed a false report and felt that Hicks misunderstood her statements. Hicks rejected Moore's explanation and stated she would note the incident in Moore's personnel file as unprofessional conduct and additional disciplinary action would be taken.

Hicks again telephoned Moore shortly before midnight on April 16, and informed Moore of her termination. Hicks confirmed the discharge by mailgram and letter of April 16. The letter stated in pertinent part that Moore had reported a malfunctioning hood, that Riley had thoroughly examined the roof and exhaust system and told Moore no defect was found, that Moore had telephonically informed Hicks she was aware the hood was functioning normally, and that other individuals had told Hicks that Moore had told Riley she knew there was nothing wrong with the hood. The letter concluded that on the basis of Moore's report to Hicks and other facts uncovered after "careful investigation," Hicks had determined that the best interest of all parties required Moore's immediate termination.

On April 23, Hicks met with the Respondent's employees to discuss Moore's termination and the union situation. Employees asked why Hicks had discharged Moore. Hicks replied that Moore had been fired for making a false safety report and indicated that Moore admitted during their initial telephone conversation that she had made a false report. Hicks told employees that Moore purportedly said, "Yes, I knew the hood was working when I made the phone call." At that point, Bryant informed Hicks that he was present with Moore during this telephone conversation and that Moore never admitted making a false report.

The judge credited the testimony of NIOSH employees Riley, Lewis, and Dalton and concluded that they held an honest but mistaken belief that Moore had actually made a false report on April 9. Without also specifically crediting Hicks, the judge reasoned that she also might have formed an honest but mistaken belief that Moore had made a false report if she had simply adopted the opinions of her subordinates. He then concluded that notwithstanding the Respondent's honest but mistaken belief that Moore had engaged in misconduct, the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) by discharging her.[9] The Respondent excepts to the judge's finding that the discharge violated Section 8(a)(1). The General Counsel excepts to the judge's failure to resolve the allegation that the discharge also violated Section 8(a)(3). For the following reasons, we find that Moore's alleged false report was [8] Moore testified she was surprised that Riley was dispatched instead of Zulkoski, who usually checked the hood.

[9] The judge found it unnecessary to resolve the allegation that the discharge also violated Sec. 8(a)(3).

utilized by Hicks as a pretext and that Moore's discharge violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.[10]

Initially, we find that the General Counsel has met the burden under Wright Line[11] of a prima facie showing that union activity was a motivating factor for the Respondent's discharge of Moore. In this regard, we affirm the judge's finding that the Respondent's supervisors communicated their knowledge of Moore's solicitation activities to Hicks, which occurred on the same day that Hicks chose to act on that knowledge in other ways, such as by letters to employees containing the no-solicitation rule we have found above to be unlawful. Additionally, we emphasize the timing of Moore's discharge almost immediately after the Respondent gained knowledge of her union activity. Finally, we find that the Respondent's unlawful conduct, including antiunion statements accompanied by threat of discharge or job loss, provides the requisite proof of union animus. We conclude that the General Counsel established a prima facie case of Moore's unlawfully motivated discharge.

The Respondent has not shown that it would have discharged Moore even in the absence of her union activity. The preponderance of the evidence belies any honest or mistaken belief by Hicks that Moore admitted filing a false report. Contrary to Hicks' contentions, employee Bryant was present during the pivotal telephone conversation and credibly corroborated Moore's testimony that she never admitted making a false report. Thus, even assuming, as did the judge, that, on the strength of others' opinions and before speaking to Moore, Hicks might have formed an honest but mistaken belief that Moore had made a false report, it is clear that Moore's telephone interview lent no further support to any such belief but that Hicks proceeded to fabricate a scenario by which it did.[12] The fact that the Respondent's action was falsely predicated on Moore's alleged admission of misconduct indicates that the asserted rationale given for Moore's discharge was pretextual. In these circumstances, we find that Moore's discharge violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

[10] In light of our disposition of the 8(a)(3) allegation, we find it unnecessary to decide whether the Respondent's discharge of Moore constituted an independent violation of Sec. 8(a)(1).

[11] 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 622 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982); approved in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

[12] Furthermore, the credited testimony of employee Janet Lucas is that, at an employee meeting with Hicks following Moore's termination, Bryant confronted Hicks with his knowledge that Moore had made no admission of guilt during her telephone interview but that the conversation then turned to employees' union activity, with Hicks making several threatening statements and expressions of futility in employees seeking union representation, as well as interrogating her audience about the Union. Hicks subsequently declined to reconsider Moore's termination. Hicks' determination to adhere to her position on Moore's admitted guilt notwithstanding an employee's contradiction of that assertion based on first-hand knowledge, as well as her use of the occasion of an employee appeal concerning the discharge to air antiunion views, is consistent with our finding of an unlawful motive.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge in his original decision as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Florence J. Hicks d/b/a Ebon Research Systems, Morgantown, West Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(e).

"(e) Discharging employees because of their union activity."

2. Insert the following as paragraph 2(c) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

"(c) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge of Cindy Moore and notify her in writing that this has been done and that the discharge will not be used against her in any way."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that Case 6–RC–9248 is severed and remanded to the Regional Director for Region 6 for further proceedings consistent with this Decision and Order.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT interrogate employees concerning their union activities or the union activities of other employees.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees by informing them they may lose their jobs if they elect to have union representation.

WE WILL NOT discourage membership in American Federation of Government Employees, Local 3430, AFL–CIO, or in any other labor organization, by informing employees they are scapegoats and continued support of the above-named Union will cause them to be replaced by Government employees and/or prevent their Employer from obtaining long-term contracts.

WE WILL NOT promulgate and enforce an unlawfully broad no-solicitation rule that prohibits employees from engaging in union-related solicitation during periods when they are properly not engaged in performing their work tasks (e.g., meal and break periods).

WE WILL NOT discharge employees because of their union activity.

WE WILL NOT inform employees that discharge action will not be reconsidered because of Board requirements or because a petition for an election is pending before the Board.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole Cindy Moore for any loss of pay she suffered as a result of the discrimination practiced against her, with interest.

WE WILL notify Cindy Moore that we have removed from our files any reference to Moore's discharge and that the discharge will not be used against her in any way.

FLORENCE J. HICKS D/B/A EBON RESEARCH SYSTEMS

Domenic A. Bellisario, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Claude Roxborough, Esq., of Washington, D.C., for the Respondent.
W. Harry Muller, Esq., of Washington, D.C., for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DONALD R. HOLLEY, Administrative Law Judge. On original and amended charges filed by American Federation of Government Employees, Local 3430, AFL–CIO (Charging Party or the Union) in Cases 6–CA–15463 and 6–CA–15766,[1] the Regional Director for Region 6 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued order consolidating cases, consolidated complaint and notice of hearing on November 19, 1982, which alleged, inter alia, that Florence J. Hicks d/b/a Ebon Research Systems (the Respondent or Ebon) had engaged in conduct that violates Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Respondent filed a timely answer denying it had engaged in the unlawful conduct alleged in the complaint. Thereafter, the Union filed the petition in Case 6–RC–9248 and an election was conducted among certain of Respondent's employees. The Union lost and filed objections to the election. By Order dated March 7, 1983, Case 6–RC–9248 was consolidated with the above-described unfair labor practice cases for hearing as the objections are coextensive with the allegations set forth in the complaint.

The trial in this matter held in Morgantown, West Virginia, during the period April 5–8, 1983. All parties appeared and were afforded full opportunity to participate. On the entire record, including the posthearing briefs filed by the parties, and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses when they gave testimony, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a sole proprietorship, with its principal office located in Rockville, Maryland, with a place of business located in Morgantown, West Virginia, is engaged in the business of providing research assistance and other services to, inter alia, agencies of the United States. Its gross revenue for the performance of such services throughout the United States exceeds $1 million annually, and it admits that during the 12-month period ending April 30, 1982, it provided services valued in excess of $50,000 to the United States Government within the State of West Virginia. Its Morgantown, West Virginia operation is the only operation immediately involved in the instant case.

During the hearing in Case 6–RC–9248, and during the instant trial, Respondent contended the Board should not assert jurisdiction over its operation because the Federal agencies utilizing its services exercise substantial control over its collective-bargaining matters and such agencies and respondent are joint employers of the employees hired by Respondent to enable it to furnish services to Federal agencies. After exhaustive analysis of the evidence offered by Respondent in support of its contention, the Regional Director concluded the contention was without merit and found that Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act and jurisdiction over its operations should be asserted. By telegraphic Order dated November 4, 1982, the Board denied Respondent's Request for Review of the Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election. In the circumstances described, I find that doctrine of res judicata precludes Respondent from relegating the jurisdictional issue described in the instant case.[2] I find, as alleged, that Respondent is an employer whose operations affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and that assertion of jurisdiction over its operations is warranted.

II. STATUS OF LABOR ORGANIZATION

Respondent admits and I find that the Charging Party is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent is a research consulting firm that provides research assistance to agencies of the United States Government and to States, colleges, and other entities. It obtains the vast majority of its work through subcontracts

[1] The original charge was filed in case 6–CA–15463 on May 6, 1982. It was amended on May 26, 1982. The original charge in Case 6–CA–15766 was filed on September 7, 1982. It was amended on November 18, 1982.

with the Small Business Administration (SBA) which recognizes it as a majority contractor. Mechanically, SBA receives requests for services from various agencies or business concerns and it then notifies minority contractors who are qualified to perform the work of the need for services. On indicating their interest in subcontracting the particular work involved, the minority contractors are furnished with requests for proposals that outline the tasks to be performed and they submit contract proposals directly to the agency or entity that needs the services. The requesting agency or entity then selects a contractor, they complete negotiations, and SBA thereafter awards the contract.

At all times material in this case, Dr. Florence Hicks has been the executive director and owner of Respondent. She testified that she hires and fires all employees utilized by Respondent at all locations. She is assisted by Dr. Lee Richmond, the director of Respondent's health division. Richmond testified that he, inter alia, prepares all technical contract proposals for Respondent, provides supervision of all employees employed at locations within his jurisdiction, and participates in the interview of employees at the various locations where Respondent has obtained contracts.[3]

Since 1981, Respondent, as a subcontractor for SBA, has performed services for the National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH) at its Appalachian Laboratory for Occupational Safety and Health facility located in Morgantown, West Virginia (the facility or ALOSH). NIOSH conducts certain respiratory studies at the facility using small animals such as rats and rabbits. Pursuant to one of its contracts, Respondent provided research animal support services at the facility that involved housing and caring for the animals used in experiments, and providing employees who assisted NIOSH personnel in the actual conduct of experiments.

During 1981 and the first 6 months of 1982, Respondent accomplished the above-described animal-related services by utilizing five animal care technicians and a project coordinator. The technicians each spent 1 day each week in the animal quarters where they cleaned cages, fed and watered the animals, disposed of animals, and performed other functions related to animal care. During the remaining 4 days of the workweek, they assisted NIOSH scientific personnel who were conducting experiments by performing preparatory lab work that required limited skill, i.e., dissecting animals and placing designated portions of tissue in cassettes that were subsequently utilized by NIOSH personnel.

The project coordinator hired by Respondent to provide immediate supervision of the animal care technicians was Ed McCabe. Although McCabe is the only onsite Respondent employee who exerted authority over the technicians, Respondent contends in this proceeding that it is not responsible for McCabe's acts because he is not a supervisor in the statutory sense.[4] I find the contention to be without merit for the reasons set forth, infra.

B. The Union Campaign

In late March or early April, Cindy Moore, one of the technicians employed by Respondent at the Morgantown facility, spoke with Michael Zulkoski, a NIOSH maintenance employee at the facility who is also the president of the Union, to ascertain whether the Union could represent Respondent's technicians. After ascertaining his Union could represent nongovernmental employees employed by a contractor at a Government facility, Zulkoski gave Moore application for membership cards, which she thereafter distributed among all the technicians except Maureen Sullivan, who was described to be a close personal friend of McCabe. Subsequently, on April 7, employees Moore, Janet Lucas, Karen Abercrombie, and Mark Bryant met with Zulkoski at a Pizza Hut during their lunch hour and all gave Zulkoski executed membership application cards.[5] Thereafter, on April 14, the above-named employees decided to tell technician Maureen Sullivan that they had joined the Union to obtain representation. A short time after Sullivan was made aware of the employees' interest in the Union, McCabe, who had overheard a conversation concerning Ebon employees and the Union, approached Sullivan indicating he had heard something he could not believe. McCabe then asked Sullivan if it was true that the technicians were joining the Union. Sullivan replied she had just learned from the other technicians that they were trying to join the Union. When McCabe interrogated Sullivan further by asking her why they were joining and how it came about, the employee indicated she knew little because she had just learned of it herself. After talking to Sullivan, McCabe approached employee Robert Long, told him he heard about the organizing effort, and asked if it was true. Long said yes. McCabe went on to ask which union was involved, who solicited him, and whether there were any local problems that prompted the employee to seek union representation. Long told McCabe that Moore had solicited him and that the employees joined for better benefits. McCabe continued to interrogate other employees on an individual basis along the same lines. Employee Mark Bryant responded to his questions by informing him the employees were instructed not to speak to him on an individual basis. McCabe then approached employee Karen Abercrombie (Brooke) who refused to answer his questions unless in the presence of other employees.

After approaching all the technicians except Moore and Lucas, McCabe telephoned Richmond at his Rockville, Maryland office to inform him that Respondent's employees were seeking union representation.[6] According to McCabe, Richmond told him he was unable to contract Hicks at the time; that McCabe should learn

[3] It is admitted, and I find, that Hicks and Richmond are, and have been at all times material, supervisors and agents of Respondent within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) and (13) of the Act.

[4] Respondent contended, during processing of the representation case, that McCabe was a supervisor. He did not vote in the election held in that case.

[5] Employee Robert Long executed a card the same day, but the record fails to reveal whether he attended the Pizza Hut meeting.

[6] During the call, McCabe also informed Richmond that Moore had made what he considered to be a false report of a hood malfunction in a laboratory on April 9. That situation is discussed, infra.

more from the employees about their union activities and keep him informed.

McCabe's conversation with Richmond prompted him to immediately schedule a meeting with the animal technicians. He admitted during his testimony that he asked the same questions he had previously asked when interrogating the employees individually. Employees Bryant, Moore, and Long described the meeting during their testimony. Long and Moore recalled that McCabe opened the meeting by stating that Dr. Hicks had called him and she was surprised they had joined the Union[7] The employees testified without contradiction that McCabe then asked: if they had joined the Union; who all was involved; whether it was because of him; and whether they could not run their complaints through him or through proper channels. The employees replied that all except Sullivan were involved; that they had joined for better benefits and pay rather than anything personal; and that they could not go through proper channels with complaints because that was no longer effective. When his meeting with the employees ended, McCabe reported what he had learned to Richmond. The latter instructed McCabe to keep him informed.

While Hicks testified she did not learn of the employees' interest in the Union or Moore's role in the organization campaign until April 22, the record belied such claim.[8] Thus, on April 16, Hicks sent a letter placed in the record as General Counsel's Exhibit 8 to Thomas Shamblee, a NIOSH official stationed in Atlanta, Georgia. In this letter, Hicks stated:[9]

> Dear Mr. Shamblee:
> I am writing to inform you of my concern for the potential disruption of the activities being performed by Ebon Research Systems staff at the Appalachian Laboratory of Occupational Safety and Health in Morgantown, West Virginia, resulting from actions of American Federation of Government Employees Local 3430 members during duty hours. As you are aware, Ebon was contracted to provide laboratory assistance and animal care in support of the activities of the National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health. However, recent events threaten the continuance of the high quality performance of my employees.
> Specifically, I am concerned about Local 3430 members approaching my employees during work hours for the express purpose of discussing Union affairs and soliciting memberships. This type of activity is not only adverse to acceptable Union conduct, but is an illegal use of compensated Government time. I have advised my employees that under no circumstances are they to divert any duty hours to any activities other than their specific assignments. I have also cautioned them that it is their responsibility to report any attempts of Federal Government employees to engage them in any activities during duty hours not in keeping with their job responsibilities.
> Because of the adverse affect Local 3430 might have on the performance of the Ebon contract, I contacted the national office of the Federal Labor Relations Authority at 1325 Massachusetts Ave, N.W., Washington, D.C. Attorney Donna Ditullio at the Authority informed me that it was her understanding that all AFGE Unions are prohibited from soliciting members other than full-time Federal employees as a result of the Constitution and By-Laws promulgated by the national body. In response to the recommendation of Attorney Ditullio, I contacted Administration staff and staff of the Organization Office of the Federal Labor Relations Authority. After much discussion, I was informed that non-Federal employees hired by a private firm to perform work not previously performed by Federal employees with the same job description and titles are not eligible for membership in AFGE unions. Consequently, I am requesting that Local 3430 members refrain from soliciting my employees at any time in keeping with their charter.
> I would appreciate very much your investigation of the situation. Most importantly, I would hope that the Union members are informed to cease soliciting activities and disrupting the work of my employees. Any steps taken to resolve these issues are welcomed. I am thanking you in advance for your efforts.

On April 16, Hicks also sent a letter to each of her employees. The letters were identical. A copy was placed in the record as General Counsel's Exhibit 7. It states:

> I am writing to apprise you of new developments, the status of the Ebon contract, and concerns that have recently come to my attention.
> Firstly, I am pleased to announce the award of a new contract from the U.S. Department of Agriculture that will add one animal care technician and one supervisory technician to the Ebon staff. This contract is for one year and will provide resources to conduct additional experiments at the Appalachian Laboratory for Occupational Safety and Health. Because my first priority is continued employment of our existing staff, the two positions will be filled

[7] Hicks testified she did not become aware her employees were engaged in union activity until McCabe informed her of it during a June 22 telephone conversation. McCabe and Richmond corroborated her testimony. The record reveals, however, that Hicks authored two letters, discussed infra, on April 16 which clearly reveal she was then fully aware her employees were engaged in union activity. Long, in particular, was an impressive witness whose testimony had the "ring of truth." Finally, I note that Respondent states in its brief (p. 7) that Hicks telephoned the (Rockville) office and also talked to NIOSH officials Dalton and Lewis during the afternoon on April 14. In the circumstances, I credit the employees' assertion that McCabe informed them at the meeting that he had just talked to Hicks.

[8] On April 16, Zulkoski told McCabe the Union would claim Ebon was retaliating against Moore for her union activities if it disciplined her over the Hood matter. McCabe indicated in his pretrial statement that he informed Hicks of Zulkoski's remarks at 11:45 p.m. on April 16. Hicks mistakenly placed her conversation with McCabe as having occurred on April 22, almost a week later.

[9] Hicks testified she contacted the Board's New York office, the Union's International office, and the Federal Labor Relations Authority before writing letters on April 16 to ascertain whether the Union could represent nongovernmental employees. Such conversations were probably conducted on April 15.

with two-month temporary employees to enable existing employees to be considered for the positions when the first year of the present contract is complete.

With respect to the present contract, actions have been initiated for a contract extension. Continuation of the present contract beyond the month of June, 1982, is contingent upon: (1) the needs of ALOSH, (2) availability of Federal funds, and (3) the performance records and accomplishments of the present staff. During recent contract negotiations, I have asked for additional monies for salary raises and staff development activities. I am hopeful that funds will be available for both.

Relative to your specific position, your continued employment is also dependent upon the three factors previously mentioned. All employees successfully completed the probationary period; however, in order to be considered for any position following the completion of the first year of the contract, you must receive an acceptable performance evaluation from your immediate supervisor. Every employee will be evaluated on or before May 30, 1982. Your written evaluation will be discussed privately with you and you will have the opportunity to certify by your signature that you were given the results.

Lastly, it has come to my attention that some Ebon employees may be using duty time to engage in activities not related to their work assignment. Let me caution that under no circumstances are you to direct any duty hours to any activities other than your specific job responsibilities. Moreover, it is your responsibility to report to your immediate supervisor any attempts of any one to engage you in non-job related activities during duty time. As an Ebon employee, you are expected to exhibit a high level of job performance and professional conduct at all times. The success of the contract is directly related to your performance as an individual.

Let me take this opportunity to thank you for your contribution in providing a high standard of overall contract performance. I fully anticipate that the results of your work will unltimately provide a healthier environment for our nation's workers.

I will keep you informed through your immediate supervisor of the developments regarding the present contract extension.

C. The Hood Incident

During the 4 days of each week that she worked in a lab, Moore normally assisted NIOSH histopathology technician Marilyn Gamble. On April 9, Moore reported for work at 8 a.m. in the pathology lab located in room 281-A of the facility. She was to work alone that day as Gamble and NIOSH research biologist James Tucker were leaving for Florida that morning. While Moore performed her work, which involved dissecting the lungs of rats and placing strips of lung tissue in a cassette filled with formalin,[10] Gamble filled jars with formaldehyde in preparation for her trip. At approximately 9 a.m., Moore, who was working under a hood that was supposed to remove gaseous fumes from the work area, experienced discomfort as the formaldehyde fumes were burning her nose and eyes. Tucker and Gamble both testified they noticed the buildup of formaldehyde fumes as they removed equipment from the room. After checking to ascertain if any vessel was leaking formaldehyde, Tucker advised Moore to leave the room if the formaldehyde persisted. Shortly thereafter, Moore left room 281-A and telephoned the NIOSH maintenance section to report that the hood in room 281-A was malfunctioning. Moore suggested that Mike Zulkoski, the maintenance employee who had responded to such calls in the past, be dispatched to check the hood.[11]

Some 2 to 3 hours after Moore had reported the hood in room 281-A was malfunctioning, Louis Smith, the facility engineer, instructed NIOSH maintenance employee Jack Riley to check out the fan system to the hood of room 281-A and report the results to him.[12] Riley proceeded to check the reported malfunction by going to the roof to check the fan that drew fumes from the hood. After ascertaining that the fan was working properly, Riley proceeded towards the lab in room 281-A and encountered Moore, who had just finished lunch but had not resumed work, in the hall outside room 281-A. Riley asked Moore what her problem was. Moore replied she did not have any problem; that she wanted to see Mike. Riley responded: "You little turkey, I was out in the rain and got wet."[13]

After leaving Moore, Riley reported to Lewis that the fan to the hood in room 281-A was functioning normally; that the heavier of the two girls in room 281-A had told him she just wanted to talk to Mike. Thereafter, on Wednesday, April 14, Lewis informed Charlotte Dalton, the administrative officer of the Morgantown NIOSH facility, that his office had received a false report of a hood malfunction. On April 14, Lewis supplied Dalton with the information given him by Riley. Dalton testified she considered the situation to be serious and she contacted NIOSH's Atlanta office, which advised her the employee making the false report should be admonished.[14] On learning that the employee who allegedly [10] Formalin is a preservative consisting of formaldehyde and a buffer.

[11] Gamble testified she had called NIOSH maintenance on two prior occasions to report the buildup of formaldehyde fumes in room 281-A. Janet Lucas, a Respondent animal care technologist who regularly worked in the same lab with NIOSH biologist Tucker, testified she had to take 2 hours of sick leave in February 1982 because of irritation and swelling caused by formalin fumes she had breathed while working in room 281-A the previous day. Finally, Moore testified she had called to report that the hood in question was malfunctioning on two prior occasions.

[12] Employee Zulkoski was absent from work on April 9. While Smith testified Moore's call was received during the afternoon and that he dispatched Riley to check it around 2:30 p.m., it is clear, and I find, Moore called maintenance around 9 a.m. and Riley responded during the lunch hour.

[13] Moore testified she informed Riley a problem had been experienced with the hood earlier but it had cleared up. While Moore may have made such a statement when he later described the incident to others, including his Supervisor Lewis and McCabe.

[14] Dalton indicated she was under the impression that NIOSH employee had made a false report at the time.

made the false report worked for Respondent rather than NIOSH, Dalton reported the situation to one Purvis Major, a NIOSH employee who had been designated as the project officer who was to oversee Respondent's performance of its contract to furnish NIOSH the animal-related services described above. Dalton summoned McCabe, Moore's immediate supervisor, to her office. She then informed McCabe that on April 9 Moore had called maintenance to report a malfunctioning hood and had requested that Mike Zulkoski be sent up; that Supervisor Smith had assigned Jack Riley to check out the hood because Zulkoski was off that day; that Riley had checked out the exhaust fan and found it was okay; that when Riley arrived outside the lab, Moore told him there was nothing wrong with the hood—that she just wanted to talk or speak with Zulkoski; that she (Dalton) was concerned about fraudulent reports and although she could not get involved with their employees, she felt something should be done by Ebon regarding this incident.[15]

After talking to Dalton, McCabe testified he investigated the situation by talking to Smith and Riley. After Smith told him the hood was working properly on the occasion in question, he spoke with Riley. According to McCabe, Riley told him he had found the fan on the roof was working okay and, when he started for the lab, he met Moore and on advising her that everything checked out, she responded something to the effect that the hood was working and she had expected or wanted Mike.

On either April 14 or 15 McCabe discussed the hood incident with Hicks, asking whether he should obtain Moore's version of the incident. Hicks informed him she would speak with Moore.

On April 16, Hicks telephoned Moore at work and accused her of having filed a false report on April 9 that the exhaust hood at which she was working had malfunctioned. Bryant was present with Moore during this conversation. Moore explained that she had not made a false report. Rather, she reported to the NIOSH maintenance department that the hood was not functioning properly when she noticed a buildup of formaldehyde fumes, but that by the time the maintenance appeared hours later, the fumes had dissipated and everything seemed all right. Hicks rejected Moore's explanation and told her she would be noting the incident in Moore's record because she considered the conduct to be unprofessional. That night about midnight, Hicks telephoned Moore at home and informed Moore that she was fired. Hick's oral communication to Moore regarding her termination was confirmed by a mailgram sent the night of April 16 and, subsequently, by letter dated April 16. The letter, which was placed in the record as General Counsel's Exhibit 9, is substantially identical to the mailgram. It states:

> Dear Ms. Moore:
> It came to my attention on april 15, 1982, that you reported a malfunctioning hood in the Pathology Laboratory and requested that a Federal employee correct the situation. Upon thorough examination of the roof and exhaust system by Jack Riley, he told you there was no malfunction found. I was informed directly by you that you were aware of the fact the hood was functioning normally. Also, others told me that you reported to Jack Riley that you knew there was nothing wrong with the hood.
> I consider the potential of actual formaldehyde intoxication threat a very serious hazard to both animals and humans and should not be falsely reported. Additionally, to cause a Federal employee to leave his work site to explore a malfunctioning hood where it does not exist shows the lack of professional integrity and is disruptive to the operation of the Lab. Because of this incident, I seriously question your professional competence to perform as an Ebon employee on this Federal contract.
> On the basis of your report to me and other facts I uncovered upon careful investigation, I find it in the best interest of the Federal Government and Ebon Research Systems, employees at ALOSH, and the animals, that I terminate your employment effective April 30, 1982. Furthermore, for the protection of the animals and the safety of the employees, you are not to work Monday, April 19, 1982, through Friday, April 30, 1982. Because of my concern for your level of professional judgment and the nature of your ethical conduct, I feel it is necessary to terminate you without delay in order to maintain the high standards of performance of Ebon Research Systems. You will be paid your full salary during your two-week termination, notification period.
> Sincerely,

D. The April 23 Meeting

When Respondent's employees learned that Moore had been fired, they requested that Hicks meet with them to discuss Moore's termination and the union situation. A meeting was subsequently scheduled for April 23.

Hicks, and employees Janet Lucas, Robert Long, and Mark Bryant each described what occurred at the meeting during their testimony. Lucas' description was the most complete. Thus, she testified the employees asked Hicks at the beginning of the meeting why she had fired Cindy Moore. Hicks replied Moore had been fired for making a false safety report. Hicks then indicated Moore had admitted during a telephone conversation with her that she had made a false report. At the point, Bryant interjected that he had been with Moore when Hicks telephoned and that Hicks was incorrect in stating Moore admitted making a false report because Moore had not admitted any wrongdoing. Lucas recalled that the conversation then turned to the Union and that either Hicks or McCabe asked the employees how involved were they with the Union; had they actually joined yet?

[15] Dalton testified she did not suggest that Moore be terminated.

When the employees remained passive, Hicks showed employees her SBA contract, indicating that it prohibited the payment of moneys that were to be used for lobbying to obtain passage of legislation. She then displayed the Union's constitution and bylaws, indicating that one of the purposes of the Union was to engage in lobbying. Hicks then told employees she would be violating her contract if she paid them for their services and some of the payment was used to pay for the lobby activities conducted by the Union. Hicks then observed that it was her opinion that the Union was making scapegoats of them because she would have to terminate them to avoid violating her contract and the NIOSH employees would end up performing the work then performed by Respondent employees.[18] After Hicks informed the technicians she could not pay them if they joined the Union, employee Bryant asked how they should go about it if they chose not to go ahead. Hicks informed the employees they could prepare a letter in which each would indicate their preference, seal the letter, and that she would deliver it to the NLRB unopened. At the conclusion of the meeting, employee Long requested that McCabe be asked to leave the meeting. After he left, Long informed Hicks that McCabe had physically abused the female technologists. Lucas added that on one occasion McCabe became angry when working in the surgery room with her and Long, and he had thrown a pair of scissors. At some point near the conclusion of the meeting, Hicks informed the employees what while she had been attempting to obtain a 3-year contract, she was not even sure she could get a 1-year contract now as their attempt to join the Union had shaken up administration at the ALOSH facility so bad.

E. Respondent's Refusal to Rehire Moore

By letter dated April 23, Moore urged Hicks to reconsider her decision to terminate her, indicating that she had simply followed appropriate procedure when she reported a real safety problem on April 9. By letter dated April 27, Hicks notified Moore, inter alia:

> I regret to inform you that your request cannot be reconsidered because of policies of the National Labor Relations Board that advise me that I cannot perform any personnel acts that may influence the employees in making a free choice relative to a union election.

Respondent's 1981–1982 contract to provide animal care and research support at the ALOSH facility expired on June 10, 1982. Consequently, on May 26, Hicks sent each of the technicians then employed a letter informing them they would be terminated effective June 10. Thereafter, by letter dated June 28, Respondent notified all of its former technicians, including Moore, that it had obtained a new contract and had openings for positions on another 1-year contract effective August 1. The former employees were invited to submit resumes to McCabe so he could schedule interviews for qualified employees.

When performing its 1981–1982 animal research support contract at the ALOSH facility, Respondent's technicians, such as Moore, were assigned to work in the laboratory 4 days a week with a specific NIOSH employee. When he appeared as a Respondent witness, Fredrick Ames, the administrative officer for the division of respiratory disease studies of NIOSH, testified that when the contract was renegotiated during mid-1982 he indicated his agency was dissatisfied with the situation in which the technicians worked with only one person because NIOSH personnel felt they were placed in a position in which they supervised contract personnel. During his testimony, Richmond testified that Respondent sought to meet the NIOSH complaint by proposing that the technicians be assigned to assist NIOSH personnel on a rotating basis during the term of the 1982–1983 animal research support contract. Richmond further indicated that assignment of technicians on a rotating basis would necessitate that they possessed a bachelor's degree in biology, animal or veterinary science, agriculture, or similar credentials in a related field to enable them to perform adequately in the various laboratories, i.e., immunology lab, biochemistry lab, pathology lab, or in the physiology lab.

When it submitted its technical proposal for the 1982–1983 research animal support contract, Respondent, in addition to upgrading the educational requirements for Ebon employees who would be working with NIOSH personnel in the laboratories, indicated it proposed to fulfill its contract obligations by hiring four animal care research laboratory technicians and two animal care husbandry technicians. The proposal indicated employees in the former classification would devote most of their time to assisting in animal experimentation and might also be required to assist in animal husbandry duties, particularly on holidays and weekends. The proposal further indicated that the duties of the animal husbandry technicians would be limited to animal care.

On August 2, Moore visited the ALOSH facility, submitted her resume to McCabe, and requested an interview. McCabe commented, "Well, we'll carry this farce about as far as it will go," and accepted Moore's resume and scheduled her for interview with Hicks the following day. When Moore subsequently met with Hicks, she indicated she wished to be interviewed for the research technician position. Hicks informed her she was not qualified for the position because she did not have a bachelor's degree, and asked whether she would be interested in an animal care husbandry technician's position. Moore indicated she was interested in only the research technician position and inquired whether Hicks would consider her for such a position if an insufficient number of qualified applicants applied. Hicks terminated the interview by indicating she did not feel Respondent would experience a situation where insufficient qualified applicants applied.

[18] Hicks denied stating she would have to terminate employees to avoid violating her contract. I credit the employees who uniformly testified she made the statement.

F. Edwin McCabe's Status

During the pendency of the representation case, Respondent took the position that Project Coordinator McCabe was a supervisor who was not eligible to vote in the election. Here, it claims it is not responsible for McCabe's act as he is not a supervisor in the statutory sense.

Review of the instant record reveals that Respondent has repeatedly informed its animal care technicians that McCabe, who admittedly is the only on-site Respondent employee who exerts authority over the technicians, is their immediate supervisor. Thus, in a letter from Hicks to Moore dated October 8, 1981, and placed in the record as General Counsel's Exhibit 19, Hicks states, inter alia:

> Mr. Edwin McCabe is responsible for ensuring that all of the needs of the animal care facility are being met, and he is in charge of scheduling your work hours. He is your direct supervisor and is authorized to speak on our behalf [emphasis supplied].

Similarly, in the letter sent by Hicks to the ALOSH facility employees on April 16, which is set forth supra, Hicks indicated that to be considered for rehire when performance of the second animal care contract commenced, it would be necessary for them to receive a favorable exit evaluation that would be accomplished by their immediate supervisor (McCabe).

While McCabe and Richmond claimed during their testimony that McCabe is not authorized to take any action at the Morgantown facility that requires the exercise of independent judgment until he has telephoned Richmond and obtained his approval, McCabe candidly stated in a pretrial statement placed in the record as General Counsel's Exhibit 19 that:

> I am the only Ebon supervisory person at this project 99% of the time. Employees get authorization from me for all leave request as well as other matters concerning their working conditions. As a rule, I do not check with my superiors on these matters unless it's a very unusual problem.

With further regard to the question of whether McCabe exercises independent judgment in matters affecting Ebon at the Morgantown facility, the record reveals that when McCabe was informed Moore may have falsely reported a hood malfunction, McCabe investigated the matter by consulting with NIOSH personnel before he made any mention of the matter to either Hicks or Richmond.

In sum, it is clear that McCabe is the only Respondent figure with authority over the animal care technicians at the ALOSH facility 99 percent of the time. He schedules the hours and places of work of the technicians, reviews the time records they maintain to verify the amount of time, including compensatory time they claim, and he reports their work-related transgressions to Richmond or Hicks. Add to the above the undisputed fact that he conducts weekly meetings with employees, conducts exit evaluations, which must be favorable if the employee is to be eligible for rehire, and participates in the applicant interview process by determining whether the resumes of applicants justify scheduling an interview of the applicant(s) by Hicks or Richmond, and it is clear that there is more than enough evidence in the record to show that McCabe possesses several of the indicia of statutory supervisory authority set forth in Section 2(11) of the Act.

In sum, I conclude that Richmond and McCabe intentionally tailored their testimony concerning the extent of the project coordinator's authority to meet the needs of Respondent's case. I find their testimony is not worthy of credit.

I find for the reasons stated that McCabe has at all times material been a supervisor and an agent of Respondent within the meaning of Section 2(11) and (13) of the Act.[17]

Analysis and Conclusions

I. THE ALLEGED INDEPENDENT 8(A)(1) VIOLATIONS

A. By Edwin McCabe

Paragraph 7 of the complaint alleges that Respondent, through McCabe, violated Section 8(a)(1) on April 14, 1982, by: interrogating employees about their union membership and activities and the membership and union activities of others; creating the impression that the union activities of employees were under surveillance; and soliciting their grievance and promising them better benefits and improved working conditions. The paragraph also alleges that on April 22, McCabe threatened to discharge employees if they remained in the Union.

Respondent contends that McCabe acted lawfully when he interrogated employees on April 14 because he announced to them that he was attempting to learn whether a rumor that they were organizing was true and he conducted the interrogation in a noncoercive manner. With respect to the grievance solicitation allegation, it contends that activity was lawful because McCabe did nothing other than continuing the policy of conducting weekly meetings and discussing problems. Finally, Respondent claims the surveillance and threat to discharge allegations are not supported by any credible evidence.

In the normal circumstances, an employer cannot question or poll employees to ascertain their union sentiments as such conduct is inherently coercive. Controlling law in polling situations is set forth in Struksnes Construction Co., 165 NLRB 1062, 1063 (1967), in which the Board stated:

> Absent unusual circumstances, the polling of employees by an employer will be violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act unless the following safeguards are observed: (1) the purpose of the poll is to determine the truth of a union's claim of majority, (2) this purpose is communicated to the employees, (3)

[17] Assuming, arguendo, that McCabe was actually required to obtain Richmond's approval before taking action that would affect the animal care technicians, it is clear that Richmond instructed McCabe on April 14 to investigate the union situation by discussing it with Respondent's employees. In such circumstances, Respondent is responsible for his acts.

assurances against reprisal are given, (4) the employees are polled by secret ballot, and (5) the employer has not engaged in unfair labor practices or otherwise created a coercive atmosphere.

Patently, the interrogation accomplished by McCabe during his discussions with individuals and subsequently with all the technicians at the April 14 meeting fails to meet the criteria set forth in Struksnes. I find, as alleged, that by interrogating employees concerning their union membership, activities, and sympathies, and the union membership, activities, and sympathies of others, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The General Counsel claims that McCabe created the impression that the union activities of the technicians were under surveillance by Respondent by telling them: (1) that he had heard a rumor they were organizing; and (2) by commenting at the April 14 meeting that he had received a call from Hicks and she was surprised to hear they were involved with the Union and wanted to know if it was true. In support of his claim, he cited World Wide Press, 234 NLRB 346 (1979), and Engineered Apparel, 243 NLRB 66 (1979). In both of the cited cases, employer representatives asked employees questions concerning union meetings that suggested that such representatives have some knowledge of what had occurred or who had attended such meetings. Here, McCabe made no comment that would cause employees to conclude their meetings or other union activities were being observed and reported to Respondent. I find that the General Counsel has offered insufficient evidence to prove the surveillance allegation and recommend that paragraph 7(b) of the complaint be dismissed.

Respondent failed to controvert employee Bryant's testimony that reveals that during the April 14 meeting McCabe, when asking why the employees had joined the Union, inquired whether the employees could not run their complaints through normal channels. The General Counsel contends that by making the comment McCabe was soliciting the employees' grievances or complaints and impliedly promising to remedy them. Noting that the record fails to reveal that any employee attending the meeting voiced any complaints and the fact that it was not shown that McCabe made any express comments to urge the employees to voice their grievances or complaints, I find that the record fails to reveal that employee complaints or grievances were seriously solicited by McCabe during the April 14 meeting. Accordingly, I recommend that paragraph 7(c) of the complaint be dismissed.[18]

The General Counsel sought to prove that McCabe threatened employees during the April 23 meeting by causing employee Long to testify that McCabe asked them during the meeting if they were aware of the consequence of joining the Union and the fact that the NIOSH employees planned to make them scapegoats. Long's testimony was not contradicted and, as found, supra, Hicks made similar comments during the April 23 meeting after observing she could not pay employees who joined the Union because it engaged in lobbying activities and her SBA contract prohibited Ebon from providing funds for the lobby activity. Viewing McCabe's comments in context, I conclude the employees attending the meeting could have reasonably concluded that McCabe, by making the scapegoat comment, was telling them they would be discharged if they joined the Union. I find the comment was threatening as alleged and that through McCabe's described actions Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) as alleged.

B. By Dr. Hicks

Paragraph 8 of the complaint alleges that during the April 23 meeting Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) as Hicks allegedly: (1) threatened employees with discharge if they joined the Union; (2) solicited employees to express their union sympathies; and (3) threatened employees that Respondent's service contracts would be terminated if employees joined the Union.

Having found, supra, that during the course of the April 23 meeting Hicks or McCabe asked the employees how involved they were with the Union and had they actually joined yet, I find that, by posing such questions to the employees, Respondent unlawfully solicited employees to express their union sympathies and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

Similarly, having found, supra, that Hicks told Respondent's employees on April 23 that she could not pay them if they joined the Union and it was her opinion that the Union was making scapegoats of them because she would have to terminate them to avoid violating her contract and the NIOSH employees would end up performing the work then performed by Ebon employees, I find that Respondent threatened employees with discharge if they joined the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

While the General Counsel contends that Hicks told employees during the April 23 meeting that Respondent's service contracts would be terminated if they joined the Union, it appears, as noted, supra, that instead she told them she had been attempting to obtain a new 3-year animal care contract and she was not sure she could even get a 1-year contract now as their attempt to join the Union had shaken up administration at the ALOSH facility so bad. It is clear that Hick's comments were of such a nature as to inhibit the employees in the exercise of their right to join or remain members of the Union. Through the comments, I find that Respondent threatened, coerced, and restrained its employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

C. The No-Solicitation Rule

Paragraphs 7(a) and 9 of the complaint allege that Respondent promulgated and published an unlawful no-solicitation rule when it sent copies of the April 16 letter from Hicks to employees. The pertinent part of the letter, which is set forth completely supra, is:

[18] No evidence was offered to support the allegation that the employees were promised increased benefits and improved terms and conditions of employment.

> Lastly, it has come to my attention that some Ebon employees may be using duty time to engage in activities not related to their work assignment. Let me caution you that under no circumstances are you to direct any duty hours to any activities other than your specific job responsibilities. Moreover, it is your responsibility to report to your immediate supervisor any attempts of any one to engage you in non-job related activities during duty time. As an Ebon employee, you are expected to exhibit a high level of job performance and professional conduct at all times. The success of the contract is directly related to your performance as an individual.

During her appearance on the witness stand, Hicks claimed the portion of the letter quoted above had nothing to do with the Union. I find this testimony to be illogical and unbelievable as she expressly informed NIOSH official Shamblee on April 16—the same day her letters to employees were sent—inter alia:

> I would appreciate very much your investigation of the situation. Most importantly, I would hope that the Union members are informed to cease soliciting activities and disrupting the work of my employees. Any steps taken to resolve these issues are welcomed. I am thanking you in advance for your efforts.

It is clear, and I find, that Hicks intended, when using the work "activities" and the term "non-job related activities" in her April 16 letter to employees, to warn employees that they were not to engage in union activities during "duty hours" or "duty time."

In Walton Mfg. Co., 126 NLRB 697, 698 (1960), the Board set forth the general rule to be observed in situations involving promulgation and enforcement of no-solicitation and no-distribution rules applicable to working time."

> No-Solicitation or no-distribution rules which prohibit union solicitation or distribution of union literature by employees during working time are presumptively valid as to their promulgation, in the absence of evidence that the rule adopted for a discriminatory purpose; and are presumptively valid as to their enforcement, in the absence of evidence that the rule was unfairly applied.

Subsequently, in Stoddard-Quirk Co., 138 NLRB 615 (1962), the Board held unlawful a rule, the reach of which prohibited employees from distributing union literature in nonwork areas during their nonworking time. Most recently, in T.R.W., Inc., 257 NLRB 442 (1981), a case involving the legality of a no-solicitation rule, the Board stated at 443:

> We, however, see no inherent meaningful distinction between the terms "working hours" and "working time" when used in no-solicitation rules. Both terms are, without more, ambiguous, and the risk of such ambiguity must be borne by the promulgator of the rule. Either term is reasonably susceptible to an interpretation by employees that they are prohibited from engaging in protected activity during periods of the workday when they are properly not engaged in performing their work tasks (e.g., meal and break periods). As such, either term tends unlawfully to interfere with and restrict employees in the exercise of their Section 7 organizational rights.
> . . . .
> In view of the foregoing, we hold that rules prohibiting employees from engaging in solicitation during "work time" or "working time," without further clarification, are, like rules prohibiting such activity during "working hours," presumptively invalid.

In the instant case it is clear that Hicks, without expressly prohibiting her employees from engaging in "union" activity during duty hours, accomplished the same object by using general words and terms. Moreover, it is clear that she composed the letter and sent it to employees immediately after learning they were showing interest in union representation. I find the rule she promulgated was unlawfully broad as it prohibited union solicitation during periods of the workday when employees are properly not performing their work tasks. Having concluded that Hicks sought by promulgating the rule at the very outset of the union organization campaign to limit the union activities of Respondent's employees any time they were on ALOSH premises, I find the rule was adopted for an unlawful purpose. In sum I find, as alleged, that by promulgating and distributing the rule, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

D. Respondent's Rejection of Moore's Request for Reconsideration

The complaint alleges that by informing discharged employee Moore that Respondent would not reconsider its discharge decision because of the pending union campaign, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

As noted, supra, Hicks notified Moore by letter dated April 23 that she would not reconsider her decision to discharge Moore "because of policies of the National Labor Relations Board that advise me that I cannot perform any personnel acts that may influence the employees in making a free choice relative to a union election."

The General Counsel contends in his brief (p. 31) that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by telling Moore it would not reconsider its discharge decision because of the union campaign and Board procedures because such a statement conveys that a benefit is being denied because employees engaged in protected activities and that somehow the Board condones or requires the denial of this benefit. I agree and find that by giving the quoted reason for failing to reconsider its discharge decision, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

II. THE ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST MOORE

A. The Termination

The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by terminating Cindy Moore because she engaged in union activities and by altering the job requirements of the research technician position to permit it to refuse her rehire when it commenced performance of its second animal support contract in mid-1982. With respect to the discharge, the General Counsel contends, in the alternative, that Moore was discharged for engaging in protected concerted activity in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Respondent defends its decision to terminate Moore by contending it had no knowledge of her union activities on April 16; that the sole reason for her discharge was in honest belief that she had made a false safety report. It defends its refusal to rehire her in a research technician position at the commencement of performance of its second animal support contract by contending that NIOSH's desire that the technicians be capable of working in all of its research laboratories compelled it to elevate the job requirements to a level that rendered Moore unqualified.

In the instant case, Respondent admits it terminated Moore on April 16, 1982, because she reported to NIOSH maintenance on April 9 that the ventilation hood in room 281-A of the facility was malfunctioning. General Counsel's witnesses Gamble and Tucker, both employed by NIOSH, testified they noted the buildup of formaldehyde fumes in the lab during the morning of April 9, and Tucker indicated he advised Moore to leave the lab if the buildup persisted. Additionally, Tucker indicated Moore advised him she had or was going to call maintenance regarding the problem. Witness Gamble and Moore credibly testified that they had previously reported the hood in question had malfunctioned, and witness Lucas testified her exposure to formaldehyde fumes when working under the hood had required her to take several hours of sick leave in February 1982.

In NLRB v. Washington Aluminum Co., 370 U.S. 9 (1962), the U.S. Supreme Court held that employees who concertedly protest working conditions at their place of employment are engaged in protected concerted activity within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act, and if they are discharged for engaging in such activity the employer violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Under Board law, "An individual's actions may be considered to be concerted in nature if they relate to conditions of employment that are matters of concern to all affected employees."[19] In such instance, it is immaterial that the individual had not been delegated by other employees to act on their behalf and had not informed any other employee that he was doing so "so long as there is evidence that fellow employees share the acting employee's concern and interest in common complaints."[20]

Here, the evidence clearly reveals that when Moore called NIOSH maintenance on April 9 to report that the hood in room 281-A was malfunctioning, she was pursuing a matter of common concern to other employees and those employees did not disavow her action. It is clear, and I find, that by reporting the hood malfunction on April 9, Moore engaged in protected concerted activity.

It does not automatically follow from the foregoing, however, that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by terminating Moore. While the General Counsel urges me to discount the testimony given by NIOSH employees Riley, Lewis, and Dalton, I found them to be credible witnesses and concluded on hearing their testimony that they had formed an honest but mistaken belief that Moore had actually made a false report on April 9. Assuming that Hicks simply accepted their honest opinion, her position is one in which she terminated Moore with an honest but mistaken belief that she made a false report on April 9. On many occasions the Board has considered analogous situations in strike situations where employers have terminated strikers in the honest but mistaken belief that they engaged in serious strike misconduct. It has uniformly held that the employer violates the Act if it is established that the employee did not in fact engage in the misconduct the employer honestly felt they had engaged in.

For the reasons set forth, I find that by discharging Cindy Moore on April 16, 1982, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged. Having found the discharge violates Section 8(a)(1), I find it unnecessary to extend this decision by resolving the 8(a)(3) issue.[21]

B. The August 3 Refusal to Reemploy Moore

Paragraphs 12 and 13 of the complaint allege, and the General Counsel contends, that Respondent increased the job requirements and qualifications of the research technician position on or about August 2, 1982, to enable it to refuse to reemploy Moore when it began performance of the 1982–1983 animal support contract. I find the contention to be without merit.

The record reveals that during the course of the 1981–1982 animal support contract Moore assisted NIOSH scientist Marilyn Gamble with experiments in the pathology lab 4 days a week. As found, supra, NIOSH official Ames testified he indicated dissatisfaction with the permanent assignment of Ebon employees to NIOSH personnel and when the 1982–1983 contact was entered into it provided that the Ebon research technicians would perform laboratory work 5 days a week and would be rotated to the various labs, i.e., immunology lab, biochemistry lab, pathology lab, and the physiology lab. Respondent claims it elevated the educational requirements of the research technicians to be used to perform the 1982–1983 contact by requiring a bachelor's degree in biology, animal or veterinary science, agriculture, or similar credentials in a related field to enable them to perform adequately in the four laboratories named above.

Having accepted Ames' testimony, I conclude that his objection to the permanent assignment of Ebon's research technicians to a single NIOSH scientist justified

[20] Diagnostic Center Hospital Corp., 228 NLRB 1215 (1977).

[21] I note, however, that I would impute McCabe and Richmond's knowledge of Moore's solicitation activities to Hicks as I do not credit her claim that she did not learn of Moore's activities until after she discharged her.

Richmond's decision to assign the research technicians to all four labs on a rotating basis during the term of the 1982–1983 animal support contract. As the technicians were to be performing work that patently required greater familiarization with the different scientific areas, I similarly conclude that this decision to elevate the educational qualifications for the position was warranted.

Moving to Moore's situation, I note that her resume, which was placed in the record as Respondent's Exhibit 5, reveals she is a high school graduate, studied in college 1 year, and performed several animal care jobs prior to her employment by Respondent. While her educational and work background, including her year of employment with Respondent, appears to have qualified her to perform the animal care functions and the pathology lab functions that Respondent was obligated to perform at the ALOSH facility during the term of its 1982–1983 animal support contract, the General Counsel offered no evidence to show she could capably and knowledgeably perform as a research technician in the immunology, biochemistry, or physiology labs.

In sum, it is undisputed that when Moore was interviewed by Hicks on August 3 she indicated she was applying for a research technician's position and she was not interested in one of the two animal care positions that were available. I conclude the record fails to reveal that Moore met the qualifications for the research technician position and, consequently, that Respondent did not violate the Act as alleged by refusing to consider her for the position.

III. THE REPRESENTATION CASE

The objections filed by the Union in Case 6–RC–9248, which were consolidated with the unfair labor practice cases for hearing before me are:

1. The Employer, acting through the project coordinator, did: "(d) On or about April 22, 1982, threatened employees with discharge if they joined the union."

2. Employer, acting through the executive director:

> (a) By letter dated April 16, 1982, promulgated and since said date has maintained a rule prohibiting employees from engaging in any non-job related activities during duty hours and requiring employees to report to Employer any violations of said rule.
> (b) On or about April 23, 1982, at the Employer's Morgantown, West Virginia, facility, threatened employees with discharge if they joined the union.
> (c) On or about April 23, 1982, at the Employer's Morgantown, West Virginia, facility, solicited employees to express their union sympathies.
> (d) On or about April 23, 1982, at the Employer's Morgantown, West Virginia, facility, threatened employees that Employer's service contract would be terminated if employees joined the Union.
> (e) By letter dated April 27, 1982, informed discharged employee Cindy L. Moore (herein called Moore) that Employer would not reconsider its discharge decision because of the pending union campaign.

3. Employer promulgated the rule described above in subparagraph 2(a) in order to discourage its employees from joining, supporting, or assisting the union, and engaging in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid and protection.

6. On or about August 2, 1982, the Employer increased the job requirements and qualifications of its employees.

7. On or about August 2, 1982, the Employer changed job requirements and refused to rehire Moore.

9. By the acts of the employer described herein, the Employer did invalidate the election.

As Objections 1(d), 2(a)–(e), and 3 are coextensive with paragraphs 7(d), 8(a)–(e), and 9 of the complaint, and I have found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by engaging in the conduct alleged in the referenced paragraphs of the complaint, I sustain the above-indicated objections. As Objections 6 and 7 are coextensive with paragraphs 12 and 13 of the complaint, and I have found the General Counsel failed to prove the violations alleged therein, Objections 6 and 7 are found to be without merit and are overruled. Objection 9 is conclusionary in nature and is disposed of by the comments set forth below.

Having found that objections 1(d) 2(a)–(e), and 3 are meritorious, I further conclude that by engaging in such objectionable conduct Respondent interfered with the laboratory conditions necessary to ensure that the employees could exercise a free and untrammeled choice in the election held on January 5, 1983. Accordingly, I recommend that the January 5, 1983 election be set aside and that the Board order that a second election be held in Case 6–RC–9248.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By engaging in the unlawful acts described in section III, above, Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

4. Respondent has not violated the Act except to the extent specifically indicated in section III, above.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent will be required to make whole employee Cindy Moore for any loss of earnings she suffered as a result of the discrimination practiced against her with backpay to be computed on a quarterly basis, making deductions for interim earnings, with interest to be paid in accordance with the Board's decision in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[22] As the record reveals all animal care technicians at the Morgantown, West Virginia ALOSH facility were terminated effective June 10, 1982, and I have found that Cindy Moore was not unlawfully refused reemployment by Respondent on or about August 2, 1982, the backpay period will run from May 1 through June 9, 1982.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[23]

ORDER

The Respondent, Florence J. Hicks d/b/a Ebon Research Systems, Morgantown, West Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Interrogating employees concerning their union activities or the union activities of other employees.

(b) Threatening employees by informing them they may lose their jobs if they elect to have union representation.

(c) Discouraging membership in America Federation of Government Employees, Local 3430, AFL–CIO, or in other labor organization, by informing employes they are scapegoats and continued support of the above-named Union will cause them to be replaced by government employees and/or prevent their employer from obtaining long-term contracts.

(d) Promulgating and enforcing an unlawful broad no-solicitation rule that prohibits employees from engaging in union-related solicitation during periods when they are properly not engaged in performing their work tasks (e.g., meal and break periods).

(e) Discouraging employees from protesting unsafe work conditions by terminating or otherwise disciplining employees because they report unsafe conditions to NIOSH.

(f) Informing employees that discharge action will not be reconsidered because of Board requirements or because a petition for an election is pending before the Board.

(g) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole employee Cindy Moore for any loss of pay she suffered as a result of the discrimination practiced against her in the manner set forth in the remedy section above.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its Morgantown, West Virginia ALOSH facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[24] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 6, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[22] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[23] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[24] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DONALD R. HOLLEY, Administrative Law Judge. On 24 July 1986, the Boad remanded this case to me "for further consideration consistent with the Decisions and Orders in Res-Care, Inc.,[1] and Long Stretch Youth Home,[2] . . . including if necessary, a reopening of the record on the jurisdictional issue."

On 30 October 1986, further hearing was held in the case in Morgantown, West Virginia. During that resumed hearing, the General Counsel introduced documentary evidence and adduced testimony through one witness. Respondent offered no additional evidence.

Subsequent to the close of the hearing, on 23 December 1986, Respondent filed a posthearing brief. Thereafter, the General Counsel and the Charging Party filed motions to strike designated portions of Respondent's brief and reply briefs. Additionally, the General Counsel filed a motion to correct the record in designated respects.[3] On 2 February 1987, Respondent filed opposition to the General Counsel's motion to strike portions of its brief, and on 13 February 1987, it filed opposition to the Charging Party's motion to strike portions of its brief.[4]

[2] 280 NLRB 678 (1986).

[3] The motion to correct the record was unopposed. It is granted.

[4] Although the motions to strike portions of Respondent's brief appear to be partially meritorious, I find it unnecessary to extend this decision by discussing them and ruling on them as my findings are based on record evidence.

On the entire record, and from my observation of the witnesses who appeared to give testimony, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

Respondent, a sole proprietorship, with its principal office located in Washington, D.C.,[5] with a place of business in Morgantown, West Virginia, is engaged in the business of providing research assistance and other services to, inter alia, agencies of the United States. Its gross revenue for the performance of such services throughout the United States exceeds $1 million annually, and it admits that during the 12-month period ending 30 April 1982, it provided services valued in excess of $50,000 to the United States Government within the State of West Virginia. Its Morgantown, West Virginia operation is the only operation immediately involved in the instant case.

On the above facts, I find that Respondent meets the Board's monetary standards for assertion of jurisidiction over nonretail enterprises.

The Division of Respiratory Disease Studies, Laboratory Investigations Branch of the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH) conducts a variety of pulmonary research experiments and projects at its Appalachian Laboratory for Occupational Safety and Health (the facility) which is located in Morgantown, West Virginia. The experiments are accomplished by exposing small animals such as rats and rabbits to aerosols such as mineral dusts, metals, organic dusts, and cotton dust. Thereafter the effect of the exposures on various organs of the animals is analyzed by NIOSH scientists.

During calendar years 1981 and 1982, Respondent performed services at the facility pursuant to four contracts with U.S. Government agencies. Two of the contracts required Respondent to perform specified animal care and/or husbandry and animal research support functions for NIOSH.[6] Those contracts were between the Small Business Administrative (SBA) and Respondent, and were assigned by SBA to NIOSH when negotiations had been completed. A third contract required Respondent to furnish two lab technicians who were to assist NIOSH scientists in the conduct of experiments involving the exposure of animals to cotton dusts. That contract was between the United States Department of Agriculture (USDA) and Respondent, and it was valued at approximately $40,000.[7] The fourth and final contract required Respondent to man the library at the facility with a librarian and a library aide. It, like the animal husbandry and animal research support contracts, was between SBA and Respondent, but was assigned to NIOSH for administration and payment.[8]

Respondent contends that various U.S. Government agencies exercise such pervasive control over the terms and conditions of employment of its employees working at the above-described facility that it is unable to engage in meaningful collective-bargaining with a labor organization. It contends that application of the principles enunciated by the Board in Res-Care, Inc., supra, should cause me to find that the Board will not assert jurisdiction over its Morgantown, West Virginia operations.

Counsel for the General Counsel and the Charging Party contend Respondent retains sufficient control over the terms and conditions of employees to permit it to bargain meaningfully with a labor organization. The scope and degree of control exercised by the exempt entities over Respondent's labor relations and the controls over essential terms and conditions of employment retained by Respondent are sumarized below.

Status of Contractor

The animal care and animal research support contracts and the library contract specifically provide that Respondent was to perform its services independently, rather than as an agent of the Government.

Wage and Fringe Benefits

While Dr. Hicks, Respondent's executive director, testified that Respondent proposed wage rates for the employees who would be performing the services required by the above-described contracts, and NIOSH and USDA agreed with Respondent's proposals, the 1981 and 1982 contractors in evidence do not indicate the wages to be paid to employees in various job classifications. The record does suggest, however, that the fixed fee library contract contained reference to the total compensation to be paid to Respondent for each hour the librarian and the library aide worked, as the information sent to Respondent by NIOSH when it was invited to submit a bid for the work reveals that during performance of the contract commencing 10 October 1980 and ending 30 September 1981, Respondent was to be paid a fixed fee, with amounts payable to be calculated by reimbursing Respondent $7.96 for librarian hours worked, and $4.98 for library aide hours worked.[9] The document further provided:

> The rate, or rates, set forth covers all expenses including report preparation, salaries, overhead, general and administrative expenses, and profit, excluding costs for travel and per diem which are reimbursable in accordance with Article XXIV—Travel and Per Diem.

While no wage rates for employees performing services pursuant to the animal care and animal research support contracts (NIOSH through SBA), and no rates for [5] At the time the original unfair labor practice hearing was held, its principal office was located in Rockville, Maryland.

[6] See G.C. Exhs. 12 and 30. The contracts were No. 210-81-2117, a cost reimbursement contract, effective from 11 June 1981 to 10 June 1982, which was valued at $123,037, and No. 210-82-2104, a cost reimbursement contract effective from 1 August 1982 to 31 July 1983, which was valued at $178,208.

[7] The contract, No. USDA 53-7B30-1-379, was not placed in evidence.

[8] A document sent by NIOSH to Respondent when the latter was invited to bid work appears in the record as G.C. Exh. 28(a). Excerpts of the contract, No. 12-80-0006, are attached to G.C. Exh. 29. It was effective from 1 October 1981 to September 1982, and was valued at $57,000. The record reveals Respondent provided the same library services during calendar years 1979 and 1980 for $50,000 per year.

[9] The representation case record reveals the library aide was given a wage increase by Respondent.

the technicians who were to provide services pursuant to the USDA contract are set forth in those contracts, Dr. Hicks claimed during her testimony in the representation case that the U.S. Department of Labor (DOL) issued wage determinations that were applicable to those contracts. She further testified that the wage determinations set forth the minimum and maximum rates that could be paid to employees in the various job classifications. Such alleged wage determinations were not placed in either the representation case record or the record in the instant case. In the absence of documentary support, I find Dr. Hicks' claim that DOL issued wage determinations that set maximum rates for employees in job classifications to be suspect and accord it no weight. A copy of the Service Contract Act, as amended,[10] was placed in evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 34. Inspection of that act reveals that wage determinations issued by DOL set forth "minimum," "prevailing rates," or rates set forth in collective-bargaining agreements.

With respect to fringe benefits, the record reveals Respondent's employees performing work at the Morgantown facility receive sick leave, annual leave, and holiday benefits that conform to those received by NIOSH employees. Additionally, they receive accident and health benefits pursuant to Respondent's own plan, which is based to some extent on seniority. While none of the contracts described above indicate the specific fringe benefits employees performing work pursuant to the contracts will receive, I note the 1981–1982 animal care and animal research support contract between NIOSH (through SBA) and Respondent was renegotiated on 27 July 1982 and the new agreement indicated Respondent would be reimbursed at the provisional rate of 23 percent of total direct labor dollars for fringe benefits during the period 1 August 1982 through 30 September 1983.[11] Dr. Hicks testified she satisfied [illegible] fringe benefit requirement imposed by the Service Contract Act by proposing to pay stated fringe benefits that the contracting officer approved. According to Hicks, the contracting officer was obligated to assure that the fringe benefit payments proposed by Respondent met the requirements of DOL.[12]

While the record fails to fully reveal the extent to which involved exempt entities control the wages and fringe benefits received by Respondent's employees who perform work at the Morgantown NIOSH facility, it does reveal that the contracts described above specifically make the general conditions set forth in HEW Document 3/16 (Rev. 7/76), entitled "General Provisions for Negotiated Cost—Plus—Fixed Fee Type Contract,"[13] applicable to the contracts. Insofar as is here relevant, that document requires Respondent to pay contract employees time and one-half their hourly rate for time worked in excess of 8 hours in a workday or for time worked in excess of 40 hours in a regular workweek. Additionally, it provides a mechanism for renegotiation of the contractor's labor cost increases during the term of the contract.[14]

Leaving the matter of direct exempt entity control of wages and fringe benefits, I note the above-mentioned contracts contain certain indirect provisions that regulate, to some extent, the moneys Respondent must pay its employees at the facility. Thus the animal care and animal research support contracts require that Respondent supply sufficient services "commencing at 8:00 a.m., on all Federal holidays, Saturdays, and Sundays, in order to satisfactorily accomplish regular animal husbandry activities and/or technical support project support as required to meet various task goals."[15] Such contracts further indicate emergency services outside those hours should be provided pursuant to an "on call" system. Similarly, the library contract(s) specifically provides personnel assigned by the contractor will work only on a straight time (8 hours per day) basis, and that when such personnel are on unauthorized vacation or sick leave a replacement with comparable qualifications will be provided by the contractor.[16]

While Respondent's agreement to provide the services set forth in the above-described contracts for stated amounts place some rather obvious restrictions on its ability to grant contract employees increased remuneration during the term of the agreements, it is uncontradicted that Respondent is not precluded from increasing the wage or fringe benefits of its employees by any of the contracts. Dr. Hicks admitted during her testimony that she could utilize profits to increase wages or benefits. Moreover, as indicated by General Counsel Robert Edgill, whose qualifications include 10 years of negotiating, implementing, and monitoring services contracts as a Government employee, machinery is provided to permit renegotiation of contracts when direct labor costs increase during the term of a service contract.

Control Employees

The contracts between Respondent and the Government entities involved in this case each contain general provisions relating to contract employees such as: the hours during which they are to work; detailed descriptions of the work to be performed; qualifications employees should possess; the areas of the Morgantown facility in which they will perform their duties; and indication that NIOSH will issue them passes and a requirement that they abide by NIOSH safety rules; and indication that the Government will provide support functions such as mail handling, security, communications, and xeroxing. Additionally, the animal care and animal research support contracts indicate, inter alia, that contract employees will abide by certain NIH guidelines and the Animal Welfare Act when caring for animals; that cage washing and sanitation will be accomplished in accordance with standard written procedures; that all wearing apparel, cleaning agents, laundry, and special safety equipment will be selected in consultation with the NIOSH project officer; that all supplies will be furnished by the Government; that NIOSH must approve the use of all insecticides and rodent entrapment devices, approve the site for use of incineration equipement for the disposal of animal carcasses; and that Government employees will dispose of all animal carcasses contaminated with hazardous materials.

In addition, the contracts involved herein provide that NIOSH has the authority to provide "technical direction" to Respondent's employees who perform work at the facility. Technical direction is defined in the 1981–1982 animal care and research animal care contract to include the following:

> a. Direction to the Contractor which redirect the contract effort, shift work emphasis between work areas or tasks, require pursuit of certain lines of inquiry, fill in details or otherwise serve to accomplish contractual statement of work.
> b. Provisions of information to the Contractor which assists in the interpretation of drawings, specifications or technical portions of the work description.
> c. Review and, where required by the contract, approval of technical reports, drawings, specifications and technical information to be delivered by the Contractor to the Government under the contract.

Witness Fredrick Ames, the administrator of the NIOSH Division of Respiratory Disease Studies at the facility, clearly indicated during his testimony that the authority to give technical direction did not confer supervisory authority on NIOSH personnel who worked with Respondent personnel. He characterized as illegal attempts by NIOSH personnel to supervise contract personnel, indicating NIOSH personnel were constantly told not to engage in such activity.

While NIOSH, by virtue of contractual provisions, exercised the above-described control over Respondent's employees working at the Morgantown facility, the record reveals Respondent retained marked control over those employees. Thus, Dr. Hicks testified that while NIOSH indicated the work to be performed and enlightened her regarding the skills and education required, she, frequently assisted by Dr. Lee Richmond, director of Respondent's Health Division, interviewed applicants and decided which applicants interviews, Respondent was not obligated to follow any suggestions such individuals made, and was free to hire those applicants it desired to hire.

The record reveals the Respondent personnel working under the animal-related contracts received their day-to-day supervision from Ed McCabe, Respondent's project coordinator. The library aide was supervised by Collen Harrington, the librarian. Both McCabe and Harrington reported to Hicks, frequently through Richmond. While the library functions dictated the work to be performed by the library aide, McCabe prepared work schedules for the animal research technicians. The technicians who performed work pursuant to the USDA contract worked with the same team of scientists constantly, but the technicians working under the original SBA (NIOSH) contract worked 1 day each week in the animal care quarters and the remaining 4 days in a laboratory. Mechnically, NIOSH personnel submitted requisitions for assistance to McCabe indicating the assistance they needed and the timeframe involved, and McCabe then scheduled employees to fill the requests. In event NIOSH personnel were not satisfied with the performance of Respondent personnel, McCabe was notified and he, Richmond, or Hicks handled the problem. Hicks testified any complaints voiced by NIOSH concerning her personnel were independently investigated before action was taken. She alone retained and exercised the authority to fire Respondent personnel.

While the record reveals NIOSH personnel, principally Major Purvis, the project officer, reviewed the performance of Respondent contract personnel to ascertain whether Respondent was fulfilling its contractual obligations, the record reveals Respondent evaluated the performance of its employees at the end of their probationary period, once each year, and it conducted exit interviews and evaluations at the end of each contract period if employees were terminated at that time. If NIOSH was not satisfied with Respondent's performance of its contractual obligations, its recourse was to terminate the contract.

The record reveals none of the contracts described herein preclude Respondent from entering collective-bargaining agreements. In addition, they pose no limitations in the common areas of collective-bargaining such as use of seniority systems, grievance procedures, retirement plans, profit sharing, and health insurance.

The Service Contract Act

During the resumption hearing, the General Counsel placed the Service Contract Act in evidence. Respondent does not dispute the contention that the contracts involved herein, which are all for amounts exceeding $2500, subject it to the provisions of that Act. The General Counsel contends the following provisions of the Act are relevant.

Section 351(a)(1) which states:

> (a) Every contract (and any bid specification therefor entered into by the United States or the District of Columbia in excess of $2,500, except as provided in section 356 of this title, whether negotiated or advertised, the principal purpose of which is to furnish services in the United States through the use of service employees shall contain the following:
> (1) A provision specifying the minimum monetary wages to be paid the various classes of service employees in the performance of the contract or any subcontract thereunder, as determined by the Secretary, or his authorized representative, in accordance with prevailing rates for such employees in the locality, or, where a collective-bargaining agreement covers any such service employees, in accordance with the rates for such employees provided for in such agreement, including prospective wage increases provided for in such agreement as a result of arm's-length negotiations. In no case shall such wages be lower than the minimum specified in subsection (b) of this section.

Section 351(a)(2) states:

(2) A provision specifying the fringe benefits to be furnished the various classes of service employees, engaged in the performance of the contract or any subcontract thereunder, as determined by the Secretary or his authorized representative to be prevailing for such employees in the locality, or, where a collective-bargaining agreement covers any such service employees, to be provided for in such agreement, including prospective fringe benefit increases provided for in such agreement as a result of arm's-length negotiations. Such fringe benefits shall include medical or hospital care, pensions on retirement or death, compensation for injuries or illness resulting from occupational activity, or insurance to provide any of the foregoing, unemployment benefits, life insurance, disability and sickness insurance, accident insurance, vacation and holiday pay, costs of apprenticeship or other similar programs and other bona fide fringe benefits not otherwise required by Federal, State, or local law to be provided by the contractor or subcontractor. The obligation under this subparagraph may be discharged by furnishing any equivalent combinations of fringe benefits or by making equivalent or different payments in cash under rules and regulations established by the Secretary.

Section 353(c) states:

(c) No contractor or subcontractor under a contract, which succeeds a contract subject to this chapter and under which substantially the same services are furnished, shall pay any service employee under such contract less than the wages and fringe benefits, including accrued wages and fringe benefits, and any prospective increases in wages and fringe benefits provided for in a collective-bargaining agreement as a result of arm's-length negotiations, to which such service employees would have been entitled if they were employed under the predecessor contract: Provided, that in any of the foregoing circumstances such obligations shall not apply if the Secretary finds after a hearing in accordance with regulations adopted by the Secretary that such wages and fringe benefits are substantially at variance with those which prevail for services of a character similar in the locality.

Analysis and Conclusions

In Res-Care, Inc., supra, the Board reaffirmed the test set forth in National Transportation Service, 240 NLRB 565 (1979), for determining whether it would assert jurisdiction over an employer with close ties to an exempt Government entity, stating 280 NLRB at 672:

the inquiry would be whether the employer itself met the definition of an "employer" in Section 2(2) of the Act and, if so, whether the employer retained sufficient control over the employment conditions of its employees to enable it to engage in "effective" or "meaningful" bargaining with a labor organization.

Thereafter, the Board indicated that National Transportation and its progeny failed to set forth a clear explanation of the elements of effective or meaningful bargaining, noting the decisions failed, in particular, to define (a) those areas of an employer's labor relations that are sufficiently important that the employer cannot bargain meaningfully if the exempt entity removes or severely restricts the employer's discretion, and (b) the circumstances under which the Government entity will be deemed to have removed or severely restricted such discretion. It then stated that, in applying the above-quoted test, it would examine closely the control over essential terms and conditions of employment retained by the employer as well as the scope and degree of control exercised by the exempt entity over the employer's labor relations to determine whether the employer in issue is capable of engaging in meaningful collective bargaining.

The facts set forth supra, reveal that Respondent's control over its employees in matters other than their remuneration is marked. Thus, Respondent has the right to hire, fire, transfer, reprimand, supervise, and evaluate its employees independent of significant interference from any Government entity. Moreover, it is free to determine the policies it will follow with respect to collective-bargaining subjects such as establishment of grievance procedures, seniority plans, pension or profit-sharing plans, life insurance plans, and health insurance plans. Indeed, it is free to decide whether it will oppose or accept its employees' desire to have a labor organization represent them in bargaining. While NIOSH dictates that employees will work stated hours, will work in specified areas, will comply with facility's safety regulations, and will otherwise conduct themselves in a fashion that will permit it to achieve its objectives, it exercises only technical direction over the employees when they are actually performing their contract services. I find Respondent exercises virtually complete control over the day-to-day activities of its employees, and it retains marked control over labor policies it will pursue.

In the instant case, unlike the situation before the Board in Res-Care, Inc., supra, or Long Stretch Youth Home, supra, the Respondent-Employer was signatory to contracts with Government entities that were subject to the Service Contract Act. Employers subject to that Act are required to pay employees the prevailing wage and benefits received by workers in the area where performance of the contract work is to be accomplished. In the absence of issuance by DOL of a wage determination applicable to a given contract, the employer must pay its employees the statutory minimum wage. Patently, the Service Contract Act encourages covered employers to determine the wage and benefits their employees will receive through collective bargaining with a labor organization, as the Act affords the employer and his employees protection from unfair competition when a given contract is open for rebidding.

As noted above, the record in the instant case fails to reveal whether DOL issued wage determinations applicable to the four contracts described. It does reveal, however, that Respondent exercised considerable discretion in determining the wages and fringe benefits that its employees would receive. Thus Hicks' testimony reveals Respondent made initial determinations with respect to those matters and her decisions were then reflected in proposals that were accepted by the SBA and USDA contracting officers. Significantly, the record fails to reveal that any of the contracts thereafter entered by Respondent placed any upper limit on the wages or fringe benefits Respondent could award to its employees.

As contended by Respondent, the fact that it agreed to perform stated services for a stated dollar amount places a very real limitation on its ability to grant wage or fringe benefit increases to its employees during the term of any given contract. This is particularly true with respect to the USDA contract and the library contract as both indicate Respondent would furnish two employees to supply the services called for by the contracts. Additionally, the library contract indicates the rate per librarian and library aide hours worked at which Respondent will be reimbursed. Respondent was not so limited with respect to the animal care and animal research support contracts, however, as it was not contractually obligated to employ a specified number of employees by those contracts. Here, as in Res-Care, it is clear that to obtain more contract money for employee remuneration Respondent was required to convince the appropriate contract officer that approval of a request for more money was in the interest of the Government.

The General Counsel and counsel for Charging Party both cite Zapex Corp. v. NLRB, 621 F.2d 328 (9th Cir. 1980), and NLRB v. Pope Mfg. Corp., 573 F.2d 898 (5th Cir. 1978), in their briefs. In both cases, the Board, with court approval, asserted jurisdiction over employers performing services for fixed amounts under contracts subject to the Service Contract Act. My review of those cases causes me to conclude the Board will not refuse to assert jurisdiction over an employer who contracts to perform work for a U.S. Government entity merely because it agrees to perform stated services for a stated dollar amount, and it is required by law to pay its employees certain minimum wages and a stated level of fringe benefits.

In sum, the record reveals Respondent is exclusively responsible for the formulation of labor policies and procedures regarding hiring, firing, supervising, evaluating, scheduling, and disciplining of employees performing work at the Morgantown facility. Further, its contracts with Government entities place no restrictions on its ability to negotiate with a labor organization concerning bargaining subjects such as pensions, grievance procedures, seniority, or other similar matters related to the terms and conditions of employment of employees. While Respondent's contracts, like the employer's contract in Res-Care, restrict its ability to increase employee remuneration because Respondent has agreed to provide stated services for a stated dollar amount, Respondent's situation differs from that of the employer in Res-Care as none of its contracts except the library contract make any reference to the wages to be paid to its employees, and none of the contracts contain any provisions that control the maximum wages or fringe benefits it can award its employees. While the instant employer's contracts are subject to the Service Contract Act, that act does not restrict Respondent's ability to engage in collective bargaining. Indeed, it encourages such action and affords subject employers protection from competitors once arm's-length bargaining has occurred. In the circumstances described, I find that while Government entities exert substantial control over the wages and fringe benefits to be received by Respondent's employees, that control is not pervasive within the meaning and intendment of Res-Care.[17]

In my view, Respondent can engage in meaningful collective bargaining with a labor organization with respect to the terms and conditions of employment of its employees. Accordingly, I find it would effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction over Respondent's operations.[18]

[17] At fn. 22 of Res-Care, supra, the Board indicated that DOL's approval of Res-Care's budget, when considered in conjunction with the wage ranges and benefit levels approved, by DOL, constituted the direct limits on employee compensation that constitute control of employee relations, and not the fact that DOL placed an effective ceiling on such expenditures by limiting Res-Care's total budget. Here, only the contract price constitutes a contractual limit on the compensation Respondent's employees can receive. Neither the contracts nor the law (Service Contract Act) restrict the maximum wage or benefit levels that Respondent can utilize. Such factors clearly distinguish this case from Res-Care, supra.

[18] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings and conclusions herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Consolidated Freightways and Charles Hennessey.
Case 33–CA–4364

July 29, 1988

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On January 5, 1981, the Board issued a Decision and Order[1] finding that the Respondent has discharged Charles Hennessey in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act. Thereafter, the Respondent filed a petition for review and the Board filed a cross-application for enforcement with the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

On December 11, 1981, the court remanded the case to the Board to reconsider requiring the Respondent to reinstate Hennessey with backpay.[2] The court held that the Board has failed to consider the significance of Hennessey's motives for refusing reinstatement.

On March 23, 1982, the Board notified the parties that it had decided to accept the court's remand and that they could file a statement of position. Statements have been filed by the General Counsel and the Respondent.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision of the court in light of the statements of position and makes the following findings:

The background facts, as more fully set out in the judge's decision, may be briefly summarized. The Respondent discharged employee Hennessey for his refusal to drive a tractor-trailer. Based on credited testimony, the judge concluded that Hennessey refused to operate the tractor because it was dangerous and was in violation of safety statutes. Further, the judge found that under the collective-bargaining agreement, Hennessey's refusal constituted protected concerted activity for the purposes of mutual aid and protection and his termination was in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

Approximately three weeks after his discharge, Hennessey filed a grievance, which was arbitrated pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement. The arbitrator awarded Hennessey his former job back with full seniority and paid up health and welfare and benefits, but no backpay. The award also ordered that a final warning letter be placed in Hennessey's personnel file. The day the arbitration award was announced, the Respondent offered Hennessey reinstatement on its terms. Hennessey rejected the offer.

The judge found that the Respondent's offer of reinstatement made in accordance with the arbitration award was not valid because the award required that a warning letter be placed in Hennessey's file. The judge, therefore, ordered the Respondent to offer Hennessey reinstatement with backpay.

The Respondent excepted, contending that its offer of reinstatement was adequate because neither the warning letter nor the lack of backpay made the offer conditional. In adopting the judge's decision, the Board, to clarify any ambiguity, stated that the refusal to include accrued backpay in the otherwise valid offer of reinstatement does not render the offer invalid.

In support of its argument that the warning letter did not make the offer invalid, the Respondent submits that at the time the Respondent's offer was made, Hennessey was not aware that the offer was conditioned on a warning letter being placed in his file.[3] Rather, according to Hennessey's undisputed testimony, his rejection was based on the failure of the reinstatement offer to include backpay. The Respondent contends that because Hennessey did not view the warning letter as an impediment to his return to work, the presence of the warning letter should not void an otherwise valid offer of reinstatement.

The Board agreed with the judge that the Respondent's offer of reinstatement was invalid because placing the warning letter in Hennessey's personnel file as a prerequisite to his reinstatement rendered the offer conditional and therefore inadequate.

On remand, the court has instructed us to explain our rationale for not inquiring into the reasons Hennessey rejected the Respondent's offer and to reconcile our position with Research Designing Service, 141 NLRB 211 (1963); L. Ronney & Sons Furniture Mfg. Co., 97 NLRB 891 (1951), enfd. as modified 206 F.2d 730 (9th Cir. 1953), cert. denied 346 U.S. 937 (1954), and the line of cases holding that the Board will look to the reason the discriminatee rejects an offer of reinstatement to determine if the offer is valid.

Initially, it is clear that the reinstatement obligation is satisfied only by a valid offer of reinstatement. As stated in Lipman Bros., 164 NLRB 850

[1] 253 NLRB 988 (1982).
[2] 669 F.2d 790 (1981).

[3] We note that Hennessey was present during the arbitral proceedings. Hennessey however,testified that he had no recollection of being told about the condition.

(1967), "An employer's offer of reinstatement must be firm, clear, and unconditional." Until such time as a valid offer of reinstatement has been made the discriminatee does not have to make a choice. Lyman Steel Co., 246 NLRB 712 (1979); Heinrich Motors, 166 NLRB 783 (1967), enfd. 403 F.2d 145 (2d Cir. 1968); Leeding Sales Co., 155 NLRB 755 (1965).

As stated in Craw & Sons, 244 NLRB 241 (1979):

> However, where the offer of reinstatement has been conditional and has not satisfied the Board's and the court's order of reinstatement, the discriminatees are under no obligation to reply to or to accept such conditional offer of reinstatement.

See also W. C. McQuaide, Inc., 239 NLRB 671 (1978), enfd. 617 F.2d 349 (3d Cir. 1980); Murray Products, 228 NLRB 268 (1977), enfd. 584 F.2d 934 (9th Cir. 1978).

In the instant case, the offer made by the Respondent was clearly conditional on its face. Hennessey was offered reinstatement pursuant to the arbitrator's award, which required that a warning letter be placed in his file. This clearly renders the offer invalid because "a Board order for reinstatement of a discriminatee is designed to place that individual in the same position the individual would have been in had there not been discrimination against him." Craw & Son, above at 242. The placement of the warning letter in Hennessey's personnel file would not have returned him to the position he occupied before the discrimination against him. Instead, he could return to work only under the threat of the letter of warning. This condition made the offer of reinstatement by the Respondent invalid.[4] Hennessey was under no obligation to respond to the offer and we will not look into his motivation or reasons for his refusal. We will not allow a discriminatee's response to an offer invalid on its face to "retroactively validate [an offer] which [was] deficient when made." Murray Products, 584 F.2d at 942. If, and only if, an offer of reinstatement is fully valid on its face, then an examination of a discriminatee's reasons for declining the offer must be undertaken.

Those cases cited by the court, i.e., Research Designing Service and L. Ronney, supra, are distinguishable from the instant case. In Research Designing, the judge found that certain offers of reinstatement were invalid because it became apparent after several employees accepted the employer's offers and began working that the offers were in effect conditioned on their working as new employees insofar as seniority and vacation pay were concerned. Because these proved invalid, the judge not only gave a remedy to the employees who had accepted reinstatement, but also declined to cut off the backpay of two other employees who had refused reinstatement offers at the outset for reasons unrelated to the invalid conditions. 141 NLRB at 230. The Board reversed concerning the two employees, holding that their refusal of reinstatement for reasons other than the invalid conditions warranted terminating the respondent's liability for reinstatement and backpay when the offers were refused. Id. at 216–217. Although the Board spoke in terms of the two employees' lack of awareness of the invalid conditions, the reinstatement offer, when made, apparently had no invalid conditions attached—unlike the circumstance in the present case, in which reinstatement was expressly premised on the terms of the arbitration award, and which contains the invalid condition.[5]

Regarding L. Ronney, we cannot determine, from the Board's decision, whether the offer of reinstatement (to employee Clinton) was valid on its face. The decision speaks of a letter sent to Clinton, but does not reveal whether it contained the invalid condition (a requirement that the reinstated employee join an illegally assisted union). 97 NLRB at 892. In any event, assuming in arguing that L. Ronney indicates that the Board will examine a discriminatee's reasons for declining a reinstatement offer even when the only offer made is invalid on its face, we overrule it and other similar cases[6] and adhere to the rule of Craw & Son, supra, [4] In finding the offer was invalid on its face, it is appropriate to focus on the terms of the offer as required by the arbitration award. Thus, it is not relevant that Hennessey could not recall being informed of the condition at the time the arbitration award was announced.

As explained below, in our discussion of the issue whether the arbitrator's award could properly be deferred to, the letter of warning itself constitutes an interference with Sec. 7 rights. This is so because it operates as a penalty for the exercise of the right to invoke the protections of a collective-bargaining agreement. See NLRB v. City Disposal Systems, 465 U.S. 822 (1984). It can hardly be contended that a reinstatement offer that includes what amounts to an independent violation of the Act is a valid offer.

[5] Hribar Trucking, 166 NLRB 745, 756 fn. 19 (1967), modified on other grounds 406 F.2d 854 (7th Cir. 1969); Eastern Die Co., 142 NLRB 601 (1963), enfd. 340 F.2d 607 (1st Cir. 1965), cert. denied 381 U.S. 951 (1965); and Ekco Products Co., 117 NLRB 137 (1957), cited by the court in remanding this case, follow the analysis of Research Designing. In our view, critical to all four cases is the fact that the respondents made facially valid offers of reinstatement. The Board looked to the discriminatees' reasons for rejecting those offers to distinguish employees who never learned that illegal conditions were attached to the offer on implementation from employees who tested the facially valid offers only to discover that they were not, in fact, valid. The Board tolled backpay for the former, who never uncovered the unlawful conditions, but not the latter.

[6] See, e.g., Atlantic Maintenance Co., 134 NLRB 1328, 1329 (1961), enfd. 305 F.2d 604 (3d Cir. 1962), in which the Board found an unlawfully conditioned offer of reinstatement did not toll backpay, but noted, in dictum, that it had not been clearly established that the discriminatees would have rejected a valid offer of employment. that a reinstatement offer invalid on its face obviates the obligations on the part of a discriminatee to respond and that a discriminatee's refusal of the offer, on whatever ground, will not relieve the respondent employer of its obligation to make a valid offer in order to toll the running of backpay.

Our requirement that an employer must first extend a facially valid offer of reinstatement before we examine a discriminatee's reasons for declining the offer is fully consistent with the purposes and policies of the Act. The reason is clear; it is the Respondent who acted unlawfully in discharging Hennessey. The equities of the situation fall with Hennessey, the wrongfully discharged employee. It is thus incumbent on the Respondent to extend to the injured employee a facially valid offer of reinstatement before the burden shifts to the injured employee to accept or reject the offer. Anything short of this is inconsistent with the statutory policy that a transgressor should bear the burden of the consequences stemming from its illegal acts. See Sheet Metal Workers Local 355 (Zinsco Electrical Products), 254 NLRB 773 (1981), enfd. in part, remanded in part 716 F.2d 1249 (9th Cir. 1983).[7] Because, as noted above, we would require that a discriminatee respond to a facially valid offer and, in those circumstances, would place on him the burden of showing that any refusal of the offer was based on invalid conditions that came to his attention, we believe that our overall policy respecting responses to reinstatement offers establishes a proper balance between the vindication of Section 7 rights and a discriminatee's duty to mitigate damages.

In footnote 15 of its decision, the court indicated that it need not reach the issue whether the Respondent's good-faith reliance on the arbitrator's award was sufficient, in itself, to toll its backpay liability. The court noted that resolution of this issue depends on whether the Board could properly further the strong national policy in favor of private settlement of labor disputes without abdicating its responsibility to remedy violations of national labor law. The Board has established under Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955), Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984), and their progeny, a policy of deferring to a decision of an arbitrator when (1) the unfair labor practice was presented and considered by the arbitrator; (2) the arbitral proceedings were fair and regular; (3) all parties agreed to be bound; and (4) the decision is not repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act. The judge in his decision found that the award "fails to remedy the alleged unfair labor practices so as to warrant the Board's deference to such Board.

Thus, the Board found here that the arbitrator's award was repugnant to the Act and deferral was not appropriate. If we nonetheless find that the Respondent's backpay obligation was tolled because it complied with the repugnant award, we would, in substantial effect, be deferring to the award.

Certainly, there may be circumstances that the Board will defer to an arbitrator's award that does not include the same remedy as the Board would require to remedy an unfair labor practice.[8] To defer here to the arbitrator's remedy however, would permit the Respondent to discipline an employee for activity found by us and the arbitrator to be protected; clearly not an "interpretation consistent with Board policy."[9]

In any event, in this case we have an arbitrator's award that did not warrant deferral. Accordingly, to determine whether the Respondent in these circumstances has tolled its backpay obligation, it is proper to judge the Respondent's offer by the standard the Board normally uses. An award to which deferral was not warranted is completely void.

Here again, the offer was conditional on its face and thus was not a valid offer to reinstatement. Therefore, the burden of the loss must fall on the Respondent rather than the unlawfully discharged employee. See Safeway Trails, Inc., 233 NLRB 1078 (1977), enfd. 641 F.2d 930 (D.C. Cir. 1979), cert. denied 103 LRRM 2668 (1980). Therefore, as Hennessey did not receive, as we require, a facially valid offer of reinstatement, he is entitled to full backpay as set forth in the remedy section of our original decision.[10]

[7] In urging that an unlawfully discharge employee's motive for rejecting an offer of reinstatement should be examined, the Respondent argues that the Board has done so in the past. In support of this petition, the Respondent, in its brief, relies on Alcan Cable West, 214 NLRB 236 (1974). Although it is correct that the judge, in his decision in Alcan, examined the unlawfully discharged employee's reason for rejecting the employer's offer of reinstatement, the Board did not rely on that finding. Rather, the Board found that the employee in question was never offered substantially equivalent employment. Thus, contrary to what the Respondent portrays as the Board's holding in Alcan, the Board clearly did not rely on the judge's examination of the discharged employee's reason for rejecting the offer of reinstatement. Alcan, 214 NLRB at 237 fn. 3.

[8] See, e.g., Combustion Engineering, 272 NLRB 215 (1984). There the Board noted, "The arbitrator's remedy, though perhaps different from what the Board would have ordered de novo, is reasonably based and is susceptible to an interpretation consistent with Board policy." Id. at 217.

[9] Hypothetically, suppose an arbitrator awarded an employee reinstatement on the condition that the employee not engage in any protected concerted activities? The award would clearly be repugnant to the Act. Surely, an employer's reliance on an offer of reinstatement made pursuant to such an award could not serve to toll an employer's backpay obligation.

[10] In fn. 16 of its remand, the court noted the Board's willingness in Abilities & Goodwill, Inc., 241 NLRB 327 fn. 5 (1979), and Marlene Industries Corp., 255 NLRB 1446, 1449 fn. 12 (1981), to consider whether an employee would have rejected a valid offer even in the absence of such an offer. Both cases treat the backpay and reinstatement rights of discharged strikers. Abilities & Goodwill, overruling precedent, determined that discriminatorily discharged strikers should be treated as other dischargees, running the backpay period from the date of the discharge to the date of the respondent's valid offer of reinstatement without requiring the strikers to request reinstatement. In recognition of their status as strikers prior to their discharge, the Board expressly observed that the respondent could reduce or avoid its backpay liability by establishing that the discriminatee would not have accepted the offer if made, or by any other evidence demonstrating a willful loss of earnings. Although participation in an unfair labor practice strike does not automatically defeat the right to backpay, it can affect the amount recoverable if the employer can sustain the burden of showing willful loss in that the strike hampered the efforts of the discriminatee to mitigate damages by seeking new employment. Bon Hennings Logging Co., 132 NLRB 97, 99 (1961), enfd. 308 F.2d 548, 558 (9th Cir. 1962); Ra-Rich Mfg. Corp., 120 NLRB 503, 505 (1958), enfd. 276 F.2d 451 (2d Cir. 1960). The willful loss of earning doctrine, available in all backpay determinations, ensures that only actual losses are compensated. Phelps Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177, 197 (1941). To the extent these cases also allow an inquiry into a discharged striker's desire for reinstatement prior to receipt of a valid offer, the Board, we think, may properly differentiate in its treatment of backpay between discriminatees whose rights were violated while they were on the job and discriminatees who were withholding their services at the time of their discriminatory discharge.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board affirms its Decision and Order at 243 NLRB 988 and orders that the Respondent, Consolidated Freightways, Peru, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On June 29, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Leonard M. Wagman issued the attached backpay decision[1] and on July 13, 1983, granted without opposition from the Respondent the General Counsel's motion to correct the decision by adding to Appendix B, Schedule B-2, the attached document that reflects the manner in which the backpay of Tyynismaa was computed for the first and second quarters of 1980. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Supplemental Decision and Order.

The judge properly found that Tyynismaa is entitled to recover the sum of $46,738.54 plus interest to make him whole for the loss of earning he suffered by reason of the discrimination against him. The judge also properly found that Tyynismaa and Williamsen were respectively entitled to pension fund contributions of $4121 and $3673 plus interest for each amount.

However, the judge rejected a settlement agreement executed by Williamsen in consideration of the Respondent's payment of $10,000 to him as full resolution of his backpay claim, and found instead that Williamsen was entitled to $30,108.11 plus interest, less the $10,000 already paid him, to make him whole for the loss of earnings he suffered by reason of the discrimination against him. We disagree for the reasons given below.

For purposes of evaluating non-Board settlements of backpay and other remedial orders, American Pacific Concrete Pipe Co., 290 NLRB 134 (1988), incorporated from Independent Stave Co., 287 NLRB 740 (1987), the following factors that the Board had taken into account in approving a non-Board settlement of an unfair labor practice complaint: (1) whether the charging party(ies), the respondent(s), and any individual discriminatee(s) have agreed to be bound, and the position taken by the General Counsel; (2) whether the settlement is reasonable in light of the nature of the violations alleged, the risks inherent in litigation, and the state of the litigation; (3) whether there has been any fraud, coercion, or duress by any of the parties in reaching the settlement; and (4) whether the respondent has engaged in a history of violations of the Act or has breached previous settlement agreements. The Board in Independent Stave was also careful to stress that the foregoing list was not exhaustive, leaving the door open to the consideration of other factors that parties in future cases might urge as relevant.

However, at the time of the hearing in the instant case, in February 1983, the governing law was stated in Michael M. Schaefer, 261 NLRB 272, 273 (1982), enfd. 697 F.2d 558 (3d Cir. 1983), cert. denied 464 U.S. 945 (1983), a decision that was not overruled until American Pacific. Under that rule an individual could not compromise "any backpay which might be due him (or her)," because reimbursement of the amount owed was regarded as a "public right which only the Board or the Regional Director may settle" (emphasis added). It is, therefore, not surprising that, on the objection of counsel for the General Counsel, the judge here limited the purpose for which the settlement agreement was being admitted, accepting it only as evidence of the amount that had actually been paid to Williamsen, which could be offset against the amount finally determined to be due. Although there was some questioning of Williamsen by the Respondent's counsel, by the counsel for the General Counsel, and by the judge concerning Williamsen's reasons for accepting the settlement and the circumstances surrounding his acceptance, counsel for the General Counsel had no particular incentive to explore the subject thoroughly.

Thus, there was no occasion to introduce what if any evidence existed about the factors set forth above, including particularily whether there was any fraud, duress, or coercion in securing the settlement agreement.

Given the particular facts, here, the current record does not afford us sufficient evidence by which to assess the appropriateness of the settlement. Therefore, we remand this portion of the case for a further hearing. Accordingly, we shall substitute the following Order for the judge's supplemental Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, M & B Contracting Corporation, Novi, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall pay to the following employess the sums shown below plus interest thereon accrued to the date of payment, computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded,[3] minus any tax withholding required by Federal or state law.

William Tyynismaa

Backpay—$46,738.54
Pension Contributions—$4,121.00

Robert Williamsen

Pension Contributions—$3,673.00

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the portion of this proceeding relating to the settlement of Williamsen's backpay claim is remanded to Administrative Law Judge Leonard M. Wagman for the purpose of reopening the record in order that the parties may present relevant evidence regarding the settlement in light of our decision. Thereafter, the judge shall prepare and serve on the parties a second supplemental decision containing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and a recommended Order in light of the Board's remand. Following service of such second supplemental decision on the parties, the provisions of Section 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations shall be applicable.

MEMBER JOHANSEN, dissenting in part.

Contrary to my colleagues, I would accept the settlement reached by employee Williamsen and the Respondent. In my view, the record adequately establishes that Williamsen agreed to a reasonable settlement in circumstances free of any fraud, coercion, or duress. Accordingly, the settlement should be upheld. See American Pacific Concrete Pipe Co., 290 NLRB 134 (1988).

[3] 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

Any interest applicable to pension fund contributions shall be paid in accordance with the criteria set forth in Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979).

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

LEONARD M. WAGMAN, Administrative Law Judge. This supplemental proceeding to determine the amounts of backpay due, respectively, to Robert Williamsen and William Tyynismaa, who were unlawfully terminated by Respondent M & B Contracting Corporation[1] was heard by me on February 7, 1983, at Detroit, Michigan, on the General Counsel's backpay specification issued on December 3, 1982, and thereafter amended at the hearing and the Respondent's answer. Following the hearing, Respondent and the General Counsel filed briefs.

On the record before me, and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after careful consideration of the briefs, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE ISSUES

On consideration of the amended specification and the Respondent's answer, I find that the issues presented by the pleadings are: (1) whether the calendar quarter expenses and net interim earnings set forth for Williamsen, in schedule D-1, and for Tyynismaa, in schedule D-2 are true; (2) whether the net interim earnings by calendar quarters deducted from calendar quarter gross pay to yield calendar quarter net backpay for discriminatee Williamsen in schedule E-1 and for discriminatee Tyynismaa in schedule E-2 and the expenses shown for each were true; (3) whether Tyynismaa would have been disabled from working for Respondent during the third and fourth quarters of 1978; (4) whether the Respondent was obligated to make fringe benefit contributions on behalf of Williamsen and Tyynismaa during the backpay period; and (5) whether Robert Williamsen was entitled to $30,124.11 in backpay and $3673 in fringe benefit funds, and whether William Tyynismaa was entitled to $47,149.02 in backpay and $4121 in fringe benefit funds.

II. THE BACKPAY SPECIFICATION

A. The Facts

On December 3, 1982, the Regional Director for Region 7 issued and duly served on the Respondent a backpay specification and notice of hearing alleging the amount of backpay due employees Williamsen and Tyynismaa, respectively, and further the amounts that Respondent was obligated to pay on behalf of Williamsen and Tyynismaa to the Central States Southeast and Southwest Areas Pension Fund, pursuant to collective-bargaining agreements in effect during the backpay periods. At the hearing, the General Counsel amended

[1] The Board with court approval found that the Respondent terminated Williamsen and Tyynismaa in violation of the National Labor Relations Act and directed that Respondent make the two whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of its unfair labor practices. M & B Contracting Corp., 245 NLRB 1215 (1979), enfd. 653 F.2d 245 (6th Cir. 1981).

schedule D-1 of the specification by removing a claim for $16 in expenses that resulted in a total of $1809.03 as total interim earnings for Williamsen for the second quarter of 1978. The General Counsel also amended schedule D-2 of the specification by eliminating expenses claimed by William Tyynismaa amounting to $410.48 and revising Tyynismaa's total interim earnings for the second quarter of 1978 to $4308.41. After making these amendments, the General Counsel rested his case. In its answer regarding the expenses and interim earnings claimed for Williamsen and Tyynismaa in the specification, Respondent asserted that it "is without sufficient information to form a belief as to the truth or falsity of said interim earnings and expenses."

The specification asserted that although Tyynismaa was unable to work for his interim employer during the third and fourth quarters of 1978, he would have not been disabled from employment by Respondent during the same period. In its answer, the Respondent asserted that Tyynismaa's disability would have prevented him from working for Respondent during the third and fourth quarters of 1978.

The Company also contended that it had no obligation to make any fringe benefit contributions on behalf of either Williamsen or Tyynismaa during the backpay period. Finally, the Respondent in its answer challenged the accuracy of the stated interim earnings and expenses "as well as the periods of time that the discriminatees were unavailable for work and/or did not diligently seek to mitigate their losses."

At the hearing, the Company did not present any evidence in support of its allegations regarding the backpay claim of Robert Williamsen. Instead, the Company showed that Robert Williamsen on December 3, 1982, executed a settlement agreement under which he received $10,000 from Respondent in return for his agreement to release the Company from any further claims growing out of his unlawful discharge as found by the Board in the instant cases.

In support of contentions made for the first time in its brief, Respondent argued that Tyynismaa was not entitled to backpay because of his questionable credibility and the inaccuracy of his reports to the Regional Director of his interim earnings. In support of this position, Respondent, at the hearing, introduced Tyynismaa's testimony and related documents. Tyynismaa's testimony showed only that he had no detailed recollection of his interim earnings. He attempted to explain the approximation that he had furnished to Board Agent Berman in a letter dated January 1980, when he attempted to provide data relating to his interim earnings. Respondent's examination of Tyynismaa also demonstrated that he could not explain several deductions in his income tax returns as prepared by his accountant. However, Tyynismaa's testimony showed that during the tax year 1979, one of the years under scrutiny, he and his wife kept informal records that he did not review and that he turned over to his accountant for preparation of their joint tax return. The extent of the inaccuracies in Tyynismaa's estimate of his interim earnings was demonstrated by his assertion in his letter to Board employee Berman that in both the third and fourth quarter of 1979, his estimated gross interim earnings were $40,000. His testimony and his income tax return for that year indicate that in fact his income for those two quarters was substantially less than $80,000. However, as he pointed out, he believed that he was not entitled to backpay for those two quarters, and thus had no interest in being accurate.

Collective-bargaining agreements in effect between September 1977 and August 1980 required the Company to make weekly contributions to the Central States Southeast and Southwest Areas Pension Fund on behalf of Williamsen and Tyynismaa between September 1977 and August 1978, thus a weekly contribution of $28 per employee. For the period between September 1978 and August 1979, that obligation rose to $31, and between September 1979 and August 1980, it was $37.

B. Analysis and Conclusions

Respondent contended that Tyynismaa was not entitled to recover any backpay on the ground that he was unable to account for his interim earnings credibly. Respondent further contended that the settlement agreement between itself and Williamsen was entitled to acceptance by the Board as complete resolution of Williamsen's backpay claim under the specification. Finally, the Respondent denied that it was obligated to make any fringe benefit contributions on behalf of either Williamsen or Tyynismaa during the backpay period presented here. I find no merit in these contentions.

The "finding of an unfair labor practice . . . is presumptive proof that some back pay is owed." NLRB v. Mastro Plastics Corp., 354 F.2d 170, 178 (2d Cir. 1965), cert. denied 384 U.S. 972 (1966). The General Counsel's burden in a backpay proceeding is simply to show the gross backpay due the claimant. Mastro Plastics Corp., 136 NLRB 1342, 1346 (1962). Once that is done in the backpay specification, the employer has the burden of establishing affirmative defenses that would mitigate liability including wilfull loss of earnings and interim earnings to be deducted from the backpay award. NLRB v. Brown & Root, Inc., 311 F.2d 447, 454 (8th Cir. 1963); Southern Household Products, 203 NLRB 881 fn. 2 (1973); Heinrich Motors, 166 NLRB 783 (1967).

Here, the Respondent failed to sustain its burden of establishing the infirmities that its answer attributed to the specification. Respondent presented no evidence to rebut the Regional Director's backpay and fringe benefit determinations regarding Williamsen. Nor has Respondent sustained its burden of showing that the Regional Director's determinations regarding the backpay and fringe amounts due William Tyynismaa were inaccurate.

Respondent contended that Tyynismaa should not receive any backpay on the ground that he willfully concealed interim earnings from the Regional Director. I find this contention lacking in substantiation.

Respondent argued that the Board's decision in Great Plains Beef Co., 255 NLRB 1410, 1415 (1981), required denial of backpay to Tyynismaa. There, the Board declined to award backpay to employee Ferman D. Trotter on the ground that he willfully concealed interim earnings from the Regional Director. Respondent has made no such showing in the instant case, regarding Tyynis-maa. Here, all that Tyynismaa's testimony showed was that he was not an informative witness. His testimony did not show that he withheld information regarding any interim employment from the Regional Director or that he otherwise attempted to conceal his earnings.

In sum, the Company has failed to present sufficient evidence to sustain the affirmative defenses challenging the specification.

Board policy does not support Respondent's contention that Williamsen and Tyynismaa were not entitled to weekly pension contributions as provided in the collective-bargaining agreement that covered them during the backpay period. For the Board has recognized that its backpay orders include such contributions. Carpenters Local 347 (Newton Associates), 231 NLRB 688, 690 (1977).

In agreement with the General Counsel, I conclude that under Board policy, I cannot accept Respondent's agreement with Williamsen as a complete settlement of the latter's backpay claim. Thus, as the Board stated in Michael M. Schaefer, 261 NLRB 272, 273 (1982):

> It is well settled that an individual may not waive, bargain away, or compromise any backpay which might be due him (or her) since it is not a private right which attaches to the discriminatee, but is, indeed, a public right which only the Board or the Regional Director may settle.

This quoted policy requires that I reject the settlement agreement executed by Robert Williamsen in consideration of the payment of $10,000 by Respondent to him as full resolution of his backpay claim. However, the $10,000 that Williamsen received will be deducted from the total amount due him under the instant order. I therefore find that Robert Williamsen is entitled to recover the sum of $30,108.11 plus interest to make him whole for the loss of earnings he suffered by reason of the discrimination against him.[2] I also find that Williamsen is entitled to pension fund contributions totaling $3673 plus interest.[3]

I further find that William Tyynismaa is entitled to recover the sum of $46,738.54 plus interest to make him whole for the loss of earnings he suffered by reason of the discrimination against him.[4]

I also find that Tyynismaa was entitled to pension fund contributions totaling $4,121 plus interest.[5]

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On June 8, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Linton issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, San Antonio Control Systems Inc., San Antonio, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] We adopt the judge's finding that the General Counsel did not establish voluntary recognition under Sec. 9(a) of the Act. In so doing, however, we find it unnecessary to pass on whether there was a sufficient demand for recognition here because there is insufficient evidence concerning majority union support of the Respondent's employees at the time recognition—whether under Sec. 8(f) or Sec. 9(a)—was extended.

[2] The General Counsel excepts to the judge's failure to include a visitatorial clause in the recommended Order. A visitatorial clause authorizes the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing the Board's Order. Under the circumstances of the case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Accordingly, we deny the General Counsel's request. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

Robert S. Breaux and Guadalupe Ruiz, Esqs., for the General Counsel.

John A. Ferguson Jr., Esq. (Harris & Padgett), of San Antonio, Texas, for the Respondent.

Robert C. Moczygemba, of San Antonio, Texas, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD J. LINTON, Administrative Law Judge. The issues litigated here include allegations that the Employer unlawfully refused to bargain and illegally discharged two employees. In a recent decision the Board abandoned its rules concerning the conversion of an 8(f) contract to a 9(a) contract. John Deklewa & Sons, 282 NLRB 1375 (1987). That decision has a substantial impact on most of the allegations here, and I dismiss all but one of the refusal to bargain allegations. Finding no prima facie case that Respondent was unlawfully motivated in discharging the two employees, I dismiss that allegation as well.

This case was tried before me in San Antonio, Texas, on 9–12 December 1986 pursuant to the consolidated complaint (complaint) issued 2 September 1986 (as amended 1 October 1986) by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board through the Regional Director for Region 23.[1] The complaint is based on charges filed 8 July 1986 in Case 23–CA–10434, and 1 August 1986 in Case 23–CA–10453, by International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO, Local Union No. 60 (Union, IBEW Local 60, or Charging Party) against San Antonio Control Systems Inc. (Respondent or SACS).[2]

In the complaint the General Counsel alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act on 11 June when Ronald Rice, Respondent's president, told employees that he no longer would pay their fringe benefits as specified in the collective-bargaining agreement (CBA); Section 8(a)(3) by reducing wages of employees on 1 June and on 23 June by terminating employees Charles D. Stewart and Joseph R. Stout; and Section 8(a)(5) by various unilateral actions between 26 May and 1 July, culminating on 1 July, and thereafter, by refusing to furnish data requested by the Union and by refusing to bargain with the Union.

By its answer, Respondent admits certain factual matters, but denies violating the Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel[3] and the Respondent,[4] I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

A Texas corporation headquartered in San Antonio, Texas, SACS, as a subcontractor in the building and construction industry, installs temperature control systems in commercial buildings. During the past 12 months SACS purchased products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000, which items were received from points located outside Texas. Respondent admits, and I find,

[1] All dates are for 1986 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] I show Respondent's name without a comma after Systems because that is the way it appears in the letterhead on the firm's stationery.

[3] Counsel for the General Counsel, Guadalupe Ruiz, attached a proposed order and notice to his brief. By his 10 January 1987 motion for extension of time to file brief, Attorney Ruiz advised that he would be preparing and submitting the General Counsel's brief following the hospitalization of the General Counsel's trial attorney, Robert S. Breaux.

[4] Respondent subsequently filed a motion, dated 9 March 1987, to dismiss the complaint based on the Board's recent decision in John Deklewa & Sons, 282 NLRB 1375 (1987). The General Counsel filed a response and opposition dated 12 March 1987.

that it is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Based on other commerce allegations in the complaint, Respondent admits, and I find, that the South Texas Chapter, National Electrical Contractors Association (NECA) is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. NECA and its member firms comprise an employer association that exists in whole or in part for the purpose of bargaining on behalf of its members with the Union concerning the rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment of the employees of NECA's members.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits, and I find, that IBEW Local Union No. 60 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Impact of John Deklewa & Sons

1. Contentions of the parties—Respondent's motion to dismiss

The General Counsel's case regarding the refusal-to-bargain allegations hinges on the contention (Br. at 7–9) that the bargaining unit consisted of two electricians, Joseph R. Stout and Charles D. Steward, as a craft unit separate from Respondent's three other employees.

In February 1982 Respondent signed a "Letter of Assent–B" agreeing to be bound by the terms of the Union's CBA with NECA. Later that month Stout and Steward joined the Union. The most recent CBA was effective from 1 June 1985 to 31 May 1986.

The General Counsel alleges (complaint par. 11) and contends (Br. at 11; Response at 2) that at all material times the Union has been the exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining unit by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act. According to the General Counsel's view of the evidence, 9(a) representative status was established "from the beginning" (February 1982) when SACS voluntarily recognized the Union based on majority support within the appropriate unit (Br. at 11; Response at 2). Consequently, when the CBA expired on 31 May the usual presumptions applied: (1) majority status rebuttably presumed, and (2) SACS could make no unilateral changes short of an impasse in bargaining or, after withdrawing recognition based on the Union's loss of majority or objective indications, that the Union had lost that status.

Contending that the Respondent has shown neither a valid impasse during the May–July 1986 bargaining sessions nor objective indications that the Union had lost its majority status, the General Counsel argues that the Respondent's unilateral changes after the CBA expired on 31 May are unlawful (Br. at 12–13; Response at 2).

SACS analyzes this case entirely different. First, the bargaining relationship created in February 1982, based on the "Letter of Assent–B," was established under Section 8(f) of the Act—not under Section 9(a).

Second, the bargaining unit alleged has never been an appropriate unit under Section 9(a) because it improperly carves two employees from a total work force of five when all five do essentially the same work, using essentially the same skills. Although Stout and Stewart joined the Union in February 1982, the other three did not. There is no evidence or contention that the Union ever represented, or even sought to represent, these other three.

Although the Respondent's argument on brief has additional ramifications, I will not summarize them because it is obvious that the brief was prepared before counsel had obtained a copy of John Deklewa & Sons, 282 NLRB 1375 (1987). After filing its brief, Respondent submitted its four-page 9 March 1987 motion (Motion) to dismiss the complaint based on Deklewa. The General Counsel filed a four-page response and opposition (Response) dated 12 March 1987.

Deklewa has a dramatic impact on the analysis to be applied to this case. In that case the Board ruled that it will apply its "new 8(f) principles to this case and to all pending cases in whatever stage." Deklewa at 1389.

In Deklewa the Board overruled prior case law, abandoned its conversion doctrine, and established a new policy. System Electric Co., 283 NLRB 650 (1987). Under the new policy an 8(f) contract is enforceable under the Act, but such a contract will not bar the processing of valid petitions filed pursuant to Section 9(c) and (e). On expiration of an 8(f) agreement, the signatory union will enjoy no presumption of majority status, and either party may repudiate the 8(f) bargaining relationship. Deklewa at 1378, 1385, 1388.

2. Discussion and conclusions

As mentioned, the General Counsel contends (Br. at 11; Response at 2) that Respondent voluntarily recognized the Union, and specifically relies on the Board's language at footnote 53 in Deklewa.

> We do not mean to suggest that the normal presumptions would not flow from voluntary recognition accorded to a union by the employer of a stable work force where that recognition is based on a clear showing of majority support among the unit employees, e.g., a valid card majority. Island Construction Co., 135 NLRB 13 (1962). That is, nothing in this opinion is meant to suggest that unions have less favored status with respect to construction industry employers than they possess with respect to those outside the construction industry.

Since Deklewa, the General Counsel cannot rely on the conversion doctrine (stable work force plus majority status converts an 8(f) relationship into one protected by 9(a)) to argue that a 9(a) relationship was established and that the usual presumptions apply following expiration of the CBA. Under Deklewa, therefore, a showing that SACS voluntarily recognized the Union at the inception of the bargaining relationship is absolutely crucial to the General Counsel's case. Otherwise, the relationship was 8(f) rather than 9(a), the CBA expired on 31 May, and Respondent's subsequent repudiation (in effect) of the bargaining relationship was lawful—as were the unilateral changes, the refusal to furnish requested data, and the refusal to bargain.

"In light of the legislative history and the traditional prevailing practice in the construction industry, we will require the party asserting the existence of a 9(a) relationship to prove it." Deklewa at fn. 41. The General Counsel's theory of proof is voluntary recognition. Although the General Counsel asserts that theory, unfortunately the General Counsel fails to list, describe, or discuss the factors giving rise to that conclusion.

There was no card check in February 1982, or at any time. I agree with SACS that the bargaining relationship established here arose under Section 8(f)—not Section 9(a). Because the conversion doctrine, now abandoned by the Board,[5] is not available to the General Counsel, and because there was no voluntary recognition, as occurs outside the construction industry, discussion of a stable work force and the appropriate bargaining unit becomes academic. I will not undertake that irrelevant exercise. However, I will discuss the background events.

To sum up, I find that the bargaining relationship here was established under Section 8(f) of the Act, and that the General Counsel failed to prove that SACS ever voluntarily recognized the Union so as to create a 9(a) bargaining relationship. Consequently, I will grant Respondent's motion to dismiss the following complaint allegations (along with the appropriate conclusionary paragraphs):

> 1. Paragraphs 16 and 17, which allege the 1 June 1986 unilateral reduction of wages (of Stout and Stewart) and the simultaneous elimination of payments to the benefit trust funds.
> 2. Paragraph 18, which alleges Rice's 11 June 1986 telling of Stout and Stewart that SACS would no longer make the fringe benefit contributions called for by the CBA which expired 31 May.
> 3. Paragraphs 21, 22, and 23, which allege Respondent's refusal to furnish the Union with the data requested by the Union's letter of 1 July 1986.
> 4. Paragraph 24, which alleges that Respondent has failed and refused to bargain with the Union since 1 July 1986.

That leaves three issues to be decided. One is a refusal-to-bargain allegation, paragraph 15, describing a 26 May bypassing and direct dealing. As we will see, I dismiss all allegations except paragraph 15.

The second, paragraph 20, is an 8(a)(3) allegation that the 1 June unilateral changes were unlawfully motivated.

The final issue is the 25 June 1986 termination of Stout and Stewart.

Regarding Stout and Stewart, the complaint appears to allege both a constructive discharge and an actual discharge as alternative theories of events. Regarding the former, the complaint (par. 19) alleges that Respondent "caused the termination of" Stout and Stewart by the unilateral changes (par. 16) and by Rice telling (par. 18) Stout and Stewart on 11 June of the unilateral changes.

As for the actual discharge theory the complaint, in effect, alleges (par. 20, as amended) that Respondent was unlawfully motivated in terminating Stout and Stewart. The General Counsel, on brief, appears to rely exclusively on a constructive discharge theory (Br. at 15–16).[6] When Respondent argued (Motion at 3) that the General Counsel offered no evidence that Stout and Stewart were "discriminatorily discharged," the General Counsel replied (Response at 3–4) by (1) listing five factors reflecting improper motivation and (2) arguing that the Respondent failed to demonstrate that it would have taken the same action even in the absence of the protected conduct of Stout and Stewart.

Deklewa, of course, nullifies the basis for the constructive discharge theory. Because the unilateral changes were lawful, they could not have unlawfully caused a termination. The constructive discharge theory, then, is out. To the extent that paragraph 19 alleges a constructive discharge, I shall dismiss it. We are left with the motivation issue.

For its part, the Respondent argues that it fired Stout and Stewart on 25 June because they willfully failed to call in on Monday, 23 June, and because they engaged in a slowdown after being told on 11 June about the lawful unilateral changes (wage reduction; discontinuation of contributions of union benefit funds) (Br. at 28–29; motion at 3).

These remaining three issues require the usual summary of the facts plus discussion.

B. Background

1. Nature of Respondent's business

Ronald E. Rice is president and owner of SACS (2:385).[7] The former president, James Lee, hired Rice in August 1977 to assist with management of the Company and to oversee a large project SACS was starting in Temple, Texas (2:386). Including his 2-year study in electrical engineering in Virginia, Rice's training and work experience since 1961 have been in the electrical field. In 1972 Rice received a master electrician's license from the city of San Antonio, and he keeps that master's license current (2:387–388; 3:584–587). Since 1968, when he worked for Honeywell, Inc. in San Antonio, Rice's experience has included temperature control installation (2:386).

In 1981 Lee and Rice bought out a partner's interest in SACS, and Rice became vice president and half owner of Respondent (2:390). Rice became president of SACS in October 1982 (2:386).

Respondent's business is to install and service temperature control systems (devices that control temperature and humidity) in commercial buildings (2:391). Ordinarily Respondent submits a bid for such work to whoever is the designated mechanical contractor (2:391, 412, 414). This appears to be a consequence of the fact that in job specifications in the construction industry the paragraphs for automatic (temperature) control systems are set forth in section 15. That section, or division, is for the mechanical contractor, whereas section (or division) 16 is for the electrical contractor (1:178; 2:408–409, 414; 4:805). The reason that is so, as Business Manager Moczygemba testified, is that the mechanical contractor furnishes or designs the chillers and a lot of the equipment. It is easier for the architect or engineer to include that work in the mechanical section of the specifications (4:806). The mechanical contractors then subcontract the temperature control work either to firms such as SACS (2:414; 3:629–631, Rice) or to electrical subcontractors (4:806, Moczygemba). There is some dispute concerning which group gets more of the work, but it is not important that I resolve that matter.

[5] Deklewa at 1377–1378, 1385.

[6] The General Counsel cites constructive discharge cases such as Marquis Elevator Co., 217 NLRB 461 (1975).

[7] References to the 4-volume transcript of testimony are by volume and page.

The physical structure of the temperature control systems is described extensively in the testimony. Although the description bears on appropriate unit and majority status questions, it also has some relevance to the termination issue.

One of the major components of the system is the control valve. Water runs through the valve. The mechanical contractor sets the valve in place and attaches the plumbing to the valve. From that point SACS takes over and attaches either electric wire or pneumatic tubes to the control valve (2:393, 395, 3:591).

Pneumatic tubes, or lines, are of two types: copper and polyethylene. The latter is referred to as plastic or poly (2:393). The pneumatic lines are filled with pressurized air supplied by an air compressor. When the air pressure is varied other components are activated and the system performs its temperature control function (2.394, 397, 407, 432–433; 3:592).

Rice testified that several years ago pneumatic jobs consisted completely of copper tubing, and that a lot of skill was required to install such a system (2:397). Moczygemba agrees, and states that the pneumatic work was done principally by pipefitters (1:121). Indeed, among labor organizations, the Plumbers and Pipefitters Union[8] takes jurisdiction over such fitters, or technicians, and has a classification for them, Moczygemba testified, but the IBEW does not (1:26–27).

But copper tubing is being phased out as the industry shifts to the fire-rated polyethylene tubing (1:121; 2:397–398, 404). The poly tubing can be installed exposed (not necessarily in open view) or pulled through electric metallic tubing (EMT), metal conduit, if there is danger the poly could be damaged or cut if exposed (2:398–399). Today, Rice testified, 95 percent of Respondent's pneumatic work uses the poly tubing, with only 5 percent being copper. Copper is used only when the item is to be exposed. To avoid the risk of damage to the tubing in the situation, copper tubing is used (2:404).

For about the last 4 years, Rice testified, roughly 50 percent of Respondent's jobs have been a combination of pneumatic and electric, about 40 percent have been totally electric, and some 10 percent have been totally pneumatic (2:406, 3:590, 592).

[8] United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada, AFL–CIO. NLRB Style Manual (1983) at 58.

Regarding the electrical wiring jobs, the witnesses distinguish low voltage wiring from power wiring. The former carries the limited energy for the signal or control wiring and, as Rice testified, that is its function (2:439). The power wiring carries the higher current, or "line" voltage, of 120 volts and above. Although the witnesses all seem to rely on the National Electric Code (NEC) for a description of the classes of wiring and the authorized volts a class, they differ in their descriptions. The differences are not material for our purposes. The witnesses generally agree that Class 1, or A, is the higher voltage or power wiring of 120 volts and above, with Class 2, or B, being the low voltage. They agree that Class 2 is authorized for either 24 volts (2:999, Stewart), 30 volts or less (2:438, Rice), or 50 volts or less (1:173, 219, Stout). It is unclear what class they would assign a current of between 50 and 120 volts, or whether there is such a current.

Clearly the bulk of Respondent's electrical work involves low voltage wiring (class 2 or class B). There is a dispute concerning how much of Respondent's electrical work is power wiring. Rice puts the figure at no more than 2 to 3 percent (2:413; 3:682, 694). He testified that he designs his work so that it does not have to carry over 120 volts (2:401). Rice concedes there may be times when his employees hook up the power line to a control panel (2:413). He could recall only two such jobs in the last 18 months (2:435).

Joseph "Ronnie" Stout (one of the dischargees in this case) testified that at least half the jobs he has worked for Respondent involved some power wiring with some of the current being 480 volts and some of the jobs being 100 percent high voltage (1:173, 182–183). Charles Douglas Stewart (the other dischargee) did not estimate an overall percentage of work on jobs that involved "line" or power wiring other than to say it involved "a lot" of them (2:297). He testified that the work involved both classes of wiring and he listed several jobs where the "line" voltage ran as high as 480 (2:278–279, 282, 288, 296–299, 304–305).

I credit Stout and Stewart in the descriptions they gave. They did not specify a percentage of the total work, and their testimony does not necessarily conflict with Rice's figure of no more than 3 percent of the total electrical work being devoted to power wiring. However, Rice appeared to me to be limiting his estimate in order to enhance his prospects in this case. I make no finding regarding a percentage, but I find that it is something more than the 3 percent Rice estimates.

It would seem that the more relevant information is not how much of the total work is devoted to power wiring, but how critical is the power wiring, whatever the percentage, to the job. Indeed, the total work concept seems irrelevant since much of the work is the physical labor installing metal conduit and pulling wire or tubing through the conduit. Some of the jobs have several hundred feet of conduit, and frequently the conduit must be installed in crawl spaces or in other cramped quarters.

Since it is self-evident that power wiring is critical (otherwise there is no line current), the real question is whether a licensed electrician is required to connect or install whatever power wiring is to be used in the temperature control work. There is no dispute that the electrical contractor's job electricians install the bulk of the power wiring on the jobs. Rice testified that this includes connecting the line voltage wire to the air compressor (2:407–408).

The city of San Antonio, Rice testified, has never required him (or any such contractor) to secure an electrical permit covering any of his temperature control installation projects (2:418; 3:632). Rice appears to say that although the city's electrical inspector does not specifically inspect Respondent's (division 15) temperature control work (3:694),[9] if the electrical inspector observes EMT lines improperly installed (sagging, for example), the inspector can require that such work be corrected so that it conforms to the standards specified in division 16, the electrical section (2:418–419). Rice seems to attribute this to the admitted fact that under the NEC, class 2 (low voltage) wiring must be installed in a neat and workmanlike manner (2:419; 3:589).

By contrast, Harry F. Katz, chairman of the city of San Antonio's Electrical Board, testified that in his opinion installation of low voltage temperature control systems is work covered by San Antonio's electrical code and work for which a permit should be obtained (4:774–777, 785–787). Katz explains that although the Electrical Board does not perform the daily tasks of issuing permits and making inspections, it does set the city's policy. From a policy standpoint, Katz testified, temperature control wiring requires an electrical permit (issued to someone with a master electrician's license) and inspections by the city (4:793–795, 799–800, 803).

In addition to the job needing a permit issued to someone with a master electrician's license, Katz also testified that the actual work must be performed (if not by the master electrician) by a licensed journeyman electrician or by an apprentice working for such a journeyman (4:785). Rice testified that in his opinion a person need to be a licensed journeyman electrician to perform temperature control installations either regarding ability (2:415–416; 3:629) or the requirements of the city's electrical code (2:417–418).

Because the matters pertaining to coverage by the electrical codes are merely tangentially related to the material issues of this case, I need not resolve any of the disputed aspects. To the extent that credibility of the witnesses becomes relevant, I observed Katz to be a highly credible witness, and I would credit him over Rice on any disputed point.

2. Overview of Respondent's relationship with IBEW Local 60

As of early 1982 Respondent's work force consisted of five employees: Joseph Ronnie Stout, Charles Douglas Stewart, Martin H. Broekers III, and two brothers, John and James C. Heil. Both Stout and Stewart are licensed by the city of San Antonio as journeymen electricians, Stout since about 1972 (1:131–132) and Stewart since 1976 (2:234). Stout was hired by Respondent in either July 1977 (1:130) or possibly March 1979 (1:170). Stewart possibly was hired in March 1978 (2:232), but the more likely date appears to be May 1980 since he recalls that James C. Heil was hired about 3 months later (2:286). James Heil was hired in September 1980 (3:723).

Broekers' background experience was in electronics before James Lee hired him in May 1977. Lee trained Broekers on the pneumatics of the work (3:699–700). In 1980 Broekers registered as an apprentice electrician with the city of San Antonio, but he has not taken the test for the journeyman's license (3:707, 717).

Lee hired John Heil in about June 1980. His background experience is fitter work, including some pneumatics, plus some electrical work. At SACS he acquired the additional skills he needed to do Respondent's temperature-control installation work.

James C. Heil, John Heil's brother, was hired by Respondent in September 1980. His experience before coming to work at Respondent was as a pipefitter and welder plus some minor electrical work (3:723, 732–733).

Until 1982 Respondent operated nonunion. In early 1982 Respondent was a successful bidder on a job to a mechanical contractor who held a contractual bargaining relationship with Plumbers and Pipefitters Local 142. The mechanical contractor informed Respondent that SACS had to use a union pipefitter on the job in order to avoid conflict with the union plumbers and fitters the mechanical contractor was hiring to do the plumbing work (2:440, 452).

Rice and Lee could see a boom in the construction of commercial buildings in the San Antonio area. To participate more in that boom, Rice and Lee decided to obtain contracts with the pneumatic union (Plumbers and Pipefitters Local 142) and the electrical union (IBEW Local 60) so that the mechanical contractors would subcontract the temperature control work to SACS (2:441, 452).

Rice contacted IBEW Local 60 and Lee contacted Plumbers and Pipe Fitters Local 142 (2:441). From mid-January to early February 1982, Moczygemba discussed the matter with Rice at Respondent's ofice (2:447, 451; 3:637–638).[10]

At some early point in these developments Respondent alerted its five employees to its plans. The employees were advised they could choose to join a union if they so desired (2:441–442). Stout and Stewart elected to join IBEW Local 60. Each was given a test, passed it, and was classified by the Union as a journeyman inside wireman (1:137–138; 2:239).

After Stout and Stewart joined IBEW Local 60, Broekers testified an official of Plumbers and Pipe Fitters Local 142 invited Broekers and the two Heil brothers to join Local 142. They declined because, Broekers testified, there would have been no financial benefit to join.[11] As Broekers explained, he and the Heil brothers were (and are) paid an hourly base rate of $12 plus a profit-sharing bonus (paid annually) amounting to the difference between the (labor cost) figure Rice bids a job for and the actual (labor cost) figure on nonscale jobs. On Government jobs covered by the Davis-Bacon Act, all workers are paid the prevailing (union) scale rate. Thus, those jobs fall outside Respondent's incentive pay plan. Broekers testified that in an average year Respondent's incentive pay brings his earnings up to the equivalent of Government (union) scale (3:718–721).

[9] A fact Rice attributes to possible oversight by San Antonio and other cities in addressing coverage of temperature control work in their local codes (2:418; 3:694).

[10] Moczygemba testified that he discussed the matter with both Rice and Lee when he visited Respondent's office (1:24–28). This is a minor point and I find no conflict in any event. Although Moczygemba does not describe a second or third visit, I find, he discussed the matter with both Rice and Lee. On his next visit or two it is unclear whether Lee was present.

Rice and Moczygemba describe their conversations a bit differently as it bears on the work force. According to Rice, he simply told Moczygemba that SACS did temperature control installation, that it was not an electrical contractor, and that only Stout and Stewart of his work force wanted to join Local 60. The names of the other three were not mentioned, and their work was not described (2:441–446, 449, 451; 3:638–639).

Moczygemba, whom I credit, testified that his discussion with Rice and Lee centered on the contract and the employees to be covered. Stout and Stewart were named as the only electricians employed by SACS. Moczygemba understood from the conversation that there were two or three other employees, but Rice and Lee assured him that those others were not electricians, that they were fitters and pneumatic employees who did not do electrical work. Rice and Lee informed Moczygemba that SACS had a bargaining relationship with Plumbers and Pipe Fitters Local 142. Moczygemba was aware the Pipe Fitters Union has a classification for pneumatic technicians, whereas the IBEW does not. He was further aware that both unions represent their respective classifications of employees with two other companies, Honeywell and Johnson Control Systems, engaged in temperature control installation work in the San Antonio area (1:25–28, 122).

As a result of their conferences, Moczygemba and Rice signed a "Letter of Assent--B" with an effective date of 22 February 1982 (G.C. Exh. 2). The form reflects that Moczygemba signed on 5 February and Rice on 19 February 1982. Rice confirms that they signed on separate dates (3:637). Under the Letter of Assent--B SACS agreed to comply with the terms and conditions of employment contained in the inside labor agreement (and any amendments) between NECA and IBEW Local 60 until the termination date of 30 June 1982. A provision states that if SACS does not intend to renew the agreement, it "shall so notify the Labor Union in writing at least sixty (60) days prior to the termination date."

In contrast to Respondent's written agreement with the Union, its contractual arrangement with Plumbers and Pipe Fitters Local 142 was nebulous in nature. Neither James Lee, who contacted Local 142, nor any official of Local 142 testified. There is no dispute that as a result of the contract between Respondent and Local 142, a pipefitter, Darrel Mullins, began working with, or for, SACS. The record does not reflect a precise date for either the arrangement with Local 142 or Mullins' first day on the job. The evidence is that Mullins began work shortly after Rice signed the Letter of Assent--B with IBEW Local 60.

On his first day of testimony Rice asserted that Mullins has always (since February 1982) worked as a subcontractor for Respondent and that, apparently, Respondent has never had a contract with Local 142 (2:463–464). The following day Rice testified that Respondent, through James Lee, did enter into a collective-bargaining relationship with Local 142 (3:618), asserted that he did not know whether SACS had a signed document at Respondent's office, stated that the relationship with Local 142 may be based on a handshake, and concluded by testifying he at least believes there was some kind of contractual arrangement between Respondent and Local 142 from February 1982 to 1985 (3:631–622).

At some point in 1985, Rice testified, Rice met with officials of Local 142 and explained that Respondent did not have enough (union) work to keep Mullins busy. The parties orally agreed to terminate whatever arrangement they had. At the same time they decided (apparently so that Respondent could use Mullins at least some of the time) Mullins should form his own company so he could contract with others (3:619–620). From that date in 1985 to the present, Respondent has used Mullins strictly on an independent contractor basis (he works primarily for Respondent), and it pays him a rate higher than the prevailing scale in order to compensate him for some of his overhead expenses (2:463–464; 3:620–621, 627–628, 693).

When Respondent, in February 1982, made its contractual arrangement with Local 142, and signed with IBEW Local 60 to be bound by the NECA contract, Rice admittedly split his work force of five employees (plus Mullins) into two crews, one union and the other nonunion, and told them they would work on separate projects (2:447–448). At times previously they had worked together on some jobs. Except for finishing work they currently were on, Respondent's work force after February 1982 worked as a union crew and a nonunion crew (2:453–454).

The union crew consisted of electricians Stout and Stewart and fitter Mullins. Broekers, John Heil, and Jim Heil formed the nonunion crew (2:448). On the union crew, Rice testified, Stout and Stewart did the electrical work, the "control wiring," and Mullins the pneumatic or fitter work. The nonunion crew did both the pneumatics and electrical work on their jobs (2:450–451, Rice). Broekers testified that after February 1982 he did strictly pneumatics (3:716). James C. Heil testified that he did both pneumatics and control wiring after February 1982 (3:727–728, 731).

At different times, and for brief periods, from 1 June to the end of October 1982, the Union (IBEW Local 60) referred a total of four electricians to assist on Respondent's union crew. There is no evidence of referrals after October 1982.

The union and nonunion crews enjoyed different pay systems. Stout and Stewart were paid the rate called for in the prevailing NECA contract and Respondent made the mandated contributions to the contractual trust funds. The basis of payment to Mullins between 1982 and 1985 is unclear, but presumably it was the scale for Local 142. Respondent paid in to trust funds on behalf of Mullins until the 1985 conversion of his status (3:626). From 1985 forward Respondent paid Mullins a rate higher than union scale, and Respondent paid Mullins the equivalent of the contributions it had been making on his behalf to union trust funds (3:626–627).

By contrast, the nonunion crew was paid $12 an hour plus an incentive bonus equal to the difference between the sum Rice had bid regarding labor cost and the amount of actual labor cost (3:500, 505, 719). Broekers testified that Respondent's incentive bonuses bring the annual pay of the nonunion crew up to about the level of the Davis-Bacon scale (3:720–721). This incentive pay system applies to nonscale jobs; for on Government jobs covered by the Davis-Bacon Act, the prevailing scale rate is paid to the nonunion crew (2:461–463; 3:505) as well as to the union crew (3:575, 678, 680).

In early 1982 Rice and Lee thought they saw a boom in construction of commercial buildings. What they really saw, as all are now painfully aware, was the last spurt before the boom went bust. The only year in which Respondent obtained jobs from unionized mechanical contractors was 1982.

Toward the close of 1982 Respondent began running out of jobs that required a union pipefitter. This resulted, at least in part, not only from the general downturn in the economy leaving less work for the union contractors, but from an influx of nonunion mechanical contractors from Houston and Dallas grabbing some of the available work (3:600–602).

To keep Stout and Stewart working after 1982, Respondent occasionally had to assign them to some of its nonunion jobs, yet SACS continued to pay them to the contractual scale (2:452). Even on these occasional nonunion jobs, however, Respondent admittedly kept its two crews separate. Although there were jobs on which at some point each crew worked, after February 1982 Respondent's union and nonunion crews never worked on the same job at the same time (2:453–454, 456).

For some reason Respondent failed in 1983 to notify the Union that it wanted to cancel (did not wish to renew) the Letter of Assent--B. Nor did it do so in 1984 or 1985. Thus, each year the agreement was automatically renewed and SACS was covered by the NECA contracts over that period (1:94;2:468). The last NECA contract to which Respondent became bound had an effective term of 1 June 1985 to 31 July 1986 (G.C. Exh. 3).

Notwithstanding Respondent's failure to give the appropriate notice that would have canceled any further renewals of the NECA contract, at an early point Rice began seeking relief from the Union from the financial burden created by his having to bid against nonunion competitors based on his own union scale labor costs. By letter dated 23 August 1983 to Moczygemba, Rice requested a $12-an-hour rate for "my journeyman and electricians" when they work on (1) small service jobs, (2) any job not covered by the Davis-Bacon Act, and (3) jobs in which the electrical installation contract is for less than $20,000 (R. Exh. 2). Moczygemba admittedly received the letter (1:92), but he never answered it (2:469). The $12 rate, it will be recalled, was the base rate SACS was paying its nonunion crew (3:505, Rice; 3:719, Broekers). The $12 figure, standing alone, is misleading as to Respondent's nonunion employees. As Broekers explained, the nonunion crew enjoys an incentive bonus plan which, on average, brings their annualized wages up to a level equivalent to the Davis-Bacon scale (3:719–721). The Davis-Bacon scale is the prevailing scale or, in effect, the union scale.

Over a year and a half passed before Rice, by letter dated 5 April 1985, again wrote IBEW Local 60 requesting relief (R. Exh. 3). Again Rice received no reply (2:469). Apparently deciding that he had had enough, Rice sent Moczygemba the following letter of 15 November 1985 (G.C. Exh. 7; 1:35):

> Dear Bob:
> I wish to, with regrets, terminate the agreement between San Antonio Control Systems, Inc. and IBEW Local Union #60 as soon as possible, pursuant to Article I sections 1.02 and 1.03.
>
> Two requests for targeted wage rates were submitted in writing, on August 23, 1983 and April 5, 1985, both were denied. Many of our installations are unique pertaining to the electrical requirements. I must be more cost effective in our current marketplace, to first keep my company profitable, and secondly to open up as much work as possible for my employees.
> I want to express my respect for Local Union #60 and their continued success in the future.
>
> Sincerely,
> /s/ Ronald E. Rice
> Ronald E. Rice
> President

Although Respondent received no written reply from the Union (468–469), Moczygemba possibly telephoned Rice (1:35). Rice concedes his awareness that around this time the Union offered a market recovery rate (MRA) of $14.25 an hour to its signatory contractors who agreed to sign a 2-year NECA CBA. The MRA is also referred to as the target rate (3:640). The wage rate for journeymen under the March 1985 to May 1986 CBA was scheduled to increase on 2 December 1985 from $15.62 to $15.75 (G.C. Exh. 3 at 10).

Rice elected not to accept the MRA deal because, he felt, it still would not make him competitive with the nonunion contractors (2:467–568; 3:506, 639–640). For some time, Rice testified, Respondent had been losing money on the jobs on which SACS employed its union crew (2:470–471; 3:493, 514).

As the May termination date of the NECA CBA approached, Rice wrote Moczygemba a reminder letter, dated 3 April 1986, as follows (G.C. Exh. 8; 1:35):"As I stated in my letter dated November 15, 1986, I wish to terminate my letter of assent. I understood we are bound to the current agreement until May 31, 1986."

Responding by letter dated 17 April, Moczygemba requested a meeting to negotiate a renewal agreement and asked Rice to contact him concerning a date compatible with their schedules (G.C. Exh. 9; 1:36). Rice apparently never applied, and Moczygemba wrote again on 8 May reminding Rice that the CBA would expire 31 May and suggesting a meeting date of 19 May at 10 a.m. at Moczygemba's office (G.C. Exh. 10; 1:36). The parties did meet on that date.

C. The Bargaining Sessions of May–July 1986

1. Introduction

In order to understand the background events as they bear on the two allegations of unlawful motivation, I will summarize the bargaining sessions. Of course, Respondent's pre-Deklewa position that the parties reached an impasse on 5 June is no longer an ultimate issue to be decided.

The parties met four times during May–July 1986: 19 and 29 May, 5 June, and 1 July. The first three meetings, the parties agree, were bargaining sessions. Because Respondent contends (and the General Counsel disputes) that an impasse was reached at the third session, 5 June, it objected at one point to the General Counsel's reference to it as a bargaining session (1:126), and Respondent describes the 1 July meeting as "an attempt to resolve the parties' impasse." (Br. at 26–27.) Whether Respondent makes a valid distinction is questionable. For convenience purposes, I shall refer to all four as bargaining sessions. The first, second, and fourth sessions were short, with the meeting of 5 June being relatively long, lasting at least 2 hours.

2. The session of 19 May 1986

On 19 May the parties met at the Union's office for about an hour. Present were Moczygemba, his assistant Thomas Huckelba, and Rice.

They first talked about ground rules and some minor matters. One of these was the fact that Respondent had been underpaying Stout and Stewart by 13 cents an hour, plus failing to make full payments to these benefit funds (2:473). As Rice credibly explained, the shortage arose from Respondent's failure to increase payments based on the higher wage schedule (from $15.62 to $15.75; G.C. Exh. 3 at 10) that went into effect 2 December 1985. Rice said that if the Union would advise him of the exact amount due he would pay it. The Union did so the following day, by letter of 20 May (R. Exh. 18), and Rice paid the balance due.

Rice testified that the shortage flowed from his idea that his 15 November 1985 letter (giving notice that Respondent would not renew the CBA in May 1986) froze the pay and benefit rates at the current levels. Later in the spring, Huckelba advised him that was incorrect. "I didn't think it was fair" to have to pay the difference, explained Rice (since the other contractors, who had signed the 2-year MRA agreement, were paying only $14.25), "but I wanted to get out from under this contract in the correct manner" so he said, "I will pay it." (2:465–467; 3:518–519.) Moczygemba testified that Rice said he did not want to be a union contractor because he was not competitive, not making enough money, and did not see how he could survive as a union contractor (1:37–38, 95). In Rice's words, "I explained the reasons why I expressed a desire to get out from under the union contract." (2:472.)

Moczygemba handed Rice a complete written proposal for a new CBA (G.C. Exh. 11). Rice said he would take it back to his office and review it. Moczygemba asked Rice to come back with a response. They agreed to meet again on 29 May.

Before passing to the second bargaining session I will briefly mention a chronological development occurring on 20 May, the day after the first bargaining session. On 20 May Rice issued a memorandum in which he summarized the terms and conditions of employment for his nonunion employees (2:474–477). As this memo of 20 May figures in the allegation of direct dealing (complaint par. 15), I will defer further discussion until I reach that topic.

3. The session of 29 May 1986

The same representatives met again, also for about an hour, at the Union's office on 29 May. Again Rice said he could not make it as a union contractor because his union employees were not competitive and Respondent was not making enough money (1:141).

Before the meeting Rice read the Union's contract proposal, and in response he prepared a letter, dated 29 May, which he submitted at the meeting to Moczygemba (2:480–481). In the letter Rice lists several cost increases, a restriction on his ability to offer profit sharing to his employees, a restriction on his ability to own or operate another company (without the terms of the CBA attaching), and concludes with the following (R. Exh. 4): "Considering the increases, restrictions, and labor outlook for the San Antonio area I cannot sign the 1986 agreement."

Rice asked for a reduction in wages, and Moczygemba proposed the MRA rate of $14.25. They could not agree (2:481–482; 3:488). The next meeting was set for 5 June at 10 a.m. in Respondent's office.

4. The session of 5 June 1986

The same three representatives met in Rice's office on 5 June for about 2 hours and went through the Union's contract proposal item by item (1:42, 46–47, 62, 100; 2:482–483; 3:487). Making significant progress, the parties reached agreement on many provisions of a new CBA, but they ended the meeting with minor differences on a few items and substantially apart on two major issues.

Clearly the parties were in serious disagreement regarding two major issues: wage rates and contract duration. Respondent argues that the parties reached impasse on 5 June regarding these two issues (Br. at 25). I agree that if an impasse was reached, it was regarding one or both of these issues.

Respondent additionally contends that the parties seriously disagreed regarding two other issues, arbitration and subcontracting (Br. at 10). That tends to overstate the matter somewhat, for the parties had done little more than exchange their positions regarding those two issues, and the 5 June meeting ended with the understanding that the Union (on these two plus some other issues) was to submit (at the next meeting) revised language in an attempt to meet Rice's objections. I need not summarize the evidence regarding the arbitration and subcontracting provisions.

As I have described, since August 1983 Rice had been requesting an hourly wage rate of $12. Rice brought with him to this third meeting a letter, dated 5 June (G.C. Exh. 12), which he gave to Moczygemba (1:47). In the letter Rice expressed his concerns about three topics, including wages. On wages he wrote that he wanted a wage rate of $12 plus $2.24 for Respondent's contributions to the benefit funds (3:582). He ended his letter by stating:

> My main concern is greeting the jobs my union employees are installing to show a profit. To date they are not. Two things need to be done, get more production from my employees and get their wage rate down to a more competitive level.

Moczygemba reminded Rice that at the last meeting he had offered Respondent the MRA, and he offered it again. He reviewed for Rice the details of the MRA. These included a wage rate of $14.25, plus benefit contributions, with an extension of the CBA to May 1988. Rice persisted at his $12 an hour (1:50, 101–102, 124; 3:681). Moczygemba estimated the benefit contributions under the MRA at no more than $1.80, or a total outlay by an employer of $16.05 (1:124–125). The total cash expense under Respondent's offer, $12 plus $2.24, would be $14.24.

Rice said he was paying his nonunion employees $12 an hour,[12] and that it was important he obtain that rate on any CBA because work was scarce and he had to be as competitive as possible (1:127–128; 3:506).[13] Rice "indicated" that the MRA was not acceptable. Even so, in Moczygemba's opinion, they were not at loggerheads over the wage rate because Rice simply objected to the term (1:102–103).

When the parties reached article X, section 5(a), "wages for all classifications shall be presented at a later date," the Union submitting no written wage proposal. Rice testified that it was "just understood" the rate was the target wage of $14.25 an hour (3:504). Moczygemba testified, without contradiction, that the parties agreed to defer on that item until they made more progress on agreements regarding other topics (1:107).

The duration clause (art. I, sec. 1) provided for a 1-year term beginning 1 June 1986. Rice said he was not interested in either a 1-year or 2-year CBA, but might consider one with a term of 6 months. Because of the hardships the current CBA was imposing on him, Rice said he did not think he could survive under the present CBA (3:488).[14] He said it was important that he hold any new CBA to a term of 6 months. Moczygemba said he wanted a term of 1 year. They moved to the next topic (1:51, 103; 3:486–487).

Although it is not entirely clear, the integrated positions seem to have been as follows. Respondent: $12 an hour with a 1-year CBA or $14.25 for a CBA of 6 months. Union: $14.25 an hour if the CBA was for 2 years, and on a 1-year CBA a wage rate not yet proposed by the Union. Respondent suggests that the Union's proposed wage rate for a 1-year CBA was $15.75 (Br. at 25). That is not so. As Moczygemba testified, the Union deferred presenting its wage rate proposal sending progress on other issues (1:107). The $15.75 rate was the current rate of the CBA, which expired at the end of May 1986 (G.C. Exh. 3 at 10).

The 5 June meeting ended with the parties agreeing to meet again on either 16 or 17 June. However, that date was postponed when Rice could not make it, and a second date was postponed for similar reasons (1:63; 3:508–509). They finally met for the fourth and last time on 1 July.

To keep events in chronological perspective, I shall mention here Respondent's admission that effective with the pay period beginning Sunday, 1 June 1986, it (unilaterally) reduced the hourly pay of Stout and Stewart to $14.25 and discontinued all payments to union benefit funds on nonscale jobs (jobs not covered by the Davis-Bacon Act). On scale jobs it paid direct to them the scale base rate of $15.75, plus benefits of $1.47, for a total of $17.22 (1:9; 3:574–575, 677–680). He did so without consulting an attorney (3:681).

Rice testified that he made the wage-reduction decision on Wednesday, 11 June (3:511). That is Respondent's payday. On their paychecks they received that 11 June, Stout (1:157–159) and Stewart (2:263–265) observed that their checks were for lesser amounts. Stewart called Rice who said that the new nonscale rate was $14.25 and that they were to pay for their own benefits out of that sum (1:159; 2:265, 326; 3:574, 677). Stout (1:159) and Stewart (2:265) promptly reported the matter to Moczygemba.

Rice did not apply his decision prospectively. He made it retroactive to the pay period beginning 1 June as reflected in the amendment to Respondent's answer at the opening of the hearing (1:9). Rice's subsequent testimony on the effective date is a bit ambiguous. At one point he suggests it was effective on 6 or 7 June (2:480). Later he put the effective date as the pay period ending 7 June (3:679). The latter would be the same pay period that began 1 June. The paychecks themselves covered the period beginning 1 June and were for the reduced [12] It is not entirely clear in the record that Rice referred to his nonunion employees at the bargaining session as distinguished from his testifying at the hearing what he was thinking at the bargaining session. It seems clear, however, that he at least mentioned the $12 rate, and a reading of his testimony suggests that he referred to that as the rate he was paying his nonunion employees.

[13] The $12 is a bit misleading. As we know, Respondent's nonunion employees are eligible for incentive bonuses, which bring their average pay to the equivalent of union scale. Rice advised the Union, however, of the incentive plan when they subsequently reached a provision of the proposed CBA restricting profit sharing (art. II, sec. 16). Rice explained that he had a profit-sharing program with his other employees that worked well. Moczygemba withdrew that provision (1:57–58, 105; 3:499–500).

[14] Frequently, as here, Rice's testimony lapsed into a description of the reason he expressed a position. On the surface it is unclear whether he stated that reason to Moczygemba. At various points (such as 3:494 and 3:506), however, when asked if he so told the Union, Rice answered yes. I find that the reasons he testimonially described were also the reasons he stated to the Union at the bargaining sessions.

amount. In any event, Respondent's amended answer remains unchanged and controls its positions.

Rice testified that, without consulting an attorney, he reduced the wages of Stout and Stewart because (3:680–681):

> I considered that an unfair contract to me; I figured I had bargained in good faith, as long and as hard as I could on June 5. So I thought this was a fair settlement, and a fair way to operate, because I didn't want to live under that unfair contract, as, and me being the only one in town having to live under that unfair contract.

Apparently it was not until he learned of the termination of Stout and Stewart on 25 June that Moczygemba drafted a letter on 26 June to Rice regarding the unilateral changes. Assistant Business Manager Thomas Huckelba and International Representative Henry Villareal hand-carried the letter to Rice that day (1:78–79, 109–110; 3:511–512). In his letter of 26 June to Rice, Moczygemba observes that, notwithstanding its desire to terminate the CBA, Respondent still has an obligation to comply with the terms of the "current agreement" until such time as the parties may bargain to impasse. He warns Rice that current wages, benefits, hours, and working conditions "may not be unilaterally altered by you." Moczygemba concludes his letter by asking Rice, "Please advise as to your intent in this regard." (G.C. Exh. 18.) The record does not show whether Rice replied.

5. The session of 1 July 1986

Moczygemba, Huckelba, and Rice met for the fourth time on 1 July in Rice's office (1:63–64; 110). The meeting lasted 45 minutes to an hour (3:514). The highlights relevant for our needs are as follows.

One of the first topics raised was the termination of Stout and Stewart. Moczygemba asked whether Rice would consider taking them back. "Never," replied Rice. Moczygemba asked Rice about the cutting of wages and cessation of payments to the benefit funds. Rice admitted such, saying he was not about to pay any more fringes because he was no longer bound to the (expired) CBA. Moczygemba said he did not think Rice could do that (1:65, 112).

Because of Rice's references at the 5 June meeting to his union employees, Moczygemba formed the impression that Rice perhaps was operating a double-breasted operation (1:66, 114). Moczygemba therefore prepared a letter requesting data (a listing of 12 items) that would disclose this and also verify whether Rice's claims of "poverty" were true. He presented the letter to Rice at the 1 July meeting (1:66–67, 114; 3:513–514). Because the request for data is no longer relevant, I will omit any summary or reproduction of it.

As the parties reviewed Moczygemba's letter the subject of economics arose. Rice said his nonunion employees were doing the work cheaper than Stout and Stewart could do it (1:66, 72–73, 113). Rice said that the jobs Stout and Stewart did were not profitable, and that his books were open to Moczygemba right then. Moczygemba said he did not have time to examine the books at that visit (3:514). Moczygemba testified that at the 5 June meeting Rice said he had the data on job costs and the Union was welcome to look at it to see how "productive" his union employees were but that Rice did not offer to make the books available on 5 June (1:128).

D. The Direct Dealing Allegation

1. The 20 May 1986 memorandum

Rice testified that on 20 May, the day after the initial bargaining session, he prepared a three-page memorandum (G.C. Exh. 17) setting forth company policies applicable to his nonunion employees. Hesitating at first to give copies of the memo to Stout and Stewart, he decided to do so on the thought they might withdraw from the Union at some future date and, therefore, it would be fair to them to know what policies apply to nonunion employees. Beginning that day he distributed copies of his 20 May memo to all employees. Rice concedes that the policies in the memo differ in many respects from the terms of the CBA (2:474–475).

Stout testified that Rice handed him a copy of the 20 May memo. Uncertain of the date Rice gave him the memo, Stout was under the impression it was on Monday (19 May) when he turned in his timesheet. He concedes, however, that on occasion he turned in timesheets on Tuesdays, and that in fact he does not recall which day it was (1:155–156, 186). Although an early Monday time would not necessarily conflict with the 10 a.m. bargaining session Rice attended at the Union's office on 19 May, I find it more likely that Stout received the memo from Rice on 21 May as Rice testified (2:475).

According to Stout, Rice said the memo reflected company policy and the way things were going to be done in the future. He suggested that Rice read the memo, think about it, and see if he could live with the policies, which would be effective "immediately in the future." He asked Stout to take Stewart's copy to him at the jobsite. Stout said he would think about the new policies. He delivered Stewart's copy (1:154–156, 186–187).

Not specifically denying Stout's testimony, Rice testified that he and Stout did not sit down and go over the memorandum, which he handed to Stout on 21 May, and that Stout asked no questions regarding it (2:475–476). In noting that Rice's version is not inconsistent with Stout's, I credit Stout.

Stewart testified that he received two copies of the memo on either Monday or Wednesday of that week. The first copy was one he found in his box at the office, and the other copy was given to him on the job by Stout. Stewart assumes he picked up the first copy on Wednesday, 21 May. Rice was not there at the time. After talking with Stout about it on the job, Stewart telephoned and spoke to Rice (2:260, 319–320).

Rice agrees that Stewart did telephone him about the memo on Wednesday, 21 May. According to Rice, he explained to Stewart his thought that it would be a good idea to put company policies in writing, and that it would be fair to him and Stout to let them know what the policies would be should they elect to withdraw from the Union at some future date (2:476).

Stewart, whom I credit, testified that when he asked Rice about the memo in the telephone conversation, Rice said it was the new policy of the Company. Stewart asked Rice to confirm that the policy did not apply to Stout and Stewart because they were in the Union. Rice said it did not apply to them until the contract expired, that he would bargain with the Union in good faith, that he wanted to keep everything on the "up and up," and that Stewart and Stout would continue to receive all contractual wages and benefits "until we reach impasse or until I resign."[15] Stewart asked what an impasse was, and Rice explained that it meant "until we agree or can't agree on the contract." (2:261, 320, 323, 326).

As Rice's version is not inconsistent with Stewart's I accept it as a supplement to the other remarks I find that he made. Moreover, Rice's reference to a possible future withdrawal from union membership by Stewart and Stout aids in interpreting the ambiguous "until I resign" testimony of Stewart.

I find no contradiction between the accounts of Stout and Stewart. Rice's comments to Stout appear to have been rather brief. His telephone conversation with Stewart was longer and he described his intentions more specifically. Although Stout at one point recalled Rice as saying the new policy would be effective "immediately in the future," the balance of his testimony is in line with Stewart's that Rice said the policies would apply in the future regarding the union employees.

The differences between the policies in Rice's memorandum of 20 May and those contained in the CBA are several, and they are significant, as Moczygemba described at the hearing (1:123–124). For example, item 3 of the first page asserts that work on nonscale jobs (work not covered by the Davis-Bacon Act) will be paid "as determined by management." Vacation would be 1 week rather than the 2 weeks union members take. Under the CBA the employer pays full costs of the medical insurance, but under the 20 May policies, SACS pays only half. And additional family members would be covered at the employee's cost, whereas under the CBA, Moczygemba testified, without contradiction, all family members are covered at no additional cost.

There is no dispute that before 1 June Respondent applied none of the new policies to its union employees, Stout and Stewart. Rice concedes that in early June he did apply the new pay-rate policy to them (2:479–480). We also know that with the paychecks distributed 11 June, for the pay period effective 1 June, Respondent also ceased making contributions to the benefit funds.

Did Rice's conduct constitute the direct dealing and bypassing of the Union alleged in complaint paragraph 15? Arguing that the answer is an affirmative, the General Counsel points to the testimony of Stout and Stewart that in the fall of 1985 Rice told each of them that he wanted to get out of the Union (Br. at 10). To Stewart, in a casual conversation, Rice said that unions are becoming a thing of the past, that they cost too much money, and that business was too competitive. He told Stewart to think about it, and Stewart said he would. Rice mentioned this on one or two subsequent occasions, but Stewart ignored the subject (2:258–259).

Rice's comments to Stout were a bit more pointed. In addition to telling Stout he was going to get out of the Union, Rice also said that Stout and Stewart were being paid too much and that everyone was going to earn the same pay rate. Rice said he was writing a letter to the Union expressing his desire to get out once the CBA expired. Stout testified that Rice repeated his comments (other than the letter writing) on other occasions into 1986 and up to June 1986 (1:144–145, 148).

Rice did not testify concerning these assertions, no complaint allegation specifically addressed them,[16] and Respondent does not discuss this evidence in its brief. I credit Stout and Stewart. In so crediting them, I consider the evidence as to Rice's comments about wanting to leave the Union relevant (regarding the allegation of par. 15) only as they bear on credibility, for the direct dealing allegation does not turn on Respondent's motivation if Rice in fact bypassed the Union.

2. Conclusion

The evidence shows that Respondent did bypass the Union and deal directly with Stout and Stewart on this subject, including telling Stout to "think about" Respondent's new policies. Even though Respondent's new policies were not to be effective (regarding Stout and Stewart) until after an impasse or unless Stout and Stewart withdrew from union membership, the conduct and remarks of Rice violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act as alleged. This is so because even after an impasse an employer cannot implement policies not reasonably comprehended within its preimpasse proposals. Taft Broadcasting Co., 163 NLRB 475, 478 (1967). As of 21 May Respondent had not presented its 20 May memorandum to the Union, and the only item contained there that Respondent had discussed with the Union was the reduction of wages. Thus, Respondent bypassed the Union.

As for the resignation from union membership, even if it occurred, it would not necessarily mean that Stout or Stewart was no longer a member of the bargaining unit—even if Respondent assigned him to the nonunion crew. By commenting on this topic to Stout and Stewart on 21 May Respondent bypassed the Union and dealt directly with employees represented exclusively by the Union.

For the reasons I have stated, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act as alleged in complaint paragraph 15.

[15] The "until I resign" is ambiguous. Rice could have used the "I" as a way of saying until he ceased dealing with the Union after the CBA expired. Another possibility is that Rice said "until you resign" but the witness, converting the reference to himself to the first person pronoun, inserted the word "I" in midsentence. The matter was not clarified, and the parties do not address it in their briefs. I find the second possibility to be the more likely explanation.

[16] Of course, anything in 1985 would be outside the 6-month limitations period set forth in Sec. 10(b) of the Act.

E. The Unlawful Motive Allegations

1. Introduction

As previously discussed, there are two unlawful motive allegations. one is the unilateral reduction in wage rates and elimination of payments to the union trust funds (complaint pars. 16, 20). The second is the termination of Stout and Stewart (complaint pars. 19, 20). To some extent these allegations may be treated together.

Earlier I summarized the evidence showing Rice's desire and efforts to persuade the Union to accept a $12 wage rate, and also his comments to Stout and Stewart that he wanted to go nonunion. Rice had developed something of an antiunion attitude. Even so, it was based on economic costs and restrictions, and not on any personal dislike of the union representatives. More to the point, it did not translate into any dislike of Stout and Stewart. Thus, even as Stout described Rice's comments in the spring of 1986 about a desire to get out of the Union and pay everyone the same rate, Stout conceded that Rice assured Stout that he had a home there as long as he wanted it (1:145).

On some of the occasions of Rice's comments about getting out of the Union, according to Stout, Rice spoke crudely, saying "Fuck the godamn union." (1:215, 221.) One such occasion was in May 1985 when Stout came to pick up his paycheck at lunchtime rather than after work for the day. When Rice asked why Stout came at lunch Stout explained that, under the CBA, SACS was to deliver the paychecks by quitting time, that if Rice wanted to deliver his paycheck Stout would not come to get it, and that Stout was doing this as a service to Rice since Stout did not eat lunch. In the presence of office secretary Barbara Will, Rice said, "Fuck the motherfucking union; pardon my French." (1:221–222.) Will recalls no such remark (2:376) and Rice did not address the matter during his own testimony.

Even if Stout is credited, Rice's angry and crude expression was directed more toward the Union than toward Stout. That seems to be a distinction with a difference, for as mentioned above, as late as the spring of 1986 Rice told Stout he had a home at SACS as long as he wanted one.

2. Material facts

The immediate occasion of the termination of Stout and Stewart centers on their failure to call the office on Monday, 23 June. One of the jobs they had been working on for several days was the U.S. Post Office in downtown San Antonio. The job involved replacing two large water chillers for the building's air conditioning (1:217–218; 2:316; 3:547). Stout testified that for the previous week he and Stewart worked 36 hours each at the post office disconnecting (demoing) some pneumatic lines, tracing the wiring, pulling, tugging, researching, and "just digging into everything that needed digging into." (1:150, 196–198, 217, 220, 223–228.) Stewart gave similar testimony (2:315–319).

On Friday, 20 June, Rice was in Fairfax, Virginia (3:544, 643, 647).[17] Office secretary Barbara Will telephoned Rice either around 11:30 a.m. or that afternoon to report that Edward Talley, project manager for Cold Temp Air Conditioning Co., the mechanical contractor on the post office job, had called to say he did not see Stout and Stewart on the job and Cold Temp wanted the two chillers on line (installed and operating) by the first part of the following week. Will told Rice she had tried to reach the two men but was unsuccessful. Rice told her that if they called in, to tell them it was critical that they be on the job Monday morning (3:543–544, 551, 646–648).

Rice then telephoned the post office and reached the building engineer who informed him that he thought he had seen Respondent's employees (Stout and Stewart) there earlier, but they were not there then. Rice called Will back and repeated his direction to her that she tell Stout and Stewart to be at the post office job on Monday (23 June) because the job was very critical. He told Will that he would arrive in San Antonio about 11:30 a.m. on Monday (3:544–546). This possibly was all in Rice's first conversation with Barbara Will, for on cross-examination he testified that he does not remember calling her back (3:648).

Rice made no effort himself to contact Stout and Stewart that weekend. He did not have Stout's number, and he did not think of leaving a message for Stewart's pager (3:648–649).

About 7 a.m. on Monday morning, 23 June, Stout arrived at the Taco Cabana, a "centrally" located cafe where Stout and Stewart would meet, park one vehicle, and ride together to the jobsites.[18] Stewar did not appear. A few minutes after 8 a.m. Stout telephoned the office but, he testified, the number was busy. About 9 a.m. he left for home without again telephoning the office. He did not go to the office that day. He did not call from his home because that would have incurred a long distance charge (1:160–161, 185, 230).

When giving his address at the hearing, Stout gave a San Antonio address (1:130). Stewart testified that Stout lives close to Leon Springs on the opposite side of San Antonio from him (2:329–330). Leon Springs, as a map reflects, is a community a few miles north of San Antonio on Interstate Highway 10.

Stout testified to a mixture of reasons why he made no further attempts to call the office or, apparently, to go there. First, he had tried once unsuccessfully. Second, it was a long distance call from his home. Third, there were occasions when they (he and Stewart) would go straight to a job on Mondays and they would not call the office all day. Fourth, Rice had instructed him simply to make sure their timesheets reflected whether they were working. Fifth, Stout apparently concedes that he was not eager to call because he was unhappy with Rice. He was unhappy with Rice because of his sarcastic remarks about both the Union and Stout (1:185).

[17] Rice had told Stewart he would be out of town (2:326–327).

[18] Stout testified that the "centrally" located Taco Cabana is located at Wurzbach and Bandera Highway (1:160). As a map reflects, that intersection is on the northwest side of San Antonio near loop 410.

Stout concedes that he was unhappy over his pay cut (1:215). Indeed, in his pretrial affidavit of 10 July Stout states (1:203–204):

> Both Stewart and I were fed up with Rice cutting our wages, refusing to pay fringes, and his comments that the Union was no good.

Stout denies that "what really happened" was that he was so fed up with Rice's cutting the wages that he did no work his last 2 weeks at SACS (1:204).

Stewart testified that he did not go to meet Stout for work on Monday, 23 June, because that day he had to attend to some "personal" business (2:328–329). He concedes, however, that he really did not go to work that day because he was "fed up" with Rice for cutting his wages even though the personal business was an additional reason (2:330–331, 346–347). Finally, on cross-examination Stewart confirmed that in his pretrial affidavit of 31 July (2:284, 320) the reasons he gave were (2:384): "On June 23rd 1986 I was so frustrated and angry at having my wages and fringes cut that I didn't report to work." Stewart testified that neither the secretary (Barbara Will) nor anyone paged him that day (2:267–268).

Barbara Will met Rice at the San Antonio airport on Monday, 23 June, and informed him that Stout and Stewart had not reported to work that morning at the post office job. Rice went immediately to the post office (3:546, 650).

At the post office Rice discovered that some copper lines had been capped, but no other work had been done. In particular there was no conduit installed from the chillers to the remote control panels, and there should have been 35 or 40 feet of conduit to each chiller. Moreover, the capping work he found was work Stout and Stewart had done earlier, in February (3:546–548, 651–652). At the post office Rice spoke with Jerry (surname not identified in the record) of Cold Temp who advised Rice that he had not seen Stout or Stewart at the post office the previous week (3:549–550).

Rice drove to another job at the Collins Gardens Library where Stout and Stewart were to have run about 50 feet of conduit from a control panel to a remote condensing unit on the roof and pull in three wires and terminate. Rice found no evidence of any work (3:550–551, 654–655).

Rice telephoned Cold Temp and requested patience regarding the post office job. He then contacted his nonunion crew and arranged for Broekers and John Heil to meet him at the post office the following morning. He was unable to reach Stewart about 4 p.m. on both the pager and by calling Stewart's home in Big Foot, Texas. Stout recently had moved and Rice did not have his number (3:552–553, 650). Stewart testified that his Big Foot home is about 45 to 50 miles south of downtown San Antonio (2:327–328).

That Monday night Stewart telephoned Stout at home and explained that he had taken care of personal business that day. They agreed to meet the following morning (1:161; 2:329).

On Tuesday morning Stout and Stewart met at the Taco Cabana around 7 a.m. From there they drove to a jobsite at a credit union about three blocks away. Finding the walls there not ready for their work, the two drove (in one vehicle) to the Sequin Library in Sequin, Texas (about 35 miles east of San Antonio), where they arrived about 11 a.m. As that job, too, was not ready for them, they returned to the Taco Cabana around 2 p.m. and from there each went home (1:162–163, Stout; 2:269–270, Stewart). There is no evidence that they attempted to call or go by the office.

That Tuesday, 24 June, Rice spent about an hour with his nonunion crew at the post office lining them up on the work to be done (3:552). They did the job in about 3 to 4 days. The work included installing about 100 feet of conduit to each chiller from a control center on the back wall of the basement (3:710, Broekers; 4:743–748, 758–760, Heil).

On Tuesday Rice decided Stout and Stewart should be terminated (3:562). That evening he finally reached Stewart.[19] Rice asked him where they had been on Monday and Tuesday. Stewart said he had been occupied with his personal business on Monday. Rice said the post office jobs was critical and he asked if they knew to be there. Stewart replied simply that he had personal business on Monday. Rice said he needed to see him and Stout in the office the next morning. Stewart asked whether he should remove his hand tools, and Rice said yes (3:566–567). Stewart contacted Stout and relayed the message to him (1:164; 2:331). They both understood that removal of their tools and personal items from the company pickups meant they were fired (1:164; 2:271).

On Wednesday, 25 June, Stewart and Stout met at the Taco Cabana between 7 and 8 a.m. and discussed the situation. Stewart concedes (2:272), as Rice testified (3:567), that he and Stout did not reach the office until about 11:30 a.m.

At the office, Stout testified, Rice told them he was letting them go for not calling in on Monday and that such complaint was the only reason he gave (1:165–166). Stout concedes, however, that over the last couple of weeks Rice had complained that he was losing money on their jobs, but he contends Rice always made that complaint (1:167, 226).

In addition to telling them they were being discharged for not calling in, Stewart testified (2:272, 276), Rice "implied" that they had not been producing for Rice the previous 2 weeks (2:332). The termination slip Rice gave to each reflects that each was being discharged because he "Did not contact this office Monday 6-23-86."(G.C. Exh. 20.)

Rice testified that he asked them why they did not show up for work on Monday. Stewart replied that he had personal business; Rice does not recall whether Stout responded (3:567). Rice asked them where they had worked the previous week and the number of hours (1:201–202, 216, Stout; 3:567, Rice). They named two jobs, the Sequin Library and the post office. On a yellow sheet of paper (G.C. Exh. 22) Rice recorded their responses as follows regarding 16–20 June (3:567–570):

[19] Stewart testified that he telephoned Rice about 9 p.m. to ask why Rice was not paying him (and Stout) the union scale of $15.75. Supposedly he also asked whether Rice had "resigned" from his contract with the Union and Rice said no (2:270, 331). As Stewart had not bothered to call Rice that day, I find it far more likely that the call that night was initiated by Rice. I credit Rice.

	M	T	W	T	F	Totals
Stewart
Sequin Library	4					4
Post Office		8	5	8	8	29
						33
Stout
Sequin Library	4					4
Post Office		8	8	8	8	32
						36

Rice told them that he was at the (post office) jobsite on Monday, that they knew how critical the job was to get completed, yet when Rice went there on Monday he did not see a "damn thing" either one of them had done other than the small amount of work they had done in February. Stout's only response was that they had been on Rice's payroll working for him. Stout did not say he had installed so many feet of conduit or pulled so much wire, but simply that they had been on his payroll working for him. Rice did not ask them about other jobs because this (post office) job was reason enough to terminate them.

Rice told the two that they had not been working in June, and what they had done to him the past month was pretty bad. He said he thought they were lying to him about the hours for the previous week, but he did not want to argue about it and would pay them for all the hours they were claiming (3:567–572). From there they went outside to check in the trucks. Rice found that the 1986 truck Stewart had been using was filthy from having been used for hunting, with 40 to 50 shotgun cases in the bed, empty beers cans in the cab, and brush marks on the sides (3:572–573).

Stout and Stewart apparently submitted no claim for hours on Monday or Tuesday, 23–24 June, and Stewart so testified (2:274, 347).

3. Discussion

As earlier noted, the General Counsel lists several factors as showing a prima facie case. Aside from denying the existence of a prima facie case, Respondent argues that it demonstrated, by "clear and convincing" evidence (Br. at 28), that Stout and Stewart would have been discharged notwithstanding their union membership because of their slowdown in work.

I find that the General Counsel failed to establish a prima facie case. First, Rice's announced intention to go nonunion never reflected an animus toward Stout or Stewart. Indeed, until June, at least, Stout concedes that Rice told him he had a home at SACS as long as he wanted one. There is nothing to suggest Rice felt any different toward Stewart.

Second, the timing factor (discharges occurring after expiration of the CBA) shows nothing but a chronological sequence of events without any cause-effect relationship. If anything, the timing factor lends support to Respondent's slowdown argument, which I discuss next.

Third, the unilateral reduction of wages lends far more support to Respondent's slowdown (or no work) defense than it does to the complaint's allegations of unlawful motivation. Indeed, the evidence demonstrates, and I find, that the resentment of Stout and Stewart against Rice and the unilateral cuts was the overriding reason Stewart did not show up for work on Monday, 23 June, and for Stout's going home without persisting in telephoning the office from the Taco Cabana. That same resentment, I find, resulted in this halfhearted effort to find work on Tuesday, 24 June, all the while declining to call Respondent's office or to answer the pager Stewart carried.

Fourth, contrary to the General Counsel's contention, in fact there was no established practice about not calling in on Mondays and Stewart admits that he usually called in whenever he missed work (2:266). Moreover, Mondays are when they were either to come to the office to report their time for the previous week or they were to call it in on Mondays (1:184, 190, 195, Stout; 2:311, Stewart).

Fifth, the "shifting" reasons. In the absence of explanation, I presume the General Counsel means that Respondent shifted from the reason stated on the discharge slip and from, to some extent, the testimony of Stout and Stewart that Rice gave no other reasons besides not calling in. In considering only the General Counsel's evidence,[20] however, there is no evidence of shifting. Even when we consider Respondent's evidence we have not shifting, but additional grounds. If I were to reach those grounds, I would credit Rice.

Sixth, the General Counsel argues (Br. at 15):

> Having received complaints from Stout and Stewart regarding their reduced wages, Rice realized that he would have to bring their employment to an immediate conclusion. Accordingly, he seized upon their failure to report to work on June 23, as a reason to terminate them on June 25.

That is a fine theory. Unfortunately, the General Counsel fails to cite the evidentiary underpinnings. What complaints, for example? Stewart telephoned on 11 June and inquired about the difference in the pay rates, but he did not complain. On Tuesday night, 24 June, Stewart testified that he telephoned Rice for the apparent purpose of complaining about the pay reduction. But Stewart never testified that he so complained or what Rice said (2:270, 330). All that Stewart said, so far as the record shows, was to ask Rice whether he had "resigned his contract." Rice supposedly said no, then told Stewart that he and Stout should remove their personal items from the trucks, come to the office (the next day), and talk to Rice (2:270). Even if I were to credit Stewart (which I do not), it is clear that in his version Rice had already decided to fire both employees. I find this sixth ground to be without merit.

[20] Hillside Bus Corp., 262 NLRB 1254 (1982).

Overall I find that the General Counsel's evidence does not rise to a prima facie case of unlawful motivation regarding either the unilateral changes or the discharge of Stout and Stewart. If I were to reach Respondent's evidence regarding Rice's motivation, I would credit Rice and the other evidence presented by Respondent. Even if I were to find, prima facie, that Respondent was unlawfully motivated in reducing wages and eliminating benefits after the 8(f) contract expired, I still would dismiss the 8(a)(3) allegation because I find that Respondent would have taken that action in any event for economic reasons. I shall dismiss complaint paragraphs 16, 19, and 20.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent San Antonio Control Systems Inc. (SACS) is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The South Texas Chapter, National Electrical Contractors Association (NECA) is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

3. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO, Local Union No. 60 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

4. The bargaining relationship created in February 1982 between SACS and IBEW Local 60 was established under Section 8(f) of the Act.

5. After the 8(f) relationship was established between SACS and IBEW Local 60 in February 1982, SACS never voluntarily recognized the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in an appropriate unit and, thus, never established a bargaining relationship under Section 9(a) of the Act.

6. When the latest collective-bargaining agreement (CBA) between SACS and the Union (the NECA contract) expired on 31 May 1986, SACS was free to repudiate its 8(f) relationship with the Union and to make unilateral changes in wages, hours, and working conditions regarding its employees previously covered by the NECA contract.

7. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act on or about 21 May 1986 when it distributed copies of a memorandum dated 20 May 1986 outlining company policies and procedures ostensibly applicable to SACS' unrepresented employees, to its employees represented by IBEW Local 60 and telling them to think about such policies because they would apply to them if they elected, at some future date, to resign their union membership.

8. Respondent SACS did not violate Section 8(a)(5) of the Act in June 1986 when, following expiration of the 8(f) NECA contract on 31 May 1986, it made unilateral changes in wages and benefits for employees previously covered by the NECA CBA.

9. Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act on 11 June 1986 when it told its employees represented by the Union that SACS was reducing wage rates effective retroactively to 1 June 1986 and would no longer make the fringe benefit contributions called for in the recently expired NECA contract.

10. Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing, on and after 1 July 1986, to furnish the Union with data the Union had requested by letter of 1 July 1986.

11. Respondent has not violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by failing and refusing to bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of certain of its employees.

12. Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) of the Act on 11 June 1986 by unilaterally reducing wage rates of the employees covered by the recently expired 8(f) NECA contract, nor by simultaneously discontinuing fringe benefit payments called for in such expired CBA.

13. The General Counsel failed to establish a prima facie case that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act on 25 June 1986 by discharging employees Joseph Ronnie Stout and Charles Douglas Stewart.

14. The unfair labor practice described in Conclusion of Law 7 affects commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Although Respondent no longer has a collective-bargaining relationship with IBEW Local 60, I shall order it to notify the Union, and Respondent's employees, that if ever in the future SACS again has a collective-bargaining relationship with IBEW Local 60, or any labor organization, it will not bypass such representative and deal directly with the represented employees.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[21]

ORDER

The Respondent, San Antonio Control Systems Inc., San Antonio, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Bypassing the collective-bargaining representative and dealing directly with any of its employees who may in the future be represented by IBEW Local 60 or any other labor organization concerning wages, hours, or other terms and conditions of employment.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Notify IBEW Local 60 in writing that should that union, or any other labor organization, in the future become the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of any of its employees in an appropriate unit, that SACS will not bypass IBEW Local 60, or any such labor organization, and deal directly with such represented employees on wages, hours, or terms and conditions of employment.

[21] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) Post at its Houston, Texas office copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[22] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 23, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

[22] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION, ORDER, AND DIRECTION OF SECOND ELECTION

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On February 13, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Jay R. Pollack issued the attached decision. The Respondent, the General Counsel, and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and briefs in opposition.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions,[2] to modify the remedy,[3] and to adopt his recommended Order as modified, and set forth in full below.

The judge found, inter alia, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by screening job applicants to determine suspected union sympathizers and refusing to consider those applicants. The judge deferred "the difficult remedial questions of the identity of the discriminatees and the backpay due them to the compliance stage of the proceeding."

Further, the judge extended the remedy to include all job applicants regardless of what positions they sought. The judge stated that the "ambiguity was caused by Respondent's unlawful hiring practices and, therefore, that ambiguity will not be resolved in Respondent's favor."

However, we cannot agree that the remedy should be extended to "include all job applicants regardless of positions." The complaint alleges as discriminatees certain named individuals, referring to welder applicants and pipefitter applicants and to other applicants presently unknown, but known to Respondent KRI. The context and language of this portion of the complaint clearly and logically put the Respondent on notice that at issue was its hiring policies with regard to applicants for pipefitter and welder positions. Moreover, the evidence adduced at trial related to the Respondent's hiring practices regarding welders and pipefitters. The General Counsel did not seek to amend the complaint to include all job applicants. Under the circumstances, the remedy must be limited to applicants for the positions of welder and pipefitter. See generally Edwin R. O'Neill, 288 NLRB 1354 fn. 16 (1988), and cases cited there.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, KRI Constructors, Inc., Coos Bay, Oregon, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to consider for employment job applicants for the positions of pipefitter and welder because they are members or sympathizers of the Union or because they worked in establishments which had union contracts.

(b) Discriminating against employees in regard to their rate of pay for the purpose of discouraging support for the Union.

(c) Laying off, discharging, or failing to recall employees for the purpose of discriminating against them for supporting the Union or otherwise discriminating against employees in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment for engaging in activity on behalf of a labor organization.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole all employee applicants for the positions of pipefitter and welder for any losses they may have suffered by reason of the discrimi-

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The General Counsel and the Charging Party except to the judge's failure to provide a make-whole remedy for the employees found by the judge to have been unlawfully laid off or denied recall. We find merit in the exception. The Respondent contends that the judge granted a make-whole remedy only to employees Carney, Elizalde, and Paloma because, according to the Respondent, they are the only employees whom the judge found to have been discriminatorily terminated or laid off. However, contrary to the Respondent, the judge also found that by laying off employees in October and November 1984 in order to discourage union membership or support, the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. The judge inadvertently failed to provide a make-whole remedy for these employees. Clearly, all employees unlawfully laid off or denied recall are entitled to a make-whole remedy. We shall modify the judge's recommended Order accordingly.

[3] In accordance with our decision New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

In his recommended Order, the judge included a visitatorial clause. In the circumstances of this case, that clause is unwarranted. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

natory refusal to consider them for employment in the manner described in the remedy section of the administrative law judge's decision as modified.

(b) Make whole the employees unlawfully laid off in October and November 1984 for any losses they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them in the manner described in the remedy section of the administrative law judge's decision as modified.

(c) Make whole employees Terry Emerson, Eugene Thomas, Thomas Babcock, Dennis Carney, Jorge Elizalde, and Leonard Paloma for any losses suffered by reason of the discrimination against them in the manner described in the remedy section of the administrative law judge's decision as modified.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge and layoffs and notify the employees that this has been done and that the discharges and layoffs will not be used against them in any way.

(f) Post at its Coos Bay, Oregon facility copies of the attached notice Marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.[5]

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the election in Case 36–RC–4748 is set aside and that the case is severed and remanded to the Regional Director for Region 19 to conduct a second election whenever he deems it appropriate (if the Employer resumes operations at Coos Bay, Oregon).

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to consider for employment job applicants for the positions of pipefitter and welder because they are members or sympathizers of a union or because they worked in establishments which had union contracts.

WE WILL NOT discriminate against employees in regard to their rate of pay for the purpose of discouraging support for the United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and pipefitting Industry, Local No. 51, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT lay off, discharge, or fail to recall employees for the purpose of discriminating against them for supporting the Union or otherwise discriminate against employees in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment for engaging in activity on behalf of a labor organization.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole all our employee applicants for the positions of pipefitter and welder for any losses they may have suffered by reason of our discriminatory refusal to consider them for employment, with interest.

WE WILL make whole the employees unlawfully laid off in October and November 1984 for any

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAY R. POLLACK, Administrative Law Judge. I heard these consolidated cases in trial at Portland, Oregon, on February 25–27, 1986, and in Coos Bay, Oregon, on February 28 and March 3–7, 1986. The cases arose as follows: On October 17, 1984, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry, Local No. 51 (the Union) filed a petition for representation in Case 36–RC–4748 for all employees of KRI Constructors, Inc. (Respondent), performing plumbing and pipefitting work at Coos Bay. On November 14, 15, 20, and 21, 1984, a hearing on the petition was held under the supervision of the Regional Director for Region 19 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board). Thereafter on December 24, 1984, the Acting Regional Director issued a Decision and Direction of Election in a unit of all employees, a unit significantly larger than that petitioned for by the Union. An election was conducted under the supervision of the Regional Director on February 22, 1985. The results of the election were, out of 94 ballots cast, 12 in favor of representation by the Union, 66 against, and 16 ballots were challenged. Thereafter, the Union filed timely objections to the conduct of the election.

On January 8, 1985, the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge against Respondent and ARCO-Alaska, Inc. This charge was amended on April 2, 1985. Thereafter, on April 10, 1985, a complaint was issued by the Acting Regional Director against Respondent and ARCO-Alaska, Inc., alleging violations of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act. On that same date, the Acting Regional Director issued a notice of hearing on certain of the Union's objections to the conduct of election and an order consolidating the representation case and the unfair labor practice case for hearing before an administrative law judge.

At the request of Respondent, the hearing was rescheduled from April 30 to June 25, 1985. Thereafter, the hearing was rescheduled from June 25 to September 24 at the request of the General Counsel. Prior to the opening of the hearing on September 24, I engaged in a series of conference calls with counsel for the parties. The General Counsel's and Union's cases were based almost entirely on the testimony of Travis Ballard, Respondent's project manager from approximately August 1984 until January 1985. Ballard, a resident of Texas, was working on an oil project in the country of Angola. After his discharge by Respondent, Ballard gave affidavits that purportedly established violations of the Act by Respondent and ARCO-Alaska. However, the General Counsel had not served Ballard with a subpoena until after he had left this country and gone to work in Angola. At the request of the General Counsel and Union, the hearing was opened on September 24 in order to place Ballard in noncompliance with the subpoena. Shortly thereafter, the General Counsel filed an application with the United States Court for the District of Oregon for enforcement of the subpoena. On October 3, 1985, the district court issued an order requiring Ballard to appear before me on January 7, 1986. On January 7, 1986, Ballard again failed to appear and I rescheduled the case for trial on February 25, 1986, regardless of Ballard's presence. Shortly thereafter, the General Counsel filed a petition for civil contempt with the district court seeking to compel Ballard's attendance at the February 25 hearing. The district court heard argument in the contempt case on February 24, but did not issue a decision until May 28, 1986, when it dismissed the petition for contempt on the ground that the subpoena had not been properly served.

As mentioned earlier, I heard this case in trial during February and March 1986. Ballard never appeared at the hearing. Without Ballard's testimony, the General Counsel and Union had no evidence of any violation of the Act by ARCO-Alaska, Inc. and, accordingly, I granted ARCO's motion to dismiss the complaint against it. I also denied a request for a further continuance to obtain Ballard's attendance at the hearing based on the General Counsel's failure to properly serve the subpoena. The General Counsel and the Union sought special permission to appeal my ruling. On May 29, 1986, unaware of the district court's ruling that no valid subpoena had been served on Ballard, the Board granted the General Counsel's and the Union's appeal on the dismissal as to ARCO-Alaska and the denial of a continuance and ordered that the record be reopened pending the outcome of the subpoena enforcement proceedings.

In view of the district court ruling that no valid subpoena had been served on Ballard, I again closed the record on June 6 and denied the General Counsel's and the Union's request for a further continuance. However, on June 16, I reopened the record based on representations by the Union and the General Counsel that Ballard had returned to the United States and could be properly served by July 15, 1986. A hearing date was scheduled for July 22, conditioned on proper service on Ballard. However, proper service on Ballard could not be effectuated. It is believed that Ballard left the United States and returned to Angola. On July 15, I closed the record for the third time and dismissed the complaint against ARCO-Alaska, Inc.[1] In closing the record, I left open the possibility that the General Counsel or the Union could move to reopen the record on proper service of a subpoena on Travis Ballard. However, no further motion to reopen the record has been filed.

On the entire record, from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and having considered the posthearing briefs, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Texas corporation that was working under contract with ARCO to build modules in Coos Bay, Oregon, for shipment by barge to the Alaska oilfields in time for installation during the summer months of 1985. During the times material Respondent purchased and received goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from sources located outside the State of Oregon. The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background and Issues

Respondent began working in August 1984 to build modules for ARCO for shipment to Alaska in the summer of 1985. Travis Ballard arrived at the Coos Bay jobsite in August 1984 to prepare for the construction that was scheduled to begin in October 1984. Gayle Hansen was hired by Ballard on October 10 to run the personnel office and interview prospective employees. On October 19, the Union filed a petition for representation of Respondent's employees performing plumbing and pipefitting work. The General Counsel and the Union allege that Respondent, through Gayle Hansen, screened applicants in an attempt to avoid hiring union members and union sympathizers. It is Respondent's position that Hansen was simply a clerical employee and that her words and conduct had no bearing on Respondent's hiring practices.

The General Counsel and the Union also allege that (1) Respondent laid off employees in October and November 1984 in order to discourage support for the Union; (2) Respondent failed to recall from layoff and/or terminated employees in order to discourage support for the Union; (3) Respondent hired nonunion employees from outside the State and paid these employees higher wages than the previously hired union supporters; and (4) Respondent constructively discharged three pipewelder employees by paying them wages less than the nonunion pipewelders.

As indicated earlier, the Union's objections to the conduct of the election have been consolidated for hearing. The objections, which are also alleged as unfair labor practices, are that Respondent (1) terminated and laid off employees because of their union sympathies; (2) hired individuals based on their antiunion sympathies; (3) paid higher wages and benefits to nonunion employees; and (4) discriminated against the three pipewelders resulting in their constructive discharge because of their union sympathies.

In support of its allegation that Respondent intended to eliminate union support by its hiring practices, the General Counsel and the Union sought the testimony of Travis Ballard. As indicated earlier, Ballard was never properly served with a subpoena.

Based on Ballard's unavailability at trial, the Union offered his pretrial affidavits under Rule 804(b)(3) of the Federal Rules of Evidence contending that Ballard's admission of unfair labor practices was a statement against interest and, therefore, an exception to the hearsay rule.[2]

The Union argued that Ballard was admitted to practice as an attorney in the State of Texas and that the admission of unfair labor practices could result in disciplinary proceedings before the bar. According to Respondent, Ballard has been the subject of prior bar disciplinary proceedings. In considering the circumstances under which the statements were given, I was greatly influenced by the fact that prior to giving the statements in question Ballard had brought suit against Respondent in superior court in Oregon alleging an unjust discharge and further alleging that he was discharged because he had not more effectively discharged the plan or scheme of unfair labor practices established by Respondent. This particular fact made the statements appear to be in Ballard's interest rather than against his interest at the time the statements were made. Even assuming that the possibility of bar disciplinary proceedings is sufficiently against interest as to qualify under this Rule, a point I find extremely doubtful, Ballard's immediate pecuniary

[1] Although the Union filed a timely request for review of the first dismissal of the entire complaint against ARCO-Alaska, neither the General Counsel nor the Union filed a request for review of the July 15, 1986 dismissal of the complaint against ARCO-Alaska. Accordingly, under Sec. 102.27 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the case against ARCO-Alaska, Inc. is closed.

[2] Rule 804(b)(3) states:

(b) The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule if the declarant is unavailable as a witness:

(3) Statement against interest—A statement which was at the time of its making so far contrary to the declarant's pecuniary or proprietary interest, or so far tended to subject him to civil or criminal liability, or to render invalid a claim by him against another, that a reasonable man in his position would not have made the statement unless he believed it to be true. A statement tending to expose the declarant to criminal liability and offered to exculpate the accused is not admissible unless corroborating circumstances indicate the trustworthiness of the statement.

interest was served by these statements supporting his lawsuit. In fact, Respondent settled the lawsuit for approximately $30,000.

The Union argued that Ballard's second of two affidavits, although given prior to the settlement of his lawsuit against Respondent, was signed after the settlement agreement. The Union argued, therefore, that at the time the second statement was signed it was no longer in Ballard's interest to make statements against Respondent. However, I found that argument unpersuasive. Under all the circumstances, it would not appear that Ballard's signing of the second statement, which was consistent with his previously signed statement, would qualify as a statement so far contrary to Ballard's interest as to lead to the inference that a reasonable man in his position would not have made the statement unless he believed it to be true. I reaffirm my ruling that the affidavits are inadmissible hearsay and lack the necessary trustworthiness required of exceptions to the hearsay rule.

B. Respondent's Hiring Practices

Respondent is a wholly owned subsidiary of Kellog Rust Incorporated, the second largest contractor in the United States. Respondent is "the open shop construction arm of the Kellog Rust Group" and is headquartered in Houston, Texas. Respondent's corporate labor relations policy provides:

> The development of labor relations policies for KRI projects is carried out by the Vice President of Operations assisted by the KRI Personnel Department. This team will establish the project labor approach based upon the findings of an Area Survey which considers such aspects as the available skilled labor pool, the workload in the area, the political climate and local labor and community attitudes. For every KRI open shop project, a Project Industrial Relations Plan is prepared dealing with employment screening procedures, security plans, the media, and local contacts with judiciary and law enforcement agencies.

Prior to the commencement of its operations in Coos Bay, Respondent conducted a survey to determine the viability of an open-shop operation in that area. That survey stated that the area was viable for an open-shop operation and indicated that the unions in the area were very weak. The document states that the American Builders and Contractors personnel "feel that the Coos Bay area is ideal for [Respondent's] purposes and they also feel that [Respondent] would have no union problems." The survey concludes that "KRI can work open shop in the area with little or no union problems." While the survey mentioned several unions by name, it did not mention the Charging Party Union.

Travis Ballard, Respondent's highest ranking official at the Coos Bay facility, was quoted in the newspapers and on television both before and after the filing of the Union's representation petition stating that Respondent was an open-shop or nonunion facility and preferred to continue to operate in that manner. Further, Respondent's advertisements in the local area newspapers for craftsmen indicated that the Company was an open-shop contractor and fabricator.

It is clear that Respondent was intent on operating as an open shop or on a nonunion basis. The question is whether Respondent took unlawful action in an effort to preserve its open-shop or nonunion status.

Gayle Hansen, called by the General Counsel as an adverse witness, was hired by Respondent on October 10, 1984, to run the personnel office at the Coos Bay jobsite. Hansen was hired by Travis Ballard and told that Respondent was an "open shop"[3] company. Ballard told Hansen that Respondent needed skilled people to work on an open-shop basis. According to Hansen, Ballard said, "We're open shop and we're going to have to be careful of the union background." Hansen was aware of Ballard's often-quoted preference to remain open shop or nonunion.

Based on her experience in the Coos Bay Area, Hansen could determine whether an employer listed by an applicant as a previous employer was union or nonunion.[4] At the beginning of her employment with Respondent, Hansen would write union or open shop next to the previous employer's name listed on a job applicant's employment application. Hansen testified that she gave all employee applicants her "open shop speech." The open-shop speech informed the applicants that Respondent was a Texas-based company building oil modules for ARCO. Hansen told the applicants that Respondent was an open-shop company and preferred to remain open shop. Hansen then stated that open shop meant that employees crossed craft lines. An employee hired for one job, for example, as a pipefitter, could expect to be used by the Company in the warehouse or as a structural ironworker depending on the Company's needs. Hansen also informed the applicants that Respondent had previously had pickets on the job, that a union had filed a representation petition, and that there might be pickets on the job in the future. Hansen would make a notation on the job application of the employee applicant's remarks or comments to this open-shop speech.[5]

[3] Hansen originally testified that open shop meant that a company did not follow strict craft lines, but required employees to perform different jobs and perform different skills throughout a job. However, as the hearing progressed, Hansen began to concede that she and Ballard used the term open shop to indicate that a company was nonunion or did not have a union contract.

[4] Ballard and Respondent's other supervisors were from out of State and did not have knowledge of the union or nonunion status of Oregon employers.

[5] In early to mid-November, Hansen was advised by an attorney for Respondent not to write the previous employer's union or nonunion affiliation on the job application. Thereafter, Hansen made comments on "post-it" slips (yellow paper that was attached with a removable adhesive to the job application). Hanson continued to make notations of the employee's comments to her union shop speech, but stopped writing whether the previous employers were union or not. Hansen testified that she attempted to white-out the comments about a previous employer's union affiliation on the job applications but since the comments could be read even after the white eradicator solution had been applied, Hansen did not attempt to white-out the comments on all the applications. In some instances where Hanson attempted to white-out the comments, she rewrote the comments on the yellow post-it slips.

Hansen testified that she did not ask any applicants about their union background or union sympathies. However, the comments Hansen received from employee applicants and her notation of these comments seem to indicate that Hansen was seeking to elicit comments of dissatisfaction or negativism toward unions. The applicants expressly stated that they would cross picket lines. Hansen explained that she asked open-ended questions and that the applicants volunteered the information regarding their dissatisfaction with unions and their willingness to cross picket lines. One explanation for such responses to Hansen's open-shop speech is that Ballard had been extensively quoted in the media expressing Respondent's desire to remain open shop and Respondent's desire to resist the Union's attempt at organization of its employees. Thus, it is not unlikely that an applicant would express antiunion or antipicket views to Hansen in an attempt to increase his or her chance of being hired.

A review of the notations placed on the applications by Hansen reveals that she recorded employees' comments that they would cross picket lines, had worked under nonunion conditions in the past, had dissatisfaction with unions in the past, and had never belonged to a union. Further, some notations revealed Hansen's comments that she believed the applicant would cross a picket line or was "a good open shop person." The General Counsel argues that the allegation that Respondent unlawfully screened employees for their union sympathies and backgrounds is established by the comments on General Counsel's Exhibit 7. That exhibit is the employment application of Walter Nash, a local pipewelder whose experience was with employers in Alaska and Washington. On a post-it attached to the application, Hansen had written: "Are these previous employers union? If so, we aren't interested." The applicant in question had listed pipewelding experience with two firms in Alaska and one in Washington State. The applicant was not hired. Hansen testified that this comment was directed to her secretary, but she did not further explain why Respondent would not be interested in this applicant if his previous employers were unionized. No other agent of Respondent testified to any lawful reason or explanation for this post-it.

The second most damaging piece of evidence against Respondent was given by Hansen. Hansen testified that she called Don Laube, a personal friend and the manager of Chambers Plumbing and Heating, to check on the qualifications of applicant William Sandine for employment as a pipefitter. Hansen testified that Laube specifically told her that Sandine was a good plumber, but was not that experienced as a pipefitter. Laube, called as a witness by the Union, testified that he did not talk to Hansen about Sandine. Laube testified that he had known Sandine for over 20 years and that Sandine had been Chambers' only pipefitter. According to Laube, Sandine was responsible for all the pipefitting work done by Chambers Plumbing during that time period. Laube testified that he never would have told Hansen that Sandine was not a qualified pipefitter or otherwise criticized Sandine's work because to do so Laube would, in effect, be criticizing himself and Chambers Plumbing. According to Laube, his conversation with Hansen was simply her asking whether Chambers Plumbing's employees would be willing to work alongside Respondent's employees if Respondent subcontracted some work to Chambers Plumbing. Laube answered that his employees often work alongside nonunion employees on such a basis.

Hansen testified again after Laube, but never rebutted or denied his testimony. Laube, a friend of Hansen, had no motivation to testify untruthfully and his demeanor on the stand was very convincing. I credit Laube completely on this point and find that Hansen's testimony regarding Sandine was a fabrication to cover Respondent's failure to hire a qualified applicant from the Coos Bay area. Hansen knew Sandine to be a long-time union member and apparently could find no truthful explanation for Respondent's failure to hire him. This is particularly important, since Respondent claims that it later had to hire applicants from outside the State because there were no qualified applicants in the area.

There is some doubt as to Hansen's effect on Respondent's hiring. Hansen accepted applications and interviewed employees. Thereafter, the applications were passed on to Superintendents Dickie Stewart and George McConnell.[6] George McConnell, now employed by Respondent at a different location, testified that in hiring he did not pay attention to Gayle Hansen's comments. According to McConnell, Hansen did not know what type of skilled people Respondent required. Stewart was present during the hearing, but was not called to testify.

According to McConnell, Respondent hired pipefitters from Houston in December and from Coos Bay subsequent to that. McConnell testified that certain applicants were rejected because they had no welding experience or did not have the necessary pipewelding experience. However, McConnell never addressed the qualifications of certain applicants from the Coos Bay area who possessed pipefitting or pipewelding experience. McConnell admitted that he was aware of Respondent's open-shop status and that he was responsible to ensure that Respondent remained an open shop.

Robert Claassen, an applicant for employment as a pipefitter, testified that when he was interviewed by Gayle Hansen, he was told that Respondent was open shop and preferred to stay that way. Hansen told Claassen that Respondent had sent 18 welders and fitters from Houston, Texas. Claassen testified that Hansen told him that if the employees voted to organize that Respondent would move from Coos Bay. Claassen's job application indicated that he had 28 years' experience as a pipefitter. Hansen placed three plus marks on Claassen's application indicating that Hansen judged him to be an excellent prospect. On an attached post-it, Hansen noted that she had given Claassen her open-shop speech and that he seemed dependable. Hansen also included three question marks. The question marks were not explained by Hansen or any other witness. The three previous employers were large union firms. Claassen was not hired.

[6] Prior to December 1984, applications were also given to Lawrence Lutes, then a superintendent.

Buster Clemens, an applicant for employment as a pipefitter, was also interviewed by Gayle Hansen. Clemens was interviewed by Hansen in October. On Clemens' job application Hansen made the notation that his two previous employers were "union." Clemens had worked as a pipefitter in Alaska and as a plumber locally in the Coos Bay area. After noting that she gave Clemens her union shop speech, Hansen remarked that Clemens "wanted to stay here." After noting that she mentioned pickets, Hansen recorded that Clemens had answered "you've been fair." Clemens was not hired.

Randall McDonald applied for employment with Respondent in October 1984. In a telephone conversation McDonald told Hansen that he had module experience in Alaska and Hansen stated that was the type of experience Respondent was looking for. Subsequently, McDonald was told by Hansen that Respondent had all the pipefitters it needed. The three previous employers indicated on McDonald's application were union employers. McDonald was not hired.

In December 1984, Respondent's personnel manager, Gerald Smith, sent pipewelders and pipefitters from Texas and Utah to Respondent's Coos Bay facility. These employees were paid $12.10 per hour—$1.90 more per hour than the local pipewelders received.[7] These out-of-state recruits also received 20 cents per mile travel pay and up to a week's pay as a bonus. Hansen did not interview any of these employees. There was no satisfactory explanation why these out-of-town welders were paid a higher wage rate than the welders hired locally. Nor was it explained why Respondent needed to hire from out of state at additional expense while not hiring local workers.[8]

Terry Emerson, a union member and welder hired by Respondent in October 1984, testified that Ballard told him that Respondent recruited these out-of-state welders because Respondent knew they would tend to be nonunion workers.[9]

Hansen testified that the wage rate for pipewelders in October and November 1984 was a flat rate of $10.20 per hour. However, she testified that she received a revised wage schedule from Respondent's Houston office (Gerald Smith) which reflected two wages rates for pipewelders. This latter wage schedule was backdated to June 1984, apparently to justify the higher wage rate for the out-of-state hires. Hansen could not explain why the wage schedule was backdated and Gerald Smith did not testify. George McConnell testified that the $10.20 was an entry level rate and that an employee could receive a merit rate to $12.10 after the employee proved himself. According to McConnell this merit system was in effect at the commencement of the job.[10] However, this testimony did hold up under cross-examination and McConnell later testified that the merit system was established in November or December. However, even with this revised time schedule, Respondent's witnesses were unable to explain why pipewelders hired locally and performing well were paid $10.20 per hour and out-of-state welders were hired in, not at the starting rate but, at $12.10 per hour the alleged merit rate.[11] As stated earlier the General Counsel and Union allege that Respondent paid the local pipewelders, thought to be union members, lower wages than the out-of-state welders, thought to be nonunion, in order to discourage union activities in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

C. The Alleged Constructive Discharges

Employees Steven Thomas, Terry Emerson, and Joseph Babcock were hired by Respondent in October 1984. All three were union members and were journeymen pipewelders. McConnell admitted that these three welders were competent and could not give any reason why these three were paid less than the welders hired from outside the State.

After learning that the new out-of-state welders were earning an extra $1.90 per hour, Thomas, Babcock, and Emerson complained to Ballard. Ballard told the employees that it was a corporate decision (meaning Gerald Smith in Houston) and the best Ballard could do was pay the employees $12.10 retroactive to the start of the week. The employees demanded $12.10 retroactive to the first day that an out-of-state welder received $12.10. Ballard said he could not do that and all three employees quit.[12] As mentioned earlier, the General Counsel and [7] The wage rates paid to the out-of-state recruits was $1.90 more per hour over the wage rates Respondent had listed in its newspaper advertisements. The out-of-state recruits had previously worked for Respondent or for some other large nonunion construction firms.

[8] Respondent argues that it was required to hire from out of State because there was a shortage of qualified applicants locally. However, no testimony was offered to support this argument.

[9] This statement of Ballard was made after he had left Respondent's employ and was clearly hearsay statement. Respondent did not make a timely objection and, therefore, the evidence was admitted. During closing argument, Respondent's counsel sought to exclude this hearsay apparently contending that he had misunderstood a previous ruling allowing a statement made by Ballard, during a time when Ballard was an agent of Respondent, as an admission by a party opponent.

In the absence of an objection from the party against whom the evidence is being offered, hearsay is admissible and becomes part of the record. Alvin J. Bart, 236 NLRB 242, 243 (1978); Passaic Daily News v. NLRB, 736 F.2d 1543 fn. 15 (D.C. Cir. 1984). The theory is that having not objected to the hearsay, the opposing party apparently does not take issue with the evidence. Here, such an inference would clearly be a fiction. Respondent consistently took issue with any statement made by Ballard, particularly as here, when the statement was made after Ballard's termination by Respondent. Respondent has consistently taken the position that any statement made by Ballard is untrustworthy and that to credit Ballard without granting Respondent an opportunity to cross-examine him would be contrary to the rules of evidence. Due to the circumstances of Ballard's discharge, subsequent lawsuit against Respondent, and unavailability at trial, I treat Ballard's statement as testified to by Emerson as hearsay and, therefore, give it no weight.

However, based on other facts and circumstances, more fully discussed infra, I draw the very same inference, i.e., that Respondent was hiring the out-of-state workers, who had worked nonunion in the past and were probably not union members, in an attempt to avoid hiring local workers who had worked for union employers or who were referred by the Union, and who probably were union members.

[10] McConnell is not credited on this point.

[11] The $10.20-per-hour wage rate was used in Respondent's employment advertisements and in the hourly wage schedule utilized prior to the filing of the petition.

[12] Emerson testified that after Ballard's discharge, Ballard told him that Respondent paid the three welders a lower wage in the hope that they would quit working for Respondent. For the reasons stated earlier, I treat this as hearsay and give it no weight, notwithstanding that Respondent made an untimely objection.

Union contend that this conduct amounts to a constructive discharge of the three employees.

D. The Alleged Unlawful Layoffs

On October 30, 1984, Respondent laid off approximately half of its work force and on November 7 it laid off the remaining employees. The reason advanced at the time of the layoffs was a shortage of materials. There is much conflicting testimony on the issue of whether there was in fact a shortage of materials resulting in the layoffs.

Robert Lelong, Respondent's material manager at the time of the layoffs, testified that the layoffs were not necessitated by a lack of materials. According to Lelong, at the time of the layoffs he confronted Ballard[13] and asked why Respondent was giving material shortage as a reason for the layoffs. Ballard refused to explain but assured Lelong that it was no reflection on Lelong's work.

In support of his statement that the layoffs were not necessitated by a lack of materials, Lelong testified that it was usual for there to be material shortages on the job and that the normal procedure was to assign employees to another task while awaiting supplies. Lelong explained that certain company documents compiling problems were used to lay the groundwork for back charges on the contract. Lelong conceded that material was often delivered without the proper certifications, but testified that this did not require shutting down the job. According to Lelong, it was standard practice to proceed without the certifications because the necessary documentation would arrive a few days later. Lelong also stated that ARCO, Respondent's customer, allowed materials to be used without certification on hand on at least 10 occasions. It was not until December 1984, well after the layoffs at issue, that Respondent ceased asking ARCO for permission to use materials while awaiting certifications. Finally, Lelong testified that he had not, prior to the instant hearing, heard that a lack of isometric drawings was a reason for the layoffs.

Respondent offered substantial evidence to rebut Lelong's testimony. Thomas Walters, formerly Lelong's assistant, testified to a shortage of materials. The Union contends that Walters had no experience and that the documents he relied on related to events subsequent to the second layoff.

William Tow, a laborer and carpenter, also testified to a shortage of materials. Further, Tow testified that materials arrived at the jobsite without proper certification. The Union contends Tow was not on the jobsite during October and November 1984 and had insufficient experience regarding the materials.

George McConnell testified to both a shortage of materials and a shortage of proper certification of materials. McConnell testified that he was not involved in the decision to lay off employees and knew nothing about the layoffs until the day they were announced.

Pipewelders Steven Thomas, Dennis Carney, Terry Neely, and Terry Emerson testified there was work for all the welders in the fabrication shop when they were laid off.

E. The Alleged Unlawful Terminations

By letter dated November 20, 1984, Respondent terminated 9 out of the 12 pipewelders employed in its fabrication shop. The nine pipewelders who were on layoff at the time were fired because of the rate of rejection of their welds. The General Counsel and the Union argue that the rejection rate was a pretext and that Respondent terminated the pipewelders because it knew from the representation case that 11 of the 12 employees were affiliated with the Union. Respondent's knowledge of the union affiliation of the pipewelders is not at issue. Rather, the question is whether they were terminated because of their union affiliation or because of the rate of rejection of their welds.

Pursuant to Respondent's agreement with ARCO, X-Ray, Inc., an independent quality control inspection company, X-rayed the welds. In the welding of certain joints, more than one employee worked on the weld. Each welder had his own stamp or mark so that the individual welder would be known for each weld or portion of a weld. In welding two pipes or a pipe and a fitting together, the two pieces are first tacked in four spots. Then four passes are made around the pipe with welding material. The first pass is called the root pass, the second pass is the hot pass, the third pass is called the filler pass, and the final pass is the cap. At the start of the job, one welder would make the first two passes and another welder would make the final two passes.

Elvin Reese, an inspector for X-Ray, Inc., testified that the X-ray process used to test the Respondent's welds revealed not only the faulty weld but also that portion of the weld that was at fault, thereby allowing X-Ray, Inc. and Respondent to identify the culpable welder. The testing by this independent inspection company commenced prior to any union activity at the jobsite and was required by ARCO because of the nature of the job. There is no reason to suspect that the testing or submission of the testing reports was in any way designed to discriminate against employees. The question presented is whether Respondent seized on these nondiscriminatory tests as a pretext to discharge the welders known to be affiliated with the Union.

George McConnell testified that he met with Dickie Stewart to evaluate employees prior to their recall from layoff. According to McConnell, Respondent originally had set a rejection rate of 5 percent as acceptable, in other words, employees with a rejection rate in excess of 5 percent would not be retained. However, early in the job, there were unforeseen problems with the welding. In making their determinations regarding dismissal or retention of welders, McConnell and Stewart terminated all employees with a rejection rate of 20 percent or more, resulting in the discharge of 9 of the 12 welders. The remaining three welders, Emerson, Thomas, and Babcock, had rejection rates of approximately 6 percent.[14] McConnell and Stewart used the reports made by X-Ray, Inc. in calculating such employees' rejection rate. McConnell testified that he assumed the accuracy of these reports and did not make further investigation or calculations. Had McConnell made further calculations he would have discovered that in many cases more than one welder had been charged for the same welding error. I credit McConnell's testimony that he relied on the accuracy of X-Ray, Inc.'s reports and that he made no further calculations. I believe that McConnell had more confidence in the calculations of X-Ray, Inc. than he would have in any separate calculation he could have made himself. I am convinced that McConnell accepted the representation of X-Ray, Inc. that an employee was only charged for his own errors and that McConnell was not aware that more than one welder had been charged with the same error.

[13] Ballard and Lelong were still in Respondent's employ at the time of these conversations. I, therefore, overruled Respondent's hearsay objection. I found these statements to be admissions by a party-opponent under Sec. 801(d)(2), Federal Rules of Evidence, and by definition not hearsay.

Another factor complicating the determination of whether Respondent was motivated by the welders' union sympathies in the discharges of November 20 is the testimony regarding the problems encountered by Respondent's welders in the initial welds done and tested on the job.

Respondent's welders were experiencing a problem with the tacks (the first step in the welding process) cracking in many of the 8-inch pipes. The welders discussed this problem with McConnell and Quality Control Manager James McLemore. This problem was discussed in the shop and in a general meeting attended by all the welders and supervisors. Several of the welders, Don Davis, Terry Neely, Terry Emerson, and Joseph Babcock, testified that McConnell and McLemore told them that these initial welds on the 8-inch pipes would not be held against them.

McConnell testified that he knew that the welders were having problems with the 8-inch pipes, but denied telling the welders that these errors would not be counted against them. Elvin Reese, the testing technician, confirmed that the error rate in the 8-inch pipe was unusually high and would have caused him to believe there was a problem with the pipe, especially since the error rate in the 3-inch pipe was very low.

After the layoffs of October 20 and November 7, the procedure for welding the 8-inch pipe was changed. The company records indicate that ARCO and Respondent did not require the first 18 welds on 8-inch pipe to be rewelded because of a change in material. However, McConnell counted all errors in the 8-inch pipe against the welders in determining their rejection rate, including the first 18 welds which had been "deleted due to a design change."

The General Counsel and the Union contend that Respondent counted as errors welds that had no flaws or no visible flaws. I reject this contention. Although several employees testified that in repairing rejected welds they were unable to find the flaw, that testimony was rebutted by the testimony of Reese and McConnell. First, many of the flaws that showed up in the x-rays were just not visible to the naked eye or not visible after the necessary grinding required to get to the spot of the flaw. Second and most important, after a weld failed to meet the inspection, the added cost of repair was the same to Respondent whether or not the flaw could be observed. In other words, Respondent incurred double labor costs when a weld was rejected whether or not the flaw was visible after grinding. I find insufficient basis to conclude that X-Ray, Inc. or McConnell intentionally inflated the rejection rates of the welders in this manner.

The termination of pipewelder Dennis Carney deserves special mention. Carney had only one error in four welds and that error was during the first 18 shop welds that were deleted because of a design change. McConnell admitted that a welder's first two welds were x-rayed and if there were any errors his next four welds would be X-rayed. McConnell admitted that Respondent deviated from its own procedure in not allowing Carney to have more welds X-rayed. McConnell admitted that Carney was a good pipewelder. In fact, Carney had only four welds because he was assigned by supervision to repair the welds of other employees. Although Carney's rejection rate was 25 percent, it would have been zero if calculated correctly. It should have been clear to McConnell and Stewart that Carney did not have a sufficient number of welds tested and that Carney was not given the same opportunity as other employees to establish his abilities before being terminated.

F. Analysis

1. The hiring practices

The General Counsel and Union contend that Respondent violated the Act by screening job applicants in order to eliminate possible supporters of the Union. The job applications submitted in evidence tend to support that argument. Applicants who had previously been employed by unionized firms had that fact highlighted on their job applications. Hansen had been instructed that Respondent was an open shop or nonunion and that it intended to remain as such. She was told to be careful in hiring union employees. No legitimate business justification was advanced for the notation of an applicant's past affiliation with a unionized employer. The only inference to be drawn from the highlighting of an employee's past association with a union or a business associated with a union is that Respondent considered such affiliation or sympathy in making employment decisions. Legal counsel told Hansen that it was unlawful to mark an application by referring to the past union affiliation but Hansen was not instructed to refrain from making any remarks elsewhere or from commenting on an employee's union sympathies. Thus, Hansen gave employees her "open shop" speech and then memorialized their responses regarding unions and picket lines. Again, no lawful explanation for making such notations was ever offered.

Hansen's remarks on the application of an employee, "Are these previous employers union? If so we aren't interested" is a stunning admission of an intent to discriminate against employees with a history of union representation or affiliation. No actual union membership or activities were required, the mere employment with "union employers" was sufficient to preclude employment by Respondent. How many other applicants were so completely denied opportunity for employment is known only to Respondent and its agents.

[14] As indicated earlier, Emerson, Thomas, and Babcock, the three welders that survived the November 20 discharge, were then paid $1.90 per hour less than the new hires from out of State.

Hansen's statement to applicant Claassen that Respondent would move from Coos Bay if the employees voted to organize is further evidence that Respondent intended to ensure that it would remain open shop. Hansen's falsification regarding the failure to hire applicant Sandine supports an inference that Respondent had an unlawful motive for the refusal to hire. See, e.g., Keller Mfg. Co., 237 NLRB 712, 716 (1978); Party Cookies, Inc., 237 NLRB 612, 623 (1978). See also Shattuck Denn Mining Corp. v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 466, 470 (9th Cir. 1966). Here, I draw the inference that Respondent's motive in not hiring Sandine—a motive that Respondent wished to conceal—was the unlawful motive of avoiding hiring union sympathizers. Hansen knew that Sandine was a long-time employee of Chambers Plumbing, a union contractor. Surrounding circumstances lead to the inference that this unlawful motive was not confined to Sandine but affected Respondent's hiring practices with regard to other pipewelders and pipefitters.

Hansen's deliverance of her open-shop speech and memorialization of the employees' reaction or comments constitute further evidence that Respondent intended to screen out applicants who tended to sympathize with unions. Based on the applicants' willingness to supply negative information about unions, it seems clear that the applicants sensed that Respondent intended to remain open shop or nonunion and that comments negative to unions would enhance an applicant's chance of hire.

Subsequent to the filing of the petition, Respondent began hiring pipefitters and pipewelders from out of state. The timing of these events is an important factor in determining whether Respondent was motivated by its desire to avoid hiring union sympathizers. Second, the hiring of these out-of-state employees was against Respondent's self-interest.[15] This labor was more expensive. Respondent paid travel expenses and a wage rate of $1.90 per hour in excess of what it had been paying to pipewelders hired locally but who had been referred by the Union.

The Board stated in Big E's Foodland, 242 NLRB 963, 968 (1979); Hoboken Shipyards, 275 NLRB 1507 (1985):

> Essentially, the elements of a discriminatory refusal-to-hire case are the employment application by each alleged discriminatee, the refusal to hire each, a showing that each was or might be expected to be a union supporter or sympathizer, and further showings that the employee knew or suspected such sympathy or support, maintained an animus against it, and refused to hire the applicant because of such animus.

For the reasons expressed above, I find that the Union and the General Counsel have established a prima facie case that Respondent unlawfully failed to consider for employment applicants whom the employer suspected possessed union sympathies or union affiliation, even if such sympathy or affiliation was only established by past employment with a unionized employer. Alexander's Restaurant & Lounge, 228 NLRB 165 (1977). Once the prima facie case has been found, an unfair labor practice is established unless the employer is able to demonstrate, as an affirmative defense, that the same conduct would have taken place absent the discriminatory motive. NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393, 399–403 (1983).

In response, Respondent offered its main defense that Hansen was neither a supervisor nor agent but simply a low-level employee who only performed a ministerial function in the hiring process. To this end, Hansen testified that she was not personnel manager but simply employed in the personnel office. However, during her employment with Respondent, she utilized business cards furnished by Respondent which described Hansen as a personnel manager. Although the testimony regarding Hansen's hiring is vague, no higher official of Respondent having offered any testimony regarding Hansen's duties or authority, it appears that Hansen was hired to screen applicants for the supervisors such as McConnell and Stewart. According to McConnell, Hansen did not understand the type of experience that Respondent required. In this regard, McConnell testified that applicants with some welding experience were considered good prospects by Hansen but, in fact, this welding experience was not the highly skilled experience McConnell required for his pipewelders. Although this evidence convinces me that many of the applicants may not have been qualified for the pipewelding positions, it does not counter the evidence indicating that a qualified applicant, with previous employment with union contractors, would not get past Hansen in the hiring process and, therefore, would not be hired. In fact, Gerald Smith in Houston made sure that qualified applicants did not get past Hansen or McConnell, by hiring out-of-state nonunion applicants and sending them to the job without any input by McConnell or other supervisors.

Hansen's comments concerning an employee's past employers and his or her reaction to Hansen's open-shop speech appear to be her major job function. If the supervisors were not concerned with Hansen's comments or recommendations, what purpose did she serve? Why have Hansen interview job applicants if her comments were ignored and she did not know what type of experience Respondent required?

Respondent's attorney was aware as early as November of Hansen's activities in designating applicants' past employers as union or open-shop businesses. The attorney took no steps calculated to stop Hansen from indicating an employee's union sympathies. Thus, she was told it was unlawful to write on an application that a past employer was a union firm. She was not discouraged, apparently, from making such notations elsewhere or from soliciting employees' views toward unions by utilizing her open-shop speech and open-ended questions.[16] I find Respondent was fully aware of Hansen's attempts to learn of an employee's past employment with union firms and the employee's union sympathies and that Respondent took no action to stop it. Rather, Respondent desired such action for that was a major reason why Ballard hired Hansen in the first place.

[15] See Madison South Convalescent Center, 260 NLRB 816, 831 (1982).

[16] As indicated earlier, only Hansen testified regarding these instructions. The attorney, while present, did not testify.

With respect to hiring, Hansen apparently hired her own secretary. From this record, it cannot be found that Hansen made any other effective recommendation for hiring. However, as mentioned earlier Hansen effectively screened employees, such as Claassen, Clemens, Sandine, and Nash, from any opportunity for hire. Hansen had an office that was designated as the personnel office and Respondent's personnel records were maintained in Hansen's office.

Therefore, in the circumstances presented in the instant case, I find no merit in Respondent's argument that Hansen was simply a low-level employee whose comments did not affect its hiring process. I find irrelevant the question of whether Hansen was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Rather, I see the issue to be whether under common law agency principles, Hansen was an agent for whose conduct Respondent can be held liable. Hansen was employed by Respondent to perform services in its personnel office and her performance was under Respondent's control. Respondent either directed Hansen to take the unlawful action or, at the very least, took no steps, after learning of her conduct, to prohibit her from engaging in that conduct. Thus, I find that Hansen's conduct was authorized or ratified by Respondent. Moreover, the conduct was performed in furtherance of Respondent's objective to remain an open shop. Thus, I find no basis for Respondent to avoid liability for its agent's misconduct, supervisors or not, performed in the furtherance of Respondent's policy to remain open shop, particularly where Respondent authorized or ratified such conduct.

I am not persuaded by Respondent's argument that Supervisors McConnell and Stewart did not share Ballard's and Hansen's animus toward unions. Where, as here, a hiring decision adopts the tainted recommendation of a subordinate official who harbors antiunion animus, her supervisors will not be heard to argue that their decision was free of discriminatory intent. "To rule otherwise would provide a simple means for evading the Act by a division of corporate personnel functions." Allegheny Pepsi-Cola Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 312 F.2d 529, 531 (3d Cir. 1962). Accord: JMC Transport v. NLRB, 776 F.2d 612, 619 fn. 6 (6th Cir. 1985); Boston Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. NLRB, 692 F.2d 169, 171 (1st Cir. 1982). Moreover, unfair labor practices here were not the rogue actions of Hansen as argued by Respondent. Rather, Hansen was acting pursuant to the open-shop policy of Respondent with the aid and acquiescence of Ballard, Smith, and Respondent's attorney. Moreover, Superintendents McConnell, Stewart, and Lutes were well aware of Respondent's open-shop policy and Hansen's highlighting of employees' union affiliation. To believe that these supervisors ignored such matters when reviewing job applications requires a degree of naivete, which I cannot reach. McConnell's affirmations of good faith are insufficient to dispel the strong case of systematic discrimination.

Respondent correctly asserts that there were many more applicants than there were available jobs. Hansen was instructed to do a great deal of interviewing in anticipation that Respondent would acquire work in addition to that of ARCO-Alaska at the Coos Bay facility. Unfortunately, most, if not all, of its anticipated work did not come to fruition. According to Respondent, as a result of the mass of applicants and applications, it is possible that a qualified applicant like Claassen or Clemens would "fall through the cracks" without any malevolence on the part of Respondent. Although Respondent's argument is logical, the evidence establishes that Respondent intentionally sought to exclude applicants on the basis of prior employment with union businesses and that Respondent particularly sought to discriminate with respect to jobs in the pipefitting and pipewelding categories.

Although vacancies did not exist for all the employees excluded on the basis of suspected union sympathies, I find that to be no defense to a violation. See Alexander's Restaurant & Lounge, supra; Madison South Convalescent Hospital, supra. As the Board stated in Shawnee Industries, 140 NLRB 1451 1452–1453 (1963), enf. denied on other grounds 333 F.2d 221 (10th Cir. 1969):

> Under the Act an employer must consider a request for employment in a lawful, nondiscriminatory manner, and the question whether an application has been given such consideration does not depend on the availability of a job at the time an application for employment is made. Consequently, the Act is violated when an employer fails to consider an application for employment for reasons proscribed by the Act and the question of job availability is relevant only with respect to the employer's backpay obligation.

Therefore, "final determination of job availability and possible backpay liability will be properly left to compliance." Apex Ventilating Co., 186 NLRB 534 fn. 1 (1970).

Next, Respondent contends that statistically its hiring records show that employees with a past history of employment with union firms had just as good a chance, if not a better chance, of employment than applicants with a history of nonunion employment. The fact that Respondent did not discriminate against all applicants does not bar a finding of a violation. Nachman Corp. v. NLRB, 337 F.2d 421, 424 (7th Cir. 1964); NLRB v. W. C. Nabors Co., 196 F.2d 272, 276 (5th Cir. 1952), cert. denied 344 U.S. 865 (1952).

Statistics are competent in proving employment discrimination, Teamsters v. U.S., 431 U.S. 324, 339–340 (1977). However, statistics are not irrefutable; they come in infinite variety and, like any other kind of evidence, they may be rebutted. In short, the usefulness depends on all the surrounding facts and circumstances. Id. at 340; see, e.g., Hester v. Southern Railway Co., 497 F.2d 1374, 1379–1381 (5th Cir. 1974). The statistics utilized by Respondent list as applicants with union background persons who posed no threat to Respondent's open-shop operation. For example, persons listed included supervisors for union companies, employees for a company that later went nonunion, employees who worked only a short time for a union employer, nonbargaining unit employees, employees who worked for a company that is now union but was nonunion at the time of the employment, employees of a union company that closed, and employees who were members of industrial unions rather than a craft or construction union. Moreover, Respondent's statistics made no distinction between employers likely to be sympathetic to the Charging Party and those that would not. However, in hiring after the petition was filed, Respondent hired no employees in the pipefitter and pipewelding job categories who revealed a union background of any kind. Prior to the filing of its petition and Hansen's screening procedures, 12 of the 13 employees hired in these categories had a union background. In any event, Respondent's argument does not rebut the main indicia of the discrimination, the highlighting of an employee's past association with an employer that had a union agreement.

Respondent's conduct with respect to the pipefitters and pipewelders, after the filing of the petition, clearly establishes a pattern of discrimination. Respondent unlawfully laid off employees, unlawfully discharged employees, unlawfully refused to consider qualified applicants with union backgrounds for employment, and unlawfully paid higher wages to nonunion out-of-state applicants. The impact of that conduct was to change the complement of union employees in the unit petitioned for by the Charging Party to a nonunion complement. In the event the Union's position on the smaller bargaining unit was successful in the representation case, it would have been left without its support in the election. When the Employer's position was successful in the representation hearing, the Union had little or no chance to prevail in the election.

The difficulty is whether Respondent's unlawful hiring policy with respect to pipefitters and pipewelders was so widespread as to include all job applicants regardless of positions. Such a determination cannot be made with any degree of certainty from this record. But that ambiguity was caused by Respondent's unlawful hiring practices and, therefore, that ambiguity will not be resolved in Respondent's favor. Based on the record before me, I can do nothing other than to defer the difficult remedial questions of the identity of the discriminatees and the backpay due them to the compliance stage of the proceeding. Reinstatement is not an issue as there was no facility in operation at the time of the instant trial. It appears the discriminatees would have been laid off, in any event, at the completion of Respondent's project for ARCO-Alaska.

In sum, I conclude that Respondent has failed to rebut the Union's and the General Counsel's prima facie case that Respondent discriminated against suspected union sympathizers by attempting to identify union sympathizers and by failing to consider for employment suspected union sympathizers. Respondent has failed to establish that the same hiring would have taken place even in the absence of such unlawful motive. I leave to the compliance stage the establishment of the identity of the particular discriminatees and the related questions of backpay.

2. The hiring of the out-of-state, nonunion employees and the payment of higher wages

As discussed earlier, concurrent with the unlawful practice of not considering for employment pipefitters and pipewelders with a past history of employment with union businesses, Respondent hired out-of-state employees, with a history of working for nonunion businesses, at a wage rate of $1.90 per hour higher than its established wage rate.

A wage schedule was backdated in November or December in an apparent attempt to justify the higher wage rate. I give no credence to McConnell's testimony that the higher wage rate was based on merit because employees performing well were not given the wage rate while new hires were given the merit increase before they could prove themselves meritorious.

Gerald Smith, apparently the agent of Respondent who could supply the justification, if any, of the out-of-state hiring and the higher wage scale, did not testify. This is particularly significant as such hiring was suspiciously timed and was contrary to Respondent's self-interest. Moreover, the failure of Smith to testify can lead to an inference that his testimony would be adverse to Respondent. See Madison South Convalescent Hospital, supra, 260 NLRB at 828 fn. 4; Martin Luther King, Sr. Nursing Center, 231 NLRB 15 fn. 1 (1977). Here, I draw the inference that Smith did not testify because there was no legitimate business justification for the hiring of the out-of-state workers at a premium rate. The only conclusion to be drawn is that Respondent's desire not to hire union sympathizers in the pipefitting and pipewelding categories was so strong that it was willing to pay an additional $1.90 per hour to avoid such hiring.[17]

I further find that Respondent unlawfully discriminated against pipewelders Emerson, Thomas, and Babcock in paying the $1.90 per hour less than the nonunion welders from the time of the hire of the first welders at the higher wage rate until the date of their termination of employment. However, as discussed in more detail, infra, I do not find Emerson, Babcock, and Thomas to have been constructively discharged as alleged in the complaint.

3. The alleged constructive discharges

The Board has held that a constructive discharge is established when it is shown that (1) the employer established burdensome working conditions sufficient to cause the employee to resign and (2) the burden was imposed on the employee because of his union activities. Crystal Princeton Refining Co., 222 NLRB 1068, 1069 (1976); Algreco Sportswear Co., 271 NLRB 499, 500 (1984).

In Algreco Sportswear, an employee quit because she was discriminatorily receiving the lowest of three wage rates.[18] Although the Board found that the wage rate paid to the employee was discriminatory, it refused to find that the burden imposed by Algreco was so intolerable as to force her resignation. "The test is of necessity, an objective one, taking into account the circumstances of each case. The mere existence of discrimination is insufficient to warrant consideration of abandonment of employment as constructive discharge." 271 NLRB at 500. See also Van Pelt Fire Trucks, 238 NLRB 794 (1978).

[17] In addition, Respondent paid travel costs to the nonunion out-of-state workers.

[18] The employee was not receiving a reduction in wages but receiving less than she was entitled to under a newly implemented system.

Based on the Board's holding in Algreco Sportswear, there can be no finding of a constructive discharge here. The employees, although discriminatorily receiving a lower wage than the new out-of-state hires, were offered the new higher wage rate retroactive to the beginning of that week. Thus, the only burden here was the failure to give the retroactive pay to the time of the hiring of the first out-of-state welder. Thus, as in Algreco Sportswear there is discriminatory intent but the burden imposed by the Respondent was not so "difficult and unpleasant" as to force the three welders to resign. Respondent's offer to raise the welders' wages to the level of the out-of-state workers precludes a finding of a constructive discharge. Rather, I am required to find that the three employees voluntarily quit their employment and are not entitled to reinstatement or backpay as a result of their quitting. That, of course, does not preclude a remedy for the period of time when the three welders were discriminatorily receiving $1.90 per hour less than the rate paid to the nonunion out-of-state welders.

4. The alleged unlawful layoffs

A difficult question is presented by the allegation of unlawful offs in October and November 1984. The General Counsel and the Union have established a prima facie case. After the filing of the petition, Respondent laid off employees because of an alleged shortage of materials. The record demonstrates Respondent's animus against union sympathizers and its strong desire to remain nonunion. Further, if Respondent was willing to discriminate in regard to hire and wages against union sympathizers, there is no reason to believe it would not discriminate with regard to laying off or firing employees because of union sympathies. Finally, the testimony of Lelong established that Respondent could continue to operate in the absence of some materials and in the absence of certification of materials. The testimony of the welders revealed that there was still welding that could be done. Most importantly, Lelong testified that Ballard, at the time Respondent's highest ranking official, admitted that a material shortage was not the real reason for the layoffs. Based on these facts and the other concurrent unfair labor practices, I find that a prima facie case has been established and that the burden shifts to Respondent to establish that the same action would have taken place in the absence of protected conduct.

In response, Respondent contends that the layoffs were necessitated by material shortages, lack of certifications, and lack of isometric drawings. Respondent offered documentary evidence indicating late shipment of materials. Further, Respondent's records revealed that materials had been received without the proper certification and that the certifications had been delayed.

The testimony of Willie Tow, a laborer, and Thomas Walters, a material handler and Lelong's assistant, both of whom I credit, established that there was in fact a shortage of materials and delay in receipt of the material certifications. However, I find that the testimony of Tow and Walters insufficient to rebut Lelong's testimony that Respondent could have reassigned employees and continued operations with the materials on hand. The testimony of the welders that they still had assignments to perform was not rebutted by either Tow or Walters. Further, Lelong's testimony that Respondent could perform work while awaiting the certifications was not rebutted. Walters testified that Respondent encountered a problem with such a procedure. However, the events to which Walters referred did not occur until sometime after the layoffs in question and could not have entered into Respondent's thinking.

Although McConnell testified that Respondent had a material shortage at the time of the layoffs, he did not credibly rebut Lelong's testimony. McConnell apparently overreached himself in testifying regarding the handling of materials. In one important respect, McConnell's testimony gave credence to that of Lelong. McConnell admitted that he had no advance knowledge of the layoffs and that he was not involved in the decision to lay off employees. Certainly, in a legitimate layoff McConnell would have been given notice and would have determined which employees to lay off and which to retain. In my view, that buttresses a finding that the layoffs were not in the ordinary course of business but, rather as Lelong testified, for another reason known only to Ballard. All the circumstantial evidence indicates that the reason was Respondent's desire to remain a nonunion shop.

Respondent must show by a preponderance of the evidence that it would have engaged in this same conduct even in the absence of its unlawful motive. I conclude that Respondent has not met its burden. Respondent has shown that reasons for layoffs may have existed, but Respondent has not established that it would not have attempted to operate by reassigning employees and by using materials conditioned on receipt of certification had Respondent not been consumed with a course of conduct designed to remain open shop.

5. The alleged unlawful terminations

During the layoffs, Respondent terminated and did not recall from layoff nine pipewelders allegedly because their rate of rejection on welds was too high. The terminations took place after Respondent learned, during the representation proceeding, that its welders were union members or at least union sympathizers. Based on the timing of the terminations, Respondent's knowledge of the pipewelders' union affiliation, the concurrent unfair labor practices, Respondent's animus toward the Union, and its desire to remain open shop, I find that the Union and the General Counsel have established a prima facie case of discrimination.

The record reveals that pursuant to its agreement with ARCO-Alaska Respondent was obligated to have the welds tested by X-Ray, Inc. As indicated earlier, I find that the testing and the procedures of X-Ray, Inc. were nondiscriminatory. Further, I find that there was no discrimination in the documents generated by X-Ray that were later used by McConnell and Stewart in terminating employees because of a high rate of rejection. Thus, I believe that Respondent can establish that a welder would have been discharged, absent his union sympathy, if his rate of rejection was in excess of 20 percent. However, I find Respondent has not satisfied that burden with respect to employee Dennis Carney. Carney was assigned, after only three or four welds, to repair the welds of other employees. He was so chosen because he had demonstrated superior skill. McConnell admitted that Carney was a good welder and that Respondent deviated from its own procedure in not allowing Carney further opportunity to weld before terminating him. Thus, with respect to Dennis Carney, I find Respondent has not rebutted the prima facie case but rather has shown that absent his union sympathies Carney would not have been terminated. I conclude, therefore, that Respondent terminated Carney because of his suspected union membership in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

As mentioned earlier, I find no unlawful motivation in McConnell's and Stewart's use of the documents prepared by X-Ray, Inc., nor is the fact that two employees were charged for the same error. I do not find that McConnell was aware of such an error but rather that he legitimately relied on X-Ray's document. However, I do not draw the same conclusion regarding the utilization of the first 18 welds in calculating an employee's rate of rejection. From the face of X-Ray's document, it is clear that the first 18 welds should not be counted. Thus, for each of the eight welders at issue, I calculated the proper rejection rate based on X-Ray's documents. Using a proper calculation, I found that two other alleged discriminatees would have had a rejection rate of less than 20 percent. I find that these two welders, Jorge Elizalde and Leonard Paloma, would not have been disqualified from further pipewelding assignments absent union considerations. However, there are six pipewelders that because of their rate of rejections, I find would have been discharged even absent union considerations.

6. The representation case

The unfair labor practices found above, occurring during the pendency of the representation petition, are more than sufficient to set aside the election. Therefore, I shall recommend that the Board set aside the election and remand the case to the Regional Director for further proceedings. As Respondent had no Coos Bay facility and no employees in Oregon, at the time of the instant hearing, I do not recommend a second election. In any event, on remand, the Regional Director can take whatever further action is proper.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent, KRI Constructors, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry, Local No. 51 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By engaging in a pattern or practice of screening job applicants to determine suspected union sympathizers and refusing to consider applicants for employment based on previous employment with union businesses or for other suspected union sympathies, Respondent discriminated in regard to hire in order to discourage union membership in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

4. By hiring out-of-state, nonunion employees in order to avoid hiring union sympathizers, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. By paying out-of-state, nonunion employees higher wage rates and discriminating against suspected union sympathizers regarding wages, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

6. By laying off employees in October and November 1984 in order to discourage union membership or support, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

7. By terminating employees Dennis Carney, Leonard Paloma, and Jorge Elizalde in November 1984 because of union membership or activities, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

8. The evidence does not establish that Respondent constructively discharged employees Terry Emerson, Thomas Babcock, and Eugene Thomas in violation of the Act.

9. The unfair labor practices found above are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

10. Respondent did not otherwise engage in the unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and that it take certain affirmative action set forth below to effectuate the policies of the Act.

It having been found that Respondent unlawfully discriminated against job applicants based on their suspected union sympathies, it will be recommended that Respondent make such employees whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the failure to give them nondiscriminatory consideration for employment, less net earning during the period of such backpay accrual. Employees Dennis Carney, Jorge Elizalde, and Leonard Paloma will also be entitled to be made whole by reason of the discrimination against them. Backpay in all cases is to be computed on a quarterly basis making deductions for interim earnings, F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and with interest to be provided in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977); see generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

Terry Emerson, Thomas Babcock, and Eugene Thomas shall be made whole for the failure to pay them the higher wage rates paid to nonunion welders from the date of the hire of the first welders at the higher rate until the date when the three employees quit their employment, with interest.

I shall further include a visitatorial provision permitting General Counsel to obtain discovery in the United States court of appeals regarding compliance with this recommended Order. I find that such a visitatorial clause is necessitated by the numerous difficult compliance problems involved herein. See Hilton Inn North, 279 NLRB 45 fn. 3 (1986).

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On May 22, 1986,[1] the National Labor Relations Board issued its Decision and Order in this proceeding finding that the Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act when it took certain actions that amounted to an arbitrary refusal to process David O'Neill's grievance.[2] On June 23 the Respondent filed a petition for review with the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. The General Counsel filed a cross-application for enforcement on July 28. Subsequently, the Board requested the Third Circuit to remand the case to permit the Board to reconsider its ruling in light of an intervening decision by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.[3] The Third Circuit Court of Appeals granted the Board's request and remanded the case on November 17. On December 10 the Board advised the parties that they might file statements of position regarding the issues under reconsideration. The General Counsel and the Respondent filed statements of position.

In our prior decision, after finding that the Respondent had breached its duty of fair representation by arbitrarily refusing to process O'Neill's grievance in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A), we ordered the Respondent to remedy its statutory violation by requesting the Employer, Mack-Wayne Closures, to reinstate O'Neill to his former position and, if the Employer refused to do so, to promptly pursue the remaining stages of the grievance procedure, including arbitration, in good faith with all due diligence.[4] In the event that it was not possible for the Respondent to pursue the remaining stages of the grievance procedure for any procedural or substantive reason, we ordered the Respondent to make whole O'Neill for any loss of pay he may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's unlawful conduct. We explained that this latter make-whole provision, a provisional or conditional make-whole remedy, was necessary in order to restore the status quo, remedy the injury, and deter the wrongdoer. Acknowledging that the merits of O'Neill's grievance were not certain, we, nevertheless, found that placing the risk of this uncertainty on the wrongdoer was consistent with fundamental equitable principles and longstanding Board precedent.[5]

After we issued our decision in Mack-Wayne I, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit denied enforcement of a Board order containing a similar provisional make-whole remedy. San Francisco Pressmen v. NLRB, supra. In rejecting the provisional make-whole remedy ordered in that case, the Ninth Circuit relied on certain decisions of the United States Supreme Court in Section 301 contract cases,[6] which require a plaintiff to prove, in order to prevail in a civil action against the union, both that the union breached its duty of fair representation and that the action the employer took against the employee was in breach of the contract. The Ninth Circuit noted that two other circuits had also rejected the Board's make-whole remedy[7] and the court stated that the Board in Glass Bottle Blowers Assn. (Owens-Illinois, Inc.), 240 NLRB 324 (1979), had applied the rule that the court endorsed. The Ninth Circuit analogized duty of fair representation cases to cases involving attorney malpractice liability, where the plaintiff must establish both that the duty was breached and that the underlying case could have been won. Thus, the court held that the "[e]mployees must show both a wrongful discharge by the Employer and a breach of duty by the Union to collect backpay from the Union." 794 F.2d at 423–424.

We have reconsidered our decision in Mack-Wayne I in light of the Ninth Circuit's decision in San Francisco Pressmen v. NLRB, supra, the decisions of other circuits, the General Counsel's and the Respondent's statements of position in this case, and the Board's experience with the duty of fair representation doctrine as developed in Miranda Fuel [8] and its progeny. We find that the Board's provisional make-whole remedy as set out in Mack-Wayne I effectuates the policies and administration of the Act and we will adhere to that remedy, as modified below. In so doing, we find it necessary to summarize our approach to this issue and our rationale in detail. Further, to ensure that a union that is alleged to have breached its duty of fair representation is not presented with an inequitable "Hobson's Choice," as described below, we shall modify our procedural application of the provisional make-whole remedy to allow the union, at its election, to litigate the merits of the grievance at the underlying unfair labor practice hearing or to defer the issue to the compliance stage.

I. THE PROVISIONAL MAKE-WHOLE REMEDY

In Miranda Fuel, supra, the Board adopted the view that a union's breach of its duty of fair representation constituted a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A). We reasoned that the union's statutory obligation under Section 9(a) to fairly and impartially represent all employees gave rise to a corresponding employee Section 7 right to fair representation by the union.[9] Since our Miranda Fuel decision, we have consistently found that a union's arbitrary failure or refusal to process an employee's grievance, or a union's processing of a grievance in a perfunctory manner, violates the union's duty of fair representation and Section 8(b)(1)(A). Having identified the union's unlawful conduct, we have fashioned appropriate remedies in the context of the specific case before us in order to remedy the unfair labor practice. These remedies have been approved by the courts.[10] Thus, in addition to our usual cease-and-desist order and notice posting requirement, we have required the offending union to request the employer to consider reinstating the grievant or to consider the grievance on the merits, to take the grievance to arbitration pursuant to the applicable bargaining agreement,[11] and (if necessary) to file a Section 301 action to compel arbitration.[12] We have also required the union to permit the affected employee to be represented by counsel of his or her own choice at any grievance proceeding and to reimburse the employee the reasonable fees of counsel.[13]

These remedial provisions share a common objective. They are all designed to restore the parties to their preunfair labor practice posture to the maximum extent possible. They are intended to hold the union to the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement that it negotiated with the employer and to permit the employee to have his or her grievance resolved on its merits pursuant to the negotiated grievance procedure. In cases, however, where the employer is not before the Board as a party and resolution of the grievance pursuant to the agreed-on procedure becomes impossible, then we have concluded that the union must make the employee whole or the employee will be left without an adequate remedy for the union's unlawful refusal to process the grievance.

Prior to ordering a provisional make-whole remedy, however, we have either explicitly or implicitly required an affirmative showing of a nexus between the unfair labor practice and the make-whole remedy. See Mack-Wayne I, supra at 1074 fn. 3. Some of our prior decisions speak of this nexus in terms of the employee's grievance not being "clearly frivolous."[14] Although other decisions have not specifically discussed the "merits" of the grievance, analysis of those decisions reveals that an initial showing of some merit has been a consistent (albeit implicit) prerequisite to a make-whole remedy.[15] When we have found that a union breached its duty of fair representation by failing to process a grievance but that the employee's grievance was, nevertheless, without merit, we have refused to order a make-whole remedy.[16]

The requirement that the employee's grievance not be "clearly frivolous" can be considered as the General Counsel's burden of proving a nexus between the unfair labor practice and the provisional make-whole remedy. Of course, the General Counsel may elect to forgo the provisional make-whole remedy and seek the traditional cease-and-desist order, posted notice, and other remedies. The General Counsel is not required to show that the grievance was not "clearly frivolous" in order to establish the appropriateness of those remedies. By establishing that the employee's grievance is not "clearly frivolous," however, the General Counsel has shown that some damage or injury flows from the union's unfair labor practice, if only the loss of the employee's right to "test" the employer's case. Having shown that some injury flows from the union's statutory violation, we have allowed the union to come forward with proof that its conduct did not ultimately "cause" any further injury by establishing that the employee's grievance was not meritorious.[17] In practical effect, the burden of proof regarding the merit (or lack of merit) of the employee's not "clearly frivolous" grievance shifts to the wrongdoing union.

We believe that the union should bear this shifted burden of proof. Admittedly, absent a determination on the merits pursuant to the agreed-on procedure, the outcome of the employee's grievance cannot be certain. This uncertainty, however, is due directly to the fact that the union violated its statutory duty. In keeping with traditional equitable principles that the wrongdoer shall bear the risk of any uncertainty arising from its actions,[18] the union must bear the ultimate risk of any uncertainty regarding the "merits" of the grievance.

Strong policy considerations support this view, especially in the context of an employee's discharge grievance, a grievance as the one we deal with here. As we have noted, part of the injury that an employee suffers when his or her union unlawfully refuses to process a grievance is the denial of the opportunity for a fair hearing; the right to challenge the employer's decision; and the right to argue that, even if the employer had "just cause" for discharge, mitigating circumstances support a reduced penalty.[19]

In a disciplinary arbitration proceeding, the burden of establishing the propriety of the employment decision will generally be on the employer.[20] Where, as here, the Union caused the grievance process to malfunction, a union should assume this burden, the burden of establishing that the employee's grievance would have been denied or that the discharge was justified. If the Board were to impose on the General Counsel the burden of proving that the employee would have won the grievance, then the employee would be deprived of a significant procedural and tactical advantage available to him in the grievance process, the right to sit back and force the employer to "make its case." To permit the employee to be deprived of this advantage solely as a result of the union's wrongful conduct conflicts with our congressional mandate to effectuate the policies of the Act and remedy the union's unfair labor practice.

It is important to stress that the Board does not impose a punitive remedy here,[21] nor do we establish an irrebuttable presumption of merit or a per se entitlement to backpay. The Board takes an exceedingly small step by placing the ultimate burden of proof regarding the merits of a grievance on the union. Only in those cases where a union has been unable to secure consideration of a not "clearly frivolous" grievance whose merits are uncertain will this allocation of proof have any effect on the outcome of the case. In these limited circumstances, it is appropriate for any uncertainty to fall on the wrongdoer and not the innocent victim.

In general civil litigation, the burden of establishing a particular matter will often be placed on the party with special knowledge regarding that matter.[22] As between the General Counsel and the union, the union obviously has more particular knowledge regarding the merits of the underlying grievance than does the General Counsel. The union, not the General Counsel, has a continuing collective-bargaining relationship with the employer. Thus, the union, not the General Counsel, has direct knowledge of the "common law of the shop," the parties' past practice, the bargaining history of the contract, the location and availability of witnesses and evidence, and the particular facts of the relevant grievance. Finally, the union, not the General Counsel, is aware of the particular needs of the employer and whether those needs might themselves mitigate against discharge of the employee.[23]

We have already concluded that the Union's unfair labor practice has resulted in some injury; the grievance process has malfunctioned as a result of the Union's unlawful conduct. Thus, we are here concerned with the scope or "amount" of injury.

[19] This "mitigation" consideration is particularly relevant in this case since O'Neill was a toolmaker for the Employer and toolmakers were apparently in short supply. In fact, the record shows that it was only when Shop Steward Ferry attempted to make this very argument to the Employer that Union President Huther interrupted, "lost his cool," and stated that they were there "to fire the guy."

In Carpenters, the Supreme Court held that, in order to require the union to reimburse dues and fees collected pursuant to an illegal agency shop clause, the General Counsel must establish that a union's membership was induced to pay fees and dues they would not otherwise have paid if not for the illegal agency shop clause. Here, however, it is clear that but for the Union's violation of its duty of fair representation O'Neill's grievance would have been heard on its merits.

Continued

Shifting the burden of proof regarding the merits of the grievance from the General Counsel to the wrongdoer when required by public policy is not without precedent under the Act or other employment-related Federal statutes. Once the General Counsel has established a prima facie case that an employer has discharged or refused to hire an individual based on illegal considerations, the burden of proof shifts to the employer to establish that the discriminatee would have been fired or would not have been hired for legitimate reasons in the absence of the illegal motivation.[24] A civil plaintiff and defendant have analogous burdens of proof in Title VII proceedings as well.[25]

We are cognizant of conflicting courts of appeals' decisions on this matter.[26] Representative of decisions contrary to our approach is the decision of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco Pressmen, supra. The Ninth Circuit suggested that the burden of proof in duty of fair representation cases under the Act should follow the rule in attorney malpractice cases. San Francisco Pressmen, supra at 425 fn. 11. A plaintiff in such a case must show not only that there was a breach of duty, but also that the claim otherwise could have prevailed. We find, however, that the special character of the grievance-arbitration process, where the employee is in effect "presumed" to be "innocent,"[27] distinguishes duty of fair representation proceedings from attorney malpractice actions. In an attorney malpractice case, the plaintiff has the additional burden of proving that the underlying claim was meritorious because, in the absence of the attorney's malpractice, the plaintiff would still have had to prove the merits of the underlying claim.[28]

Contrary to certain courts, we also think that it is inappropriate to rely on cases decided under Section 301 for the proposition that the General Counsel must bear the burden of proof concerning the merits of the underlying grievance. Even though Section 301 cases may involve a corresponding duty of fair representation claim against the union, the underlying claim, a breach of contract claim, remains the essence of the Section 301 suit. A typical breach of contract action does not present any compelling policy reasons to justify altering traditional common law burdens of proof. Significantly different policy considerations come into play where, as here, the Board has been charged with advancing what Congress has "declared to be the policy of the United States." NLRA Section 1. Since we established that a breach of a union's duty of fair representation was an unfair labor practice, we have applied to the judicially created duty of fair representation doctrine our own unique institutional and policy consideration. We find that shifting the burden of proof from the General Counsel to the union is required to administer our resources, comply with our congressional mandate, and give a meaningful remedy in duty of fair representation cases.[29]

To summarize, we hold that in an 8(b)(1)(A) case where the union has breached its duty of fair representation with regard to the processing of an em-only shifting the burden regarding establishing the appropriateness or inappropriateness of a provisional backpay remedy. Compare Aqua-Chem, Inc., 288 NLRB 1108 (1988) (where a Board majority, Member Johansen dissenting, rejected the view that the respondent's initially superior knowledge of the relevant facts regarding the unfair labor practice allegations alone justified shifting the burden of proving or disproving a violation of the Act). Member Johansen does not agree with this characterization of Aqua-Chem.

[24] Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). Although Wright Line established an analytical framework for resolving whether an employment decision was motivated by illegal consideration, that approach is analogous to the our approach here because it focused on causation issues, was developed in response to conflicting courts of appeals' decisions, and was in part a "recognition of the practical reality that the employer is the party with best access to proof of its motivation." Id. at 1088.

[25] Day v. Mathews, 530 F.2d 1083 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (once discrimination is shown, the plaintiff is entitled to backpay unless the defendant can prove by clear and convincing evidence that the plaintiff would not have been hired, promoted, etc., even if there had been no discrimination). Significantly, the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals concluded that policy considerations similar to those articulated here mandated this result.

[27] See generally Baer, Discipline & Discharge under the Labor Agreement at 32–33.

[28] Contrary to the Ninth Circuit's indication, the Board in Glass Bottle Blowers Assn. (Owens-Illinois, Inc.), 240 NLRB 324 (1979), did not apply the rule the court ascribes to it. There, the judge ordered the respondent union to pay the charging party and his brother the wages they lost from the period beginning with the abrogation of their operator seniority until there was a fair resolution of their grievance. Thus, the judge ordered the union to make the employees whole even if the union were able to compel the employer to consider the grievance on the merits and the grievance was determined to have been without merit. It was this latter per se backpay award that we rejected when we ruled that to "now" require the union to pay the grievants' back wages "might" be punitive. See 240 NLRB at 325. Nothing in Glass Bottle Blowers compels a contrary result to the one we reach here.

[29] We do not read the Court's decision in DelCostello v. Teamsters, 462 U.S. 151 (1983), as compelling a different result from our decision in this case. In DelCostello, a case involving a private party's claim against a union, the Court was not addressing the same policy concerns that we must address in this case, a case involving a claim by the General Counsel that the Union violated the Act. Although the source of a union's duty of fair representation may be the same in both cases, the judicial and administrative mechanism used to resolve these cases is very different. The former case is governed by court rule and common law. The latter case is governed by our own procedural rules and rules of decision. Interestingly, the Supreme Court in DelCostello expresaly rejected the argument that Sec. 301 duty of fair representation lawsuits were governed by state statutes of limitations governing legal malpractice claims. Inter alia, the court stated that the analogy between legal malpractice claims and claims like the one before us "suffers from objections peculiar to the realities of labor relations and litigation." Id. at 167. As the Supreme Court in DelCostello, we too find that a duty of fair representation claim has "no close analogy in ordinary state law." Id. at 165. Member Johansen additionally notes that the Board's remedial authority is based on Sec. 10(c), not on the contract.

ployee's grievance, the General Counsel has an initial burden of establishing that the employee's grievance was not clearly frivolous in order to be entitled to a provisional make-whole remedy. If the General Counsel establishes that nexus between the union's unlawful conduct and the remedy, the burden of proof shifts to the union to establish that the grievance was not meritorious. We shall apply these rules to all cases where the union violates Section 8(b)(1)(A) by failing to properly process an employee's grievance and, to the extent any of our prior decisions may conflict with this decision, we overruled then to the extent of the inconsistency.

II. PROCEDURAL APPLICATION OF THE SHIFTING BURDEN OF PROOF

Any provisional make-whole remedy we order will only take effect if the union has failed or has attempted and been unable to have the employer consider the grievance on its merits. The primary goal of the Board's order is to return the parties to their preunfair labor practice posture and to have the employee's grievance considered pursuant to the agreed-on procedure. Resolving grievances pursuant to the parties' agreed-on process leads to greater industrial peace and stability. Thus, a provisional make-whole remedy only becomes important if the grievance cannot be resolved pursuant to the agreed-on process.

We recognize, however, that there are circumstances when the union and the employee may be faced with a difficult and inequitable "Hobson's Choice." For example, if the union alleged to have violated its duty of fair representation is attempting to process the grievance while the unfair labor practice hearing is pending, or if there exists a realistic possibility that the employer will consider the grievance on the merits if the union is later ordered to process it, then it may be unfair to the union and the employee for the Board to require the union to attempt to prove in the unfair labor practice case that the grievance lacks merit.[30] In this and similar cases, it seems more appropriate to allow the union to first pursue the grievance and, if it cannot be resolved pursuant to the negotiated procedure, then to argue the merits of the grievance at a subsequent compliance proceeding.[31] On the other hand, if the union has in its possession at the unfair labor practice hearing substantial evidence that the grievance lacks merit, then the union may wish to present that evidence at the unfair labor practice hearing and it makes little sense to force the union to defer the issue to the subsequent compliance stage.

We, therefore, hold that, in the context of this class of cases only,[32] the union should be given the option of litigating the merits of the employee's grievance at either the unfair labor practice hearing or at the subsequent compliance stage. We will not allow the union, however, to litigate this issue twice. Prior to the close of the unfair labor practice hearing, the union must have made an unambiguous election to litigate the merits of the grievance at the unfair labor practice hearing or at the compliance stage.

III. THE INSTANT DISPUTE

Applying the above standards to the instant dispute, we find that the General Counsel has presented sufficient evidence to establish that O'Neill's grievance was not clearly frivolous. O'Neill testified that, at a hearing before the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) in January 1983, the Employer agreed to reduce one of his two written warnings to an oral warning. Accordingly, when O'Neill received a "third" written warning that subjected him to discharge in May 1983, he claimed that he had only two written warnings. Although there is conflicting evidence regarding the Employer's agreement to reduce one of the written warnings to an oral warning, this material fact is in issue, and it demonstrates that O'Neill's grievance was not clearly frivolous.[33]

Having met the initial burden of demonstrating that O'Neill's grievance was not clearly frivolous, the burden of proof shifts to the Respondent to establish that O'Neill's grievance was not meritorious. The Respondent may attempt to prove that O'Neill's grievance lacks merit either at the unfair labor practice hearing or at the compliance stage. In its statement of position, the Respondent points out that it attempted to raise the merits of O'Neill's grievance at the unfair labor practice hearing. Arguably, the Respondent was prevented from fully litigating this issue. Accordingly, we will remand this case to the judge so that the Respondent may elect to litigate the merits of O'Neill's grievance now or at the compliance stage. Should the Respondent elect to litigate the merits issue now, the judge shall convene a hearing for the purpose of [30] See, e.g., Tubari Ltd., 287 NLRB 1273 fn. 8 (1988).

[31] We have recognized this problem in the past and have resolved it by retaining jurisdiction over the case in its unfair labor stage, pending the outcome of the grievance process. See, e.g., Electrical Workers UE Local 485 (Automotive Plating), 170 NLRB 1234 (1968); Groves-Granite, supra. This retention of jurisdiction approach has not proved to be satisfactory.

[32] By "class of cases," we mean complaints alleging a violation of Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) based on the respondent's alleged failure or refusal to properly process an employee's grievance whem the General Counsel is seeking a provisional make-whole remedy.

[33] The record contains other evidence bearing on the written versus oral nature of O'Neill's warnings, but the evidence cited above is sufficient to meet the General Counsel's burden of proof.

taking evidence and, on conclusion of the hearing, the judge shall prepare and serve on the parties a supplemental decision. Should the Respondent elect to litigate the merits issue at the compliance stage, then we will give effect to the remedy ordered in Mack-Wayne I and will order the Respondent to attempt to process O'Neill's grievance.

ORDER

It is ordered that the record in this proceeding is reopened and remanded to Administrative Law Judge Howard Edelman for the purpose of allowing the Union to elect whether to present evidence on the merits of the grievance at a hearing or at a subsequent compliance stage.

If the Union elects to present evidence on the merits of the grievance at the compliance stage, it is further ordered that the remedy and the order provided in Mack-Wayne I shall be given full effect.

If the Union elects to present evidence on the merits of the grievance at this time, Judge Edelman shall convene a further hearing for the purpose of taking evidence in accordance with this decision; and on the hearing's conclusion Judge Edelman shall prepare and serve on the parties a supplemental decision containing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and recommendations. Following service of the supplemental decision on the parties, the provisions of Section 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations shall govern.

MEMBER CRACRAFT, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

Although I agree with my colleagues that this proceeding should be remanded, I disagree with their allocation of the burden of proof on remand. Before assessing backpay liability against the Union, I would require that the General Counsel prove that employee O'Neill's grievance was meritorious.[1]

In order to obtain backpay in a Section 301 failure to fairly represent suit, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to establish that his or her grievance was meritorious. Hines v. Anchor Motor Freight, 424 U.S. 554, 570–571 (1976). This is the burden of proof that I would utilize in 8(b)(1)(A) cases involving breaches of the duty of fair representation.

My placement of the burden of proof is based on a rationale rejected by my colleagues: because the duty of fair representation is a court-created doctrine belatedly incorporated by the Board in Section 8(b)(1)(A),[2] the burden of proof in 8(b)(1)(A) duty of fair representation cases is most appropriately placed in accordance with the burden of proof in Section 301 suits.[3]

Although acknowledging the parallels between the duties of fair representation in Sections 8(b)(1)(A) and 301, my colleagues, nevertheless, reject application of the Section 301 burden of proof placement in 8(b)(1)(A) actions for policy reasons. They note in particular that the essence of a Section 301 action is a breach of contract claim. However, as the Supreme Court noted in Vaca v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171, 181–183 (1967), the duty of fair representation was an essentially court-created doctrine that was implied from Federal labor law and not based merely on contract. In light of the development of the statutory duty of fair representation, I am not persuaded that we are free to place a heavier burden on the union simply because our basis for liability is solely statutory rather than statutory and contractual.[4]

My colleagues further find that the heavier burden of proof is required "in order to administer our resources, comply with our congressional mandate, and give a meaningful remedy in duty of fair representation cases." I disagree with these justifications.

[1] Former Member Dennis also espoused this view in Rubber Workers Local 250 (Mack-Wayne Closures) (Mack-Wayne I), 279 NLRB 1074, 1075–1076 (1986). I agree with her dissent and adopt it.

[2] Vaca v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171, 181–183 (1967).

[3] Indeed, the Supreme Court has relied on the similarities in the duty of fair representation in 301 suits and 8(b)(1)(A) actions in determining the appropriate statute of limitation applicable in a 301 action. DelCostello v. Teamsters, 462 U.S. 151 (1983). "[T]he family resemblance [between the duties of fair representation under Sec 301 and Sec. 8(b)(1)(A)] is undeniable, and indeed there is a substantial overlap. . . . [D]uty of fair representation claims are allegations of unfair, arbitrary, or discriminatory treatment of workers by unions—as are virtually all unfair labor practice charges made by workers against unions. . . . Similarly, it may be the case that alleged violations by an employer of a collective-bargaining agreement will also amount to unfair labor practices." Id. at 170. See also United Parcel Service v. Mitchell, 451 U.S. 56 (1981): "Yet the two claims [in a Sec. 301 suit for breach of contract and the duty of fair representation] are inextricably interdependent. 'To prevail against either the company or the Union . . . [employee-plaintiffs] must not only show that their discharge was contrary to the contract but must also carry the burden of demonstrating a breach of duty by the Union.'" Id. at 66–67 (Stewart, J., concurring in the judgment), quoting Hines v. Anchor Motor Freight, 424 U.S. at 570–571.

[4] The majority further justifies establishing a burden of proof different from Sec. 301 suits by distinguishing grievance-arbitration procedures from other proceedings. Specifically, the majority asserts that an employee is presumed innocent in grievance arbitrations. Initially, I disagree with this generalization because it assumes that all arbitrations uniformly apply the same burdens or standards of proof. Further, a grievant is presumed innocent if the employer burden of proof is to establish "beyond a reasonable doubt" that the grievant engaged in the conduct resulting in discipline. Although arbitrators do tend to use this standard if the alleged offense involves criminal intent or moral turpitude, many arbitrators do not use this standard in other types of cases. In cases not involving criminal intent or moral turpitude, arbitrators often will look merely at whether the grievant is guilty and whether the offense justifies the discipline. See Elkouri & Elkouri, How Arbitration Works at 663 (4th ed. 1985). Accordingly, I do not believe that the "special character" of grievance-arbitration proceedings justifies placing the burden of proof on the union.

Administration of our resources: Our resources will not be conserved by application of my colleagues' procedural framework. My colleagues hold that before the end of the unfair labor practice hearing the Respondent Union may announce whether it elects to present evidence on the merits of the grievance during the unfair labor practice proceeding or at the subsequent compliance stage. Because the Union need not state when it will present the evidence on the merits, the General Counsel will have no way of predicting the extent, if any, to which she should prepare evidence and witnesses for the hearing. Defending against the Union's case that the grievance was not meritorious obviously requires preparation on a much more extensive basis than simply showing the grievance was "not clearly frivolous." Moreover, my colleagues' bifurcation of the liability proceeding will often require backpay proceedings before court enforced liability is a certainty or, alternatively, court enforcement before backpay liability is a certainty.

Our congressional mandate: The Board's congressional mandate to advance the statutorily declared labor policies of the United States as set forth in Section 1 of the Act is the same mandate advanced by the courts in interpreting Section 301 of the Act.[5] Accordingly, I reject my colleagues' reliance on this congressional mandate to distinguish between the court and administrative interpretations of the duty of fair representation.

Meaningfulness of remedy: Finally, my colleagues declare that the shifting burden of proof provides a meaningful remedy in duty of fair representation cases. I disagree. The General Counsel's burden to show that the grievance was "not clearly frivolous"[6] establishes only that the grievant lost the opportunity to test his or her grievance. This showing that a grievance is "not clearly frivolous" provides only a nexus to the grievant's opportunity to test the grievance. However, if the General Counsel establishes that the grievance is not clearly frivolous, under my colleagues' analysis the General Counsel has without more carried the burden of establishing that full backpay is due the grievant. I would not conclude that this showing of nonfrivolousness justifies a speculative and/or punitive backpay award.[7]

Application of the burden of proof that I espouse leads me to concur in my colleagues' decision to remand this case for further evidence. It appears that the parties were precluded from litigating the merits of the grievance. As the record now stands, the General Counsel has not met the burden of proof that I would place on her to establish that the underlying grievance was meritorious. I agree, however, that she has established that the Respondent Union has failed to fairly represent the Charging Party in processing his grievance. Normally, under these circumstances, I would find a violation and order the Union to pursue the remaining stages of the grievance procedure, including arbitration and payment of reasonable attorney's fees should the Charging Party desire to be represented by counsel of his own choosing. For the reasons I have stated, however, I would not order the Respondent to pay backpay without the General Counsel's sustaining her burden of proof in showing merit.

[5] Textile Workers v. Lincoln Mills of Alabama, 353 U.S. 448, 456 (1957).

[6] Although it is not perfectly clear, it appears that a grievance is "not clearly frivolous" if there exists any theory on which the grievance could have prevailed.

[7] Given the speculative nature of an award absent a showing of merit, arguments concerning the Union's superior knowledge of the relevant facts are irrelevant in placing the burden of proof. Moreover, I dispute the majority's generalization that information regarding the grievance may be more attainable or particularly within the knowledge of the Union as justifying their placement of the burden of showing that the grievance lacked merit on the Union. The grievant usually has greater personal knowledge of the events leading up to the receipt of discipline than the Union. With the grievant-Charging Party's assistance, the General Counsel would be sufficiently armed with the information necessary to meet the burden of proof that I would allocate to her.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On October 15, 1986, the Board issued a Decision and Order in this proceeding[1] adopting the findings of the administrative law judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act, including, in pertinent part, that the Respondent retained an employee who wished to retire so that the employee could vote against the Union in the representation election and hired three employees for the purpose of undermining the Union's support in the election. Subsequently, the Union petitioned the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to review the Board's Order for failure to include, as part of the remedy, backpay to the employees who lost commissions as a result of the Respondent's unlawful unit packing. On February 24, 1988, the court issued a decision granting the petition for review and remanding the case to the Board to consider the Union's contention.[2]

On April 11, 1988, the Board accepted the court's remand and notified the parties that they could file statements of position concerning the issue on remand. The General Counsel and the Union filed statements of position.

In compliance with the court's remand, and in light of the statements of position filed by the General Counsel and Union, which were unopposed by the Respondent, we have reconsidered our original decision and find it appropriate to require the Respondent to make whole its employees for any commissions lost as a result of the Respondent's unlawful unit packing. See Suburban Ford, 248 NLRB 364 (1980). Accordingly, we will modify our prior Order to provide this additional relief.

AMENDED REMEDY

We shall order the Respondent, in addition to the relief prescribed in our original Order, to reimburse its employees for commissions lost as a result of its hire of employees Simpson, Decker, and DePolo on March 5, 1985, and the retention of employee Harper on March 28, 1985, to undermine support for the Union in the election held April 10, 1985. Loss of earnings shall be computed as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board modifies its order previously issued in this proceeding at 281 NLRB (1986), as set forth below:

1. Insert the following as paragraph 2(d) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs accordingly.

"(d) Make its employees whole, plus interest, for commissions lost as a result of hiring and retaining employees for the purpose of undermining support for the Union in the election held April 10, 1985."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

[1] 281 NLRB 1246 (1986).

[2] Food & Commercial Workers Local 1095 v. NLRB, No. 87-7127 (unpublished).

[3] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge employees or deny their leave requests because we know or suspect they are engaging in union activities.

WE WILL NOT coercively interrogate our employees about their own union membership, activities, or sympathies or the union membership, activities, or sympathies of their fellow employees.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees with loss of employment, closure of the dealership, unspecified reprisals or with the futility of organizing a union because they engaged in union activities.

WE WILL NOT solicit our employees or applicants for employment to withdraw from membership in the Union.

WE WILL NOT make statements to employees giving them the impression that their union activities are under surveillance.

WE WILL NOT tell an employee not to come in unless he intended to vote against the Union.

WE WILL NOT employ salespersons for the purpose of undermining support for the Union.

WE WILL NOT retain an employee who desired to retire so that employee could vote against the Union.

WE WILL NOT deny any employee's leave request and subsequently terminate that employee because he engaged in union activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make Thomas Roberts whole for any earnings he might have lost as a result of his unlawful discharge, with interest.

WE WILL offer Thomas Roberts immediate employment to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent one, without prejudice to his seniority rights or any other rights or privileges of employment, and make him whole or any earnings he may have lost as a result of our unlawful refusal to reemploy him, with interest.

WE WILL remove from our files any reference to the unlawful discharge of Thomas Roberts and notify him, in writing, that such has been done and that our unlawful actions will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against him.

WE WILL, on request, recognize and bargain with Automobile Salesmen's Union Local 1095, United Food and Commercial Workers Union AFL-CIO as the exclusive representative for purposes of collective bargaining of our employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time salespersons employed by Bridgeway Oldsmobile at its 25715 Mission Blvd., Hayward, California facility; excluding all mechanics, parts, lubrication, lot employees, employees currently covered by a collective bargaining agreement, financial and insurance employees, office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL bargain with the above-named labor organization with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms an conditions of employment and, if an agreement is reached, embody such on in a written, executed contract.

WE WILL make our employees whole, with interest, for commissions lost as a result of hiring and retaining employees for the purposes of undermining support for the Union in the election held on April 10, 1985.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On February 22, 1984, Administrative Law Judge Harold Bernard Jr. issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[2]

In affirming the judge's findings and conclusions, we note that the Board's order in Sabine Towing & Transportation Co., 205 NLRB 423 (1973), on which the judge in part relied, was denied enforcement in the Fifth Circuit, 599 F.2d 663 (5th Cir. 1979), where this case might be reviewed if the Respondent chooses to contest our order. The court refused to uphold the order in Sabine Towing because it believed that the Board had improperly transferred to the Employer the burden of proof regarding the existence of alternative means by which the Union could communicate with employees and because, in its view, the Board had ignored evidence that the Union there had, in fact, been relatively successful in contacting employees while they were ashore. 599 F.2d at 665. In Sabine the record indicated that the tanker employees went ashore eight times a month for periods of 17 to 35 hours at a time, and that the union organizers had managed to meet substantial numbers of them in taverns, restaurants, or at their homes. The union also had a list of employee names and addresses to aid this effort and had been able to send its literature onto the tankers.

In the present case, however, there were not similar frequent port calls, and the union organizers were ejected from or denied entry to the heliport sites from which employees were transported to the drilling platforms and back. The Respondent's only effort to reach an accommodation with the Union regarding one of these onshore sites occurred just as the Respondent was preparing to move the platform to a different location.

Finally, in Sabine, the Board's order required that access to the tankers be granted, whereas the order in the present case provides that the Respondent may also comply with the order by providing suitable onshore access. Thus, in the present case, the General Counsel has clearly carried the burden of showing that the Union lacked reasonable alternatives to those provided in the order for communicating with the Respondent's employees.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, North Star Drilling Company, Ltd., Houston, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Insert the following as paragraph 2(a) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

"(a) Subject to reasonable rules and regulations, allow nonemployee organizers of the National Maritime Union of America, AFL–CIO, or other labor organizations, to have access on the vessel Alaskan Star to employees during their free time for the purpose of soliciting them on behalf of a labor organization, or for consulting, advising, meeting, or assisting employees regarding their rights to self-organization; or provide a suitable off-premises site to the Union for such purposes."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT continue or give effect to our policy barring nonemployee organizers from access to employees on our vessel the Alaskan Star for soliciting them during their free time on behalf of the National Maritime Union of America, AFL–CIO, or any other labor organization, or for consulting, advising, meeting, or assisting the employees regarding their rights to self-organization, provided,

[1] Member Johansen adopts the judge's conclusions because he finds them consistent with the Board's recent decision in Fairmont Hotel, 282 NLRB 139 (1986).

Chairman Stephens finds the judge's analysis consistent with his concurring opinion in Fairmont.

Member Cracraft did not participate in Fairmont. However, so long as Fairmont remains Board law, she will apply the analysis set forth in that decision. She agrees with her colleagues that Respondent violated the Act by failing to provide union organizers reasonable access.

[2] We conform the judge's recommended Order and notice with his findings.

however, that nothing shall be construed to prohibit us from making and enforcing reasonable regulations in respect to visits to our vessel by such nonemployee union organizers, or from providing suitable off-premises access to the organizers.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, subject to reasonable rules and regulations, allow nonemployee organizers of the National Maritime Union of America, AFL–CIO, or other labor organizations, to have access on our vessel Alaskan Star to our employees during their free time for the purpose of soliciting them on behalf of a labor organization, or for consulting, advising, meeting, or assisting our employees regarding their rights to self-organization; or we shall provide a suitable off-premises site to the Union for such purposes.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HAROLD BERNARD JR., Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard in Boston, Massachusetts, on December 1, 2, and 3, 1982, on complaint allegations that the Respondent refused to grant union organizers access aboard its oil rig, Alaskan Star, to talk with its crewmembers, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Based on the entire record,[1] including the witnesses' demeanor, and consideration of ably prepared briefs by the parties, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, a limited partnership formed under the law of the State of Texas, with an office in Houston, Texas, operates an oil rig vessel, the Alaskan Star, in waters off the United States, including points located off Masssachusetts and Louisiana, for the purpose of discovering oil. Respondent, during such operations, admits to annually receiving materials valued in excess of $50,000 from points outside Massachusetts and to engaging in commerce within the meaning of the Act. It is so found.

The Union admittedly is a labor organization as defined in the Act.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The Alaskan Star is a semisubmersible and self-propelled drilling vessel operating in offshore United States waters, where she probes into the ocean floor searching for oil. Designed to withstand severe sea conditions, the floating rig sits on twin pontoons 50 feet wide and 260 feet long, which support massive columns on which rest the main and upper deck, as well as the drilling floor attaining an elevation of 141 feet. The latter "platform" area, 226 feet by 207 feet, contains space for equipment, supplies, cranes, the well-center, rig substructure area, a helicopter landing pad, and the crew's quarters.

The vessel, operational in the Baltimore Canyon off Atlantic City, New Jersey, from April 1980 to July 1981, was moved to George's Bank off Hyannis, Massachusetts, on July 22, 1981, and was later again moved, this time to waters off Venice, Louisiana, on August 21, 1982, arriving there the following month.[2]

During these operations, she is manned by a 96-employee crew consisting of about 19 supervisory-ranked individuals and 76 others, this crew consisting of senior tool pushers, drillers, derrickman, floor hands, barge engineer, balance control operator, rig engineer, subsea engineer, technicians, crane operators, radio operator, welder, and roustabouts. There is also a paint crew assigned to continually maintain the rig. An independent contractor is used to staff and operate the ship's galley with its own employees.

The rig operates 24 hours a day, every day, at an estimated cost of $120,000 daily. The employee operating complement is divided into 4 crews overall, consisting of 19 nonsupervisory employees in each crew. These crews serve on a rotating and staggered basis, so that two crews are on shore at any given time, and two crews are on board, in each case one of the two ashore, and one of the two on board taking part in a 1- or 2-week stay, depending on when they were rotated. Thus a crewman on crew A when first reporting for duty has spent 2 weeks ashore and now contemplates 2 weeks on duty, and would be relieving a crewman on crew B who had spent 2 weeks on duty and who then was being released for 2 weeks ashore. The so-called staggering comes in because crew A, after relieving crew B, will then be aboard with crew C, which at that point will be on board for only 1 more week (having spent 1 week before with crew B, after which it will be relieved by crew D, and so forth.

Crewmembers work 12-hour shifts and then are off 12 hours. While off duty the employee generally spends 30 to 40 minutes showering and changing clothes, 30 minutes at mealtime, and the remainder watching television, playing cards or darts, and sleeping. The employees also attend training sessions conducted by management on board the vessel during this time. There are areas employees and supervisors alike frequent, such as the galley, two recreation rooms, bunk rooms, washrooms, the deck area, and the helicopter.

[1] Respondent's unopposed motions to strike from the record attachments 1 and 2, contained in Charging Party's brief and being a magazine article concerning safety aboard oil rigs, and a letter to the Regional Office concerning the Union's withdrawal from a settlement agreement, respectively, as neither was introduced at the hearing, but was merely attached to Charging Party's posthearing brief, are granted, as is its motion to correct minor errors in its brief. The General Counsel's motion to correct transcript inaccuracies is likewise granted.

[2] The vessel's stay in any location is of an uncertain duration, and depends on variables not always predictable such as the hardness in the composition of soil beneath the ocean floor, weather conditions, and decisions of the operator. A well can take 6 months to a year to drill.

While on duty, there are no scheduled breaktimes or scheduled meals for the employee, who takes two meals when time can be found and spends 15 minutes for each. Generally, the work performed is dirty, demanding, and dangerous due to moving, spinning, lifting, and freely swinging chains, pipes, cutting or drilling equipment with which employees work in close quarters, the pitching and rolling of the deck aboard a vessel on the high seas, subject to storm-caused extreme movements, and possible, though unpredictable, exposure to lethal sour gas released from beneath the ocean floor during drilling and that can find its way up to the workers through the drilling equipment or housing. These potential hazards have not, however, prevented the Alaskan Star from compiling a record of 800 accident-free days at the time of this hearing, an indication that safety is an important and successfully addressed concern.

Employees aboard the Alaskan Star reside in some 13 different States: Texas, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Alabama, Florida, Connecticut, New York, Maryland, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Minnesota, and Arizona, a scattered geographical pattern subject, moreover, to annual changes reflecting an established yearly 25-percent employee turnover in the industry.[3]

Employees get to work and retun home as follows:

While the Alaskan Star was off Hyannis, Massachusetts, July 1981 to August 1982, the Respondent flew employees from New Orleans and Houston to Hyannis on a company plane. This was the case for 90 percent of the employee complement. Other employees drove from their homes to Hyannis. From Hyannis, the Respondent flew employees from a helicopter service heliport out to the rig, picked up employees heading for shore points following their 2-week tour of duty, and transported them by plane from the Hyannis airport to New Orleans and Houston, where such employees then drove home. Other relieved employees who had been helicoptered to Hyannis drove home from there, about 10 percent of the employee complement. After the Alaskan Star moved to its position some 25 miles off the Venice, Louisiana shoreline in September 1982, employees had to find their own transportation to Venice when returning from their homes to report for work, or when returning home from Venice after their tour on duty because the Respondent, at that time, only furnished transportation by helicopter to and from its drilling vessel and a heliport in Venice operated by Petroleum Helicopter, Inc., a private company. These helicopter landing areas on shore, at Hyannis and Venice, so-called transfer points, are discussed further below.[4]

B. The Union's Organizing Drive

As noted, the Alaskan Star was located in the Baltimore Canyon off Atlantic City from April 1980 to July 1981. Union organizers Henry Dooley, national organizing director, and Robert Healey, business agent, undertook the effort to organize Alaskan Star employees sometime in July 1981. None of the employees on that vessel or on other such type rigs were represented by the Union.

Dooley's testimony shows that following his direction to Healey that the organizing get underway, he was informed that helicopters used a landing field in Hyannis to ferry employees to and from the rig, and that supply boats carried goods to the rig from Davisville, Rhode Island; accordingly, Dooley instructed Healey to go to those points and see if Healey could organize employees there.

Healey visited the Hyannis helicopter office twice, found it locked, and on the second trip went to the main terminal where, on inquiring when and whether oil rig people were being flown, was told this occurred on Mondays. On September 14 Healey again returned to the heliport, found the door unlocked, went in, and introduced himself to individuals there and was engaged in conversation seeking to determine whether the persons were from the rig, when an individual entered the waiting room from an inner office and, after learning from Healey that he was a union organizer, told Healey he was not allowed in there. Prior to Healey's introducing himself as a union official he asked the individual whether there was any work at the rigs and was told cooks were needed. It was only after Healey revealed his status and informed him that he was interested in organizing rig employees that the official ordered Healey to leave, also informing him that Healey was not allowed out on the oil rigs either. Healey noticed watchmen walking around and left. That same day Healey drove to Davisville, Rhode Island, to both try to organize rig supply boat employees and to see if the employees on the rig supply boats could talk to the men on the rigs about joining the Union. On arrival, Healey introduced himself to a guard as a representative of the National Maritime Union and was told, "they don't want you guys down on those boats, I can't let you through—you must have special permission from the people that run the boats." Healey, after being directed to the office, went there to find it locked. He then left.

Healey thereafter returned twice a month to Hyannis, sometimes finding the office vacant, other times seeing people inside, but talking to individuals, for the most part, outside the building. He was not excluded on these occasions and did not see the official who excluded him earlier. There were only a couple people in the waiting room at a time and he testified he never learned who was on the Alaskan Star, there being different rig employees there who told him they could not provide such information, as they did not know. Healey described his visits as experiences when he would go down there and find not too many people around and "they always seemed to be in a hurry to go some place, so there wasn't much of a place to meet anyone."

[3] Respondent manager of human resources, Gary Horn, when questioned by me, did not "have" the turnover for the Alaskan Star, but described the industry turnover rate, opining that Alaskan Star's turnover was "not much." Area Manager Theodore Falcom testified "there may have been some turnover" on the vessel.

[4] The George's Banks location was 120 miles off Hyannis, and large helicopters ferried as many as 12 to 14 employees each trip, although for such purposes at the Venice location, 25 miles off shore, 4 to 6 employees were carried in smaller helicopters each trip.

Early in Healey's efforts, in somewhat paralleling events, Dooley testified to having numerous phone calls with Healey concerning the latter's failure to make any progress in locating or communicating directly or indirectly with rig employees, whereupon Dooley decided to request Respondent to grant him access aboard the vessel, and to provide the Union with a list of employees' names and addresses. Healey's efforts, as described above, to communicate with employees without such access or list continued. By letter dated July 24, 1981, the Union requested Respondent to provide such access and a list, as described. Believing that the vessel was still in Baltimore Canyon, Dooley referred to being granted access to the vessel's incorrect location because by then the Alaskan Star had moved to the George's Banks location. Dooley mailed a second letter to Respondent with the same requests on August 18, 1981, this time correctly placing Respondent's vessel at George's Banks. Not receiving a reply to either of his letters to Respondent, described above, Dooley filed the instant charge on September 21, 1981.

Healey's visits to Hyannis, described above, continued after this charge was filed, as did the Union's efforts generally, described below.

C. Respondent's Reply to the Union's Requests

Respondent denied the Union's request for access to Alaskan Star and a list of employee names and addresses on November 2, 1981, citing in its refusal a nonvisitors policy based on protection of trade secrets, safety concerns, and expense. At the same time, however, Respondent offered to provide an alternative means of access to the Union at the Hyannis airport, during which, for a 15-minute period 1 day a week for 4 weeks the Union would be free to address employees.

Although the Union filed an amended charge on November 3, 1981, asserting that Respondent, pursuant to the Company's November 2 letter, was "continuing" to refuse access to the Union to talk with its employees on board the Alaskan Star, Respondent's offer of an alternative means was destined to later bear fruit, although only temporarily.

On November 9, 1981, the Board's Regional Office issued complaint followed by Respondent's answer. The record next shows that cross-motions for summary judgment were filed by Respondent in March 1982, and by the General Counsel in April 1982.

Sometime in April 1982, the Exxon Corporation assigned its contract pursuant to which the Alaskan Star was drilling for oil on Exxon's behalf to the Tenneco Corporation, which was to remain Alaskan Star's "operator" (her crew remaining intact) until August 1982. During this period, on June 15, 1982, a three-man television camera crew from a Boston TV station visited aboard the Alaskan Star during an intended 6-hour tour, reduced to 4-1/2 hours because of weather considerations. After a 1-hour flight, the TV station visitors stepped onto the helicopter platform on the rig, received instructions in the recreation room, including advice about the dangers of sour gas and the proper way to conduct themselves, and toured the operation including the galley, where they spoke with employees, the mud logging room, the rig on drilling floor, the cabins, and the geologist's office. The TV station's field producer, Hamilton Fisher, who was with the visitors, testified that he spoke to people in each area visited while they were on duty, though during slack time, and that he was not told there were any places on the rig off limits to his group; nor was he asked to sign any agreements prohibiting disclosure of confidential matter, but was asked to acknowledge understanding the dangers on the rig as explained by rig officials, and to waive liability for any injuries incurred while on board.

D. The Parties' Settlement Agreement

On August 10, 1982, as an outgrowth of the parties' discussions, Respondent's counsel, Peter Chatilovicz, mailed a letter to the Union for Dooley's signed approval, which contained a carefully detailed format providing the Union with access to the Alaskan Star employees in the Hyannis helicopter facility's waiting room, during scheduled periods of time—25 minutes in duration—for eight meetings. The plan improved on Respondent's earlier-described suggestion contained in its November 2, 1981 letter of refusal and, in general, manifests a thoughtful resolution crafted with good intentions. Dooley signed the proposed resolution with corrections added, and sent the papers back to Respondent. Counsel Chatilovicz then wrote the Board's executive secretary August 13, 1982, confirming an earlier communication seeking delay in disposition of the pending Motions of Summary Judgment on the basis of a pending settlement and advising that an agreement had, in fact, been reached. When Dooley received a copy of such letter he wrote the Board on August 19, 1982, denying that any agreement had been reached and requesting the case be processed.

Although the record contains no explicit explanation why Dooley took this position, there is some basis to infer that it was because he had gotten word from "people on the Cape [Cod] whose husbands or boyfriends worked on the towboats that take these rigs down south and they told us that it was going to Venice," sometime before he visited Hyannis to "learn" for himself the whereabouts of the Alaskan Star. During such later visit, a 10-day stay in Hyannis in September 1982, Dooley went to the helicopter office and found, each day, no one there, whereupon he drove to Davisville, Rhode Island, to "check it out."

In any event, the record in fact shows that the Alaskan Star departed from George's Bank enroute to offshore Venice, Louisiana, on August 21, 1982, and that Respondent notified Dooley of this in a letter dated August 30, 1982, which refers to such information being provided Dooley "recently," and also offers a similar arrangement at Venice, "if conditions at the new location are substantially the same as the conditions which existed at the Hyannis location." The letter further specified "(that is, should your ability to contact our employees be as limited as it was when the employees left the rig in Hyannis)."

On September 9, 1982, the Alaskan Star arrived at the Venice location. The same day, the Board dismissed the parties' Motions for Summary Judgment.

E. The Union's Visit to Venice

Learning from spouses and friends of tugboat crewmembers who served on towboats used to move rigs that the Alaskan Star was then located off Venice, some time in early October 1982, Dooley traveled there. During his 2-day stay, on October 11 and 12, Dooley visited the helicopter landing site, operated by Petroleum Helicopter, Inc. While standing outside the fenced-in parking lot taking down a license tag number after having taken a picture, Dooley testified he was approached by a person from the direction of a building inside the fence who told him to "get the f— out of there." Explaining during examination that he would leave public property when advised to do so in the "Bayou" country, Dooley left promptly, his stay lasting only 5 to 10 minutes. The remaining time Dooley spent searching out available meeting places with no success, having been told by a local innkeeper it would not be wise around Venice to provide a meeting place for such purpose because it would hurt his business.

Respondent, on November 2, 1982, wrote the Regional Director for the Board's Region 1, seeking dismissal of the complaint based on the August 1982 resolution and indicating that the charge had not been withdrawn pursuant to such settlement, "apparently because Respondent was required by its client [under contract] to move its oil rig to a new location in the Gulf of Mexico."[5] The Regional Office, through counsel for the General Counsel Gerald Wolper, informed Respondent by letter dated November 12, 1982, that such dismissal was inappropriate as the proposals in the agreement referred to did not afford any remedy to employees given the Alaskan Star's present location, and the Union (the Charging Party) objected to the proposed agreement as a resolution of the issues in the case for the same reason, citing Roadway Express, 246 NLRB 174 (1979).

Prior to the hearing in this case Dooley testified he had some seven contacts with company counsel during which (except for a call on October 11, 1982) he described the Union's difficulties in contacting Alaskan Star employees. In fact, there is no indication in the record that the Union has succeeded in contacting or identifying any of them from the July 1981 beginning of its organizing efforts and the hearing on December 1982.[6] During those contacts, I find, the Union was continuing to press its request for access aboard the Alaskan Star, and Respondent, by its course of conduct then and at the hearing, was continuing to refuse such request, as well as the request for a list of employees' names and addresses. It is further clear that Respondent was notified on or about November 24 and at the hearing on December 1, 1982, of the General Counsel's intention to amend this complaint to add the then-present location of Alaskan Star off Venice to the allegation that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. In addition, Respondent was accorded full opportunity and encouragement to seek additional time to respond to the amendment, if it deemed such was necessary, but declined the opportunity through experienced counsel. The ruling to allow the amendment stands confirmed.

It follows from such that Respondent's motion before me to dismiss the complaint, either because the matters involving Hyannis-based events were settled, or because there was no issue properly before me regarding Venice must fail for the reasons noted above, that is, the failure of the settlement to resolve the real, present controversy (and one that will continue unless resolved regarding all future locations) and the propriety behind granting the amendment to the complaint.

F. Analysis and Conclusion

It is the clear and settled law of the land that the question whether employee rights under Section 7 of the Act must be secured by permitting a union access to employees on an employer's premises is resolved by determining whether reasonable alternative means exist by which the union can communicate with those employees. NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105 (1966). In those instances when employees are said to be isolated from normal contacts with the outside world due to location and the requirement they reside on the employer's premises for substantial periods of time, as in the instant case regarding Alaskan Star employees—who are on board 2 weeks in a row—there is said to exist no substitute for union access to the employees while they are on board. Sabine Towing & Transportation Co., 205 NLRB 423 (1973), enf. denied 599 F.2d 663 (5th Cir. 1979).

Respondent contends, however, that the Union could have made home visits to employees and that the fact that only one-half its employees would be home at any one time is irrelevant. Since 90 percent of the employees were flown to Hyannis from their residences for transport by helicopter to the Alaskan Star, the Union could not use the license plates of cars parked there to track down such employees' addresses and was barred from the parking lot in Venice from doing so. Moreover, as the Board has held, without a list of names and addresses—which the Respondent refused to furnish the Union—home visits as well as mail and telephone solicitation would be a futile means for a union to pursue. Hutzler Bros. Co., 241 NLRB 914, 916 (1979). The record further indicates that there is no uniformity in the wearing of company insignia by employees either as a result of practice or company requirements as that such insignia, which the record shows is, in fact, only sporadically evident, provides no reliable basis to identify and communicate with employees.

[5] Respondent's own explanation for Dooley's refusal to implement the agreement confirms the inference drawn as to this motive set forth above.

[6] At the hearing Dooley testified he eschewed Respondent counsel's offer to make a joint visit to Venice during a phone call on October 11, 1982, because the agreement fell through and things seemed always to "disperse" in the parties' own efforts to resolve matters.

The record further indicates clearly that phone calls to the rig employees are "not encouraged," so that the Union was denied this means of communication as well. Nor would use of mass media, on the face of matters, constitute reasonable alternatives since Alaskan Star's location is sometimes far at sea where costly television transmission or radio transmission cannot be relied on, the location changes between points far distant from one other so that channel selection would be difficult and, as a result, these means are considered of little use and not to constitute a reasonable alternative to direct access. Hutzler Bros. Co., above at 915, citing Solo Cup Co., 172 NLRB 1110 (1968). The thin possibility that ads placed in trade journals would find their way to the Union's targeted readership at some undetermined time aboard Alaskan Star, where papers and such journals are available, would likewise fail to afford a reasonable alternative.

There remain for consideration contentions by the Respondent that the Union had a reasonable alternative means to contact employees at the helicopter transfer points, and that it did not do enough to contact employees on its own to warrant being accorded access in this case.

It takes little analysis to doubt that the transfer points afford an opportunity for the Union to address employees with its message. The location of the transfer points changes as the location of the Alaskan Star changes—already she has been stationed at three locations, Baltimore Canyon, George's Banks, and off Venice, Louisiana. There is uncertainty, insofar as the Union is concerned, whether the same employee transfer point will serve the Alaskan Star from place to place and for what period of time, or whether a new point will have to be assimilated into its communications and direct contacting efforts. By its nature, the transfer point, as organizer Healey noted, seemed to be the scene of people in a hurry to go some place—understandable given the fact that half the employees there were heading home (immediately, it should be noted at the Venice point since they did not have to await Respondent's plane) after 2 weeks at sea. Healey found no success in identifying Alaskan Star employees at the transfer point in Hyannis, though in retrospect the Respondent contends he could have simply read the passenger manifest at a check-in counter, and for his part, Dooley was barred from the Venice point altogether. It is clear as well that the number and identity of the crews being helicoptered to the transfer points varies—and that Respondent's transfer of employees—the system, varies depending on whether it is flying them from the transfer point (Hyannis)[7] to their homes, in which case employees must wait to board the plane and are thus "available," or whether employees are free to leave immediately (Venice), and are really only available on a catch-as-catch-can basis—if identified. Further, the number of flights differs with the size of the helicopter; thus there are different numbers of employees arriving at different times depending on the point's location distance from the Alaskan Star. I find all these variables and obstacles in the way of communication with employees to provide too tenuous a basis on which employee statutory rights should be made to depend. Belcher Towing Co., 238 NLRB 446 (1978), and 256 NLRB 666 (1981); Sabine Towing & Transportation Co., above at 425. As has been noted before, a reasonable alternative requires something more conducive to communication than the hectic atmosphere arising from the busy comings and goings in these transfer points, where supervisors, officials, and different companies' rig crews commingle and where, as matters stand, it is dubious that employees may exercise their Section 7 rights in a "relaxed atmosphere." Alaska Barite Co., 197 NLRB 1023, 1028–1029 (1972).

Finally, although Respondent went to considerable lengths to belittle the Union's efforts to contact employees (since such efforts may justifiably have merited such observations, from Respondent's vantage at least) and contended that the failure to take certain specific steps, such as (a) following unidentified persons to restaurants near the transfer points, (b) visiting Hyannis on days when the Union knew shift changes occurred while Northern Star was temporarily off Hyannis, and (c) gathering clues from clipboards and public address announcements of the arrivals of helicopters from the Alaskan Star to the heliport transfer points, militates against a finding in the Union's favor such argument is based on the incorrect premise that, in effect, a union must show it has explored and exhausted nearly every possible alternative means for contacting employees before direct access can be permitted. Such a view has been uniformly rejected as it misfocuses the inquiry into union efforts overly narrowing the scope of the true and correct question whether Section 7 rights of employees can be addressed reasonably by means other than the preferred face-to-face contact given the objective circumstances in which employees find themselves, as revealed by the entire record, not just a Monday morning quarterbacking-type review of the Union's performance alone Belcher Towing Co., 256 NLRB 666, 666–667 (1981); Alaska Barite Co., above at 917. Here, the Union's continuing efforts to locate and contact employees, either directly, or indirectly through supply boat crews, relatives, and friends of towboat crews that move the rigs, numerous visits to Hyannis, Davisville, Rhode Island, and Venice, Louisiana, contacts in towns where employees might be expected to visit, and through requests to Respondent for employee names and addresses during the entire course of the campaign in 1981 and 1982 demonstrate substantial efforts to contact and communicate with other means alleged as reasonable but found inadequate, make it plain that the Union's efforts, to secure on-premises access even under Respondent's limited view of the governing legal principles, arise not merely from a desire for mere convenience, but from necessity.

G. Respondent's No-Visitors Policy

The Alaskan Star is registered under the United States flag to the highest classification for floating drilling vessels under requirements of the Coast Guard, American Bureau of Shipping, U.S. Public Health Service, and [7] There is no indication the Union learned the whereabouts of the plane used to fly employees to and from Hyannis.

Federal Communications Commission. There have been visits by the latter Agency's personnel from the Bureau of Department of Minerals Management quite frequently, and nonemployees of independent contractors are regularly onboard, as were officials of Tenneco Corporation while the Exxon contract was assigned to Tenneco. Supple boats visit the rig to drop off materials and goods, and nonoperating personnel, such as the personnel directory, sometimes visit the Alaskan Star. In addition, as noted above, a television three-man crew visited aboard Alaskan Star to interview and film employees during the rig's operation 120 miles off Hyannis, at the direction of Tenneco officials. In addition, inspections onboard are conducted by agents from the American Bureau of Shipping.

Moreover, during his testimony, Theodore Falcon, area manager for one of Respondent's partners, stated that human resources personnel have been out to the Alaskan Star and talked about unions four or five times within a year. He testified the content in the discussions basically had to do with, "we [had] some communications and that the union people may be talking to them" and that "they were just making them aware of the fact that unions were maybe going to be approaching them." Falcon continued that, "they, you know, just were making these fellows aware of that, you know, just—also, you know, [that] we have been to this point a nonunion company." (Emphasis added.)

It is readily apparent that the Respondent's nonvisitors policy has generally yielded to accommodate the dictates of various surrounding circumstances that may be accurately traced to mitigating factors in each instance yet in their totality reflect "where there is a will there is a way." It follows, as well, that specific concerns for safety, injury-related liability, and confidentiality allegedly underpinning such policy have likewise been modified to tolerate a substantial degree of visitation, so that there is no reason to suppose visits by union organizers, under carefully drawn procedures, could not likewise be tolerated aboard the Alaskan Star notwithstanding the no-visitor rule. The Union has already stated on the record that its own insurance covers its representatives from injuries onboard seagoing vessels and is willing to sign waivers holding Respondent free from liability; that it has no interest in trade secrets aboard ship, and that it would be willing to have its representatives stay out of the crew's sleeping quarters. Respondent's burden is further lessened, somewhat, because access for the Union need not go beyond what is reasonably necessary to serve the purpose at hand. Central Hardware Co. v. NLRB, 407 U.S. 539, 544–545 (1972); NLRB v. Lake Superior Lumber Corp., 167 F.2d 147 (6th Cir. 1948). Nor can there fairly be said to be propriety or a securing of employee Section 7 rights in allowing such a no-visitors rule to bar union access to employees on the Alaskan Star where, it has been demonstrated, nonoperating personnel of Respondent are often flown to address employees in training sessions on the subject of unions, including the facts that the union may be approaching employees and that the company has been nonunion. This observation does not impinge on an employer's rights to address his own employees on the subject of unionism; it has, instead, a bearing only on whether, when an employer chooses to do so in an isolated worksite, it can then refuse to allow employees to be addressed with other views on the exercise of their Section 7 rights at the same worksite on the basis of a no-visitor rule administered in the fashion and the circumstances this one has been administered in. For this additional reason, although the earlier cited reasons suffice, I find the rule is no basis to bar access to employees on the rig. See generally American Cast Iron Pipe Co. v. NLRB, 600 F.2d 132 (8th Cir. 1979), and cases cited above.

Based on the foregoing, including a necessary balancing of the competing interests at stake, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by refusing the Union access to its employees on the Alaskan Star. Interlake Steamship Co., 174 NLRB 308 (1969); Ingram Barge Co., 204 NLRB 63 (1973); New Pines, Inc., 191 NLRB 944 (1971); Monogram Models, 192 NLRB 705 (1971); Scott Hudgens, 130 NLRB 414 (1977), and cases cited above.

III. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section I, above, occurring concerning its operations described, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) and is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. Respondent, by refusing to allow union organizers aboard the Alaskan Star to engage in organizing activity among its crewmembers, engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.
4. The unfair labor practices found above affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Although the violation of law is premised on Respondent's refusal to allow union organizers on board the Alaskan Star to talk to employees, there is no reason why a full remedy cannot be afforded employees by recommending Respondent be ordered to allow the Union reasonable access on board the Alaskan Star or, in the alternative, that Respondent provide suitable off premises access to employees along the same or improved lines of the parties' earlier agreement, reached while Alaskan Star was located off Hyannis, Massachusetts. This is so because although it is true that, for example, the transfer points were, as matters stood, predecision, not reasonable alternative means of access, there is reason to believe that with this decision in hand, the parties, with Respondent's cooperation in particular, could fashion suitable arrangements to ensure that the transfer points or their equivalent become reasonable alternative sites for access. This could be accomplished if the access were shaped to reasonably duplicate what the circumstances surrounding access would be were such to be accorded on board the Alaskan Star, that is, Alaskan Star employees identified beforehand as such could be contacted face to face, on employer-owned or leased property, or when the Union had an acknowledged right to be present in better than a trespassers status, for regular periods of time when employees were scheduled to be present (as they are when on the vessel) in a relaxed atmosphere for reasonable lengths of time over a reasonable period of time. Given the changes in the Alaskan Star's position, and the dynamics aboard her, including weather-caused problems, serious dangers, the expense and incursion into operations necessitated by an order directing access be provided only on the rig, I see no reason, in this unique set of circumstances, to saddle the parties with so limited an order and believe the alternative as constructed pursuant to this decision and recommended Order will effectuate the policies of the Act. The remedial order, of course, will accord Alaskan Star employees such access by union organizers wherever the vessel is located to avoid multiple litigation, insofar as possible and desirable, should the Alaskan Star have been moved since the hearing, or is moved following the decision.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[8]

ORDER

The Respondent, North Star Drilling Company, Ltd., Houston, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Continuing or giving effect to its policy barring nonemployee organizers from access to employees on its vessel the Alaskan Star for the purpose of soliciting them during their free time on behalf of the National Maritime Union of America, AFL–CIO, or any other labor organization, or for consulting, advising, meeting, or assisting the employees regarding their rights to self-organization, provided, however, that nothing shall be construed to prohibit the Respondent from making and enforcing reasonable regulations concerning visits to its vessel by such nonemployee union organizers, or from providing suitable off-premises access to organizers, as described in the remedy section of this decision as full compliance with the recommended Order.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights to self-organization, to form labor organizations, to join or assist National Maritime Union of America, AFL–CIO, or any other labor organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from engaging in such activities.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its premises in Houston, Texas, and at employee transfer points and on board its Alaskan Star, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[9] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[8] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[9] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

August 11, 1988

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER REMANDING

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On December 30, 1985, Administrative Law Judge Lowell Georlich issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief to the Respondent's exceptions. The Respondent filed a reply to the General Counsel's motion to strike its exceptions and to the General Counsel's limited cross-exceptions.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[1] findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that the Respondent's offer of reinstatement to discriminatee Sara Eichelberger contained in its November 23, 1982 letter was invalid and that Eichelberger was therefore entitled to backpay through June 30, 1984, when the Respondent made a valid offer of reinstatement to her.

We cannot agree with the judge's conclusion and, for the reasons set forth below, have decided it is necessary to modify current Board law regarding a discriminatee's duty to respond to an offer of reinstatement once it has been made.

As credited by the judge, the letter sent to Eichelberger, dated November 23, 1982, was signed by the Respondent's vice president of operations and stated:

> Please be informed that the company is offering you immediate reinstatement of employment of the same position you last held with the Company or a comparative position.
> You are to report to work Wednesday, November 24, 1982.

Eichelberger received the letter later that same day, November 23, 1982, but did not communicate with the Respondent.[2] She ultimately returned to work on July 2, 1984, in response to a second offer of reinstatement dated June 27, 1984.

The judge found that the time allotted for Eichelberger to report to work was wholly inadequate and that the Respondent's letter of November 23, 1982, was therefore not a valid offer of reinstatement. In so finding the judge relied on prior Board precedent as enunciated in such cases as Penco Enterprises, 216 NLRB 734 (1975); Murray Products, 228 NLRB 268 (1977), enfd. 584 F.2d 934, 940 (9th Cir. 1978); Brenal Electric, 271 NLRB 1557 (1984); and Fredeman's Calcasieu Locks Shipyard, 208 NLRB 839 (1974).

In Penco Enterprises, the Board reiterated its policy that a discriminatee, on receiving an offer of reinstatement, has a "fundamental right to a reasonable time to consider whether to return."[3] There is no rule on the period of time that will constitute reasonable notice to the discriminatee, however, and as the Board noted in Fredeman's Calcasieu Locks Shipyard, what constitutes a "reasonable time" will depend essentially on the situation in which an employee finds himself.[4] Significantly, the Board added, "obviously, if there is no valid reason for a discriminatee's not being able to return to work at the fixed date, we will likely view that date as dispositive of the issue." Nevertheless, under established Board precedent, the burden does not shift to the discriminatee to contact the employer and request additional time. Rather, it has been our view that such a requirement places an undue and unwarranted burden on the discriminatee to make a counterproposal. Harrah's Club, 158 NLRB 758, 759 at fn. 1 (1966), revd. in pertinent part 403 F.2d 865 (9th Cir. 1968).

We have reconsidered the question regarding a discriminatee's duty to respond to an offer of reinstatement because several courts that have reviewed the Board's current rule have rejected it. The reasons for rejecting the Board's current rule

[1] The General Counsel has filed a motion to strike the Respondent's exceptions. We deny the General Counsel's motion.

As part of the remedy the General Counsel seeks an order which will include a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing the Order. We have concluded that under the circumstances of this case such a clause is not warranted. Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[2] On receiving the letter, Eichelberger telephoned Board Agent Thomas Stefanic, but was unable to reach him until the following day. According to Eichelberger's testimony, when she did speak with Stefanic on November 24, he asked her if the letter directed her to call the Respondent and talk to its vice president of operations, Ray Rambler. When she replied it did not, he told her not to worry about it and that he would talk to the Respondent's attorney. Stefanic further stated that, "it may be just a way of tolling wages."

[3] See also Highland Plastics, 256 NLRB 146, 159 (1981); Mid-County Transit Mix, 264 NLRB 782, 792 (1982); Brenal Electric, 271 NLRB 1557 (1984).

[4] With regard to an offer that demands the employee accept and return to work on the same day he receives it, the Board has stated, "[t]hat would, except in unusual circumstances, be an unreasonable condition to which we would not require strict compliance by the employee; nor would we find such an offer to have terminated the backpay period." Fredeman's Calasieu Locks Shipyard at 839.

were best stated by the Tenth Circuit in NLRB v. Betts Baking Co., 428 F.2d 156, 158 (1970):[5]

> Both employer and employee are bound by the requirement of good faith dealings with each other. And it does not place an undue burden on the employee to require him to inform his employer of his intentions concerning reinstatement within a reasonable time after notice.

Thus, the court in Betts reasoned that an offer of reinstatement is not rendered invalid simply because it affords the discriminatee what may be regarded as an unreasonably short period of time in which to consider it. We agree.

When a discriminatee receives a letter that unconditionally offers reinstatement and that also states a report-back date, we will not find the offer invalid simply because the specified reporting date appears unreasonably short. The offer will be treated as invalid, however, if the letter on its face makes it clear that reinstatement is dependent on the employee's returning on the specified date or if the letter otherwise suggests that the offer will lapse if a decision on reinstatement is not made by that date. If the letter does not expressly condition the offer on compliance with the report-back date, the discriminatee cannot know, until he or she calls the employer, whether that date is inflexible and whether a reasonable time for making a decision on the offer will be granted. Similarly, until the discriminatee replies, the employer cannot know when the discriminatee would be able to return.

A discriminatee who receives an offer that is invalid under the rule just stated will not have backpay tolled as a result of failure to respond, since there has been no valid offer to trigger a response. A discriminatee who receives an otherwise valid offer, however, cannot rely on the mere inclusion of an unreasonably short report-back date in the letter to justify a failure to make some response to the employer, if only to ask for more time to consider the offer. A failure to make such a response within a reasonable time after the offer has been made will toll the running of backpay.[6] This approach, we believe, satisfies the "requirement of good faith dealings" properly imposed on both employer and employee.

In the instant case, discriminatee Eichelberger received a letter on November 23, 1982, unconditionally offering her reinstatement and directing her to report to work the next day. The letter did not state that the offer would lapse if she was unable either to report the next day or to commence work then or soon thereafter. Yet she gave the Employer no clue why she could not respond to that offer; indeed, she made no response at all. In these circumstances, we will toll Eichelberger's backpay as of a reasonable time after this unconditional offer of reinstatement was made.

In determining what constitutes a "reasonable time," we find that the Respondent's existing policies and agreements governing bargaining unit members are helpful.[7] Thus we find that the Respondent's reinstatement offer to Eichelberger dated November 23, 1982, remained open for 10 days thereafter, at which time its backpay liability was tolled.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that this proceeding is remanded to the Regional Director for Region 6 for the purpose of recalculating Eichelberger's backpay in accordance with our decision above.[8]

[5] The Ninth Circuit also rejected this rule. Harrah's Club, supra. See also Consolidated Freightways v. NLRB, 669 F.2d 790, 796 fn. 11 (D.C. Cir. 1981), noting that where an offer contains a time condition on acceptance, "courts look to the reasons why an employee failed to accept the offer of reinstatement within the time imposed by the employer before inquiring into whether the time condition is unreasonable."

[6] To the extent that Harrah's Club, supra, and other like cases are inconsistent with the analysis set forth; they are overruled.

[7] The Respondent submitted evidence that its standard practice with respect to recalls from layoffs of bargaining-unit members was to consider that a recalled employee had rejected the recall offer and become a voluntary quit unless he failed to return within 10 days of the postal date on the notice; an employee who was unable to return in that time because of illness and disability was only under a duty to give notice of such illness or disability within that period. Eichelberger was not a bargaining-unit member, and the judge found no credible evidence that she had ever been advised that the 10-day policy would apply to her. The judge thus rejected the suggestion that the policy governed the Respondent's offer to her as "spurious and an afterthought." Although we agree with the judge that this policy was not directly applicable to Eichelberger, we find that 10 days also is a reasonable time for our purposes here.

[8] The General Counsel's exhibits include, inter alia, backpay computations for the third and fourth calendar quarters of 1982. We note that the revised backpay calculation will include all the net backpay for the third quarter of 1982 and that portion of the $4482.52 net backpay for the fourth quarter of 1982 that accrues up to and including December 3, 1982.

DECISION IN BACKPAY PROCEEDING

LOWELL GOERLICH, Administrative Law Judge. On 9 August 1985 a backpay specification and notice of hearing was issued alleging that a controversy had arisen over the amount of backpay due under the terms of the Board's Order.[1]

[1] 270 NLRB 658.

On 18 October 1985 the matter came on for hearing at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, on the backpay specification and the answers of the Respondent, Nuclear Automation Division of Esterline Electronics Corporation. Each party was afforded a full opportunity to be heard; to call, examine, and cross-examine witnessess; to argue orally on the record: to submit proposed findings of fact and conclusions; and to file briefs. All briefs have been carefully considered.

FINDINGS OF FACT,[2] CONCLUSIONS, AND REASONS

Neither the formula nor the method used in the calculation of the discriminatee's backpay is disputed. The controversy is whether a letter sent by the Respondent on 23 November 1982 and received by the discriminatee on 24 November 1982 between 1 and 3 p.m. cut off backpay on 24 November 1982 because the discriminatee did not return to work in response to the offer of reinstatement set forth in the letter.

The letter is as follows:

November 23, 1982

Mrs. Sara Eichelberger
1311 Hillview Ave.
North Huntingdon, PA 15642
Certified Mail PO1 1662540

Sara,

Please be informed that the company is offering you immediate reinstatement of employment of the same position you last held with the company or a comparative position.

You are to report to work Wednesday, November 24, 1982.

Very truly yours,
NUCLEAR AUTOMATION
/s/ H. Ray Rambler
Vice President of Operations

The discriminatee did not respond to the letter by returning to work as directed.[3] The discriminatee returned to work on 2 July 1984 in response to a letter from the Respondent dated 27 June 1984. Thus the sole issue before me is whether the Respondent's letter to the discriminatee dated 23 November 1982 was a valid unconditional offer to return to work, which tolled the discriminatee's backpay. If the letter is found to be an invalid offer to which the discriminatee was not legally obligated to respond, then all else is immaterial since the discriminatee was legally required only to respond to a valid offer of reinstatement. Cf. Burnup & Sims, Inc., 157 NLRB 366 (1966), enfd. 383 F.2d 987 (5th Cir. 1967).[4]

"The Board has long held that "[o]nly when a proper offer is made and unequivocally rejected by the employees is the employer relieved of his statutory duty to reinstate." W. C. Mcquaide, 239 NLRB 671 (1978).

A situation comparable to the facts in the instant case was considered by the Board in the case of Penco Enterprises, 216 NLRB 734 (1975). In that case the discriminatee received a letter dated 10 March 1972 on 13 March 1972 offering reinstatement that contained this language, "We request you report for work 7:00 a.m. on Tuesday March 14, 1972." The Board found that the letter was not a valid offer of reinstatement. The Board opined (216 NLRB at 734, 735):

> More importantly, however, it is clear that no matter what interpretation is given to the third paragraph,[5] Respondent's letter provided Mooney only 1 day at the most to decide whether to accept the offer of reinstatement. It is also clear that a discriminatee, upon receiving an offer of reinstatement, has a fundamental right to a reasonable time to consider whether to return, While we do not attempt to precribe what is reasonable in every circumstance, we do not view the time alloted herein as reasonable. Mooney would have had to inform Respondent of his intentions the same day he received the letter or else report for work the following morning. We find this totally inadequate.

Applying this reasoning of the Board, I find that in the instant case the time allotted for Eichelberger to report for work was wholly inadequate and thus the Respondent did not make a valid offer of reinstatement to her by its letter of 23 November 1982.[6] See also Standard Tank Cleaning Corp., 197 NLRB 873 (1972); Murray Products, 228 NLRB 268 (1977); Brenal Electric, 271 NLRB 1557 (1984); Michael M. Schaefer, 246 NLRB 181 (1979); Fredemen's Calcasieu Locks Shipyard, 208 NLRB 839 (1974). In the latter case the Board said the most extreme example of this kind of offer is one that demands the employee to accept it and return to work on the same day he receives it." In the instant case since the normal reporting time was 8:30 a.m. the discriminatee was given less than 24 hours to return to her job.

Because I have found that the Respondent's offer of reinstatement contained in its 23 November letter was invalid, and that the Respondent has not contested the backpay computations of the General Counsel, I find that there is due and owing the discriminatee Eichelberger $36,036.88, plus interest accrued thereon to the date of payment, minus social security and income tax

[2] The facts found are based on the record as a whole and the observation of the witnesses.

[3] On receiving the letter the discriminatee telephoned Board Agent Thomas Stefanic on the afternoon of 23 November 1982, but was unable to reach him until the next day. After the discriminatee related the contents of the letter to Stefanic, Stefanic told her "not to worry . . . he would talk to Mr. Hewitt" (the Respondent's attorney) and that he "felt" that it was "just a way of tolling wages."

[4] In Harrah's Club, 158 NLRB 758 fn. 1 (1966), the Board opined "[t]he reinstatement obligation properly rest with Respondent and is satisfied only by a valid and unconditional offer of reinstatement."

[5] The third paragraph, "In the event you do not wish to return notify this office by phone, or mail on Monday March 13, 1972, or we must remove your name from the recall list." (216 NLRB 734.)

[6] The Respondent claims that the discriminatee had at least a 10-day period to respond to the offer, during which period alternative arrangements could have been made for her convenience. deductions, if any, as required by state and Federal laws, as set forth in the specification.[7]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of the law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[8]

ORDER

The Respondent, Nuclear Automation Division of Esterline Electronics Corporation, North Huntingdon, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall pay to Sara Blanche Eichelberger the sum of $36,038.88, plus interest[9] accrued there on to the date of payment, social security and income tax deductions, if any, as required by state and Federal laws.[10]

[7] I have examined the cases relied on by the Respondent and because of the cases cited above I find them inapposite.

[8] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[9] Interest is to be computed as provided in the enforced Order.

[10] I find no present need for recommending the visitatorial clauses requested by the General Counsel.

August 15, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

Upon a charge filed by the Union, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint May 2, 1988, against the Respondent alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act.

The complaint alleges that since March 18, 1988, the Respondent has demanded, as a condition of conducting second-step grievance meetings, that the Union agree to audiotape recording of the meetings. On May 17, 1988, the Respondent filed its answer admitting in part and denying in part the allegations in the complaint.

On June 6, 1988, the General Counsel filed with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment asserting that the Respondent's answer does not place in issue any factual allegations and raises only a question of law.

On June 9, 1988, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Company filed a response, and the Union filed a brief supporting the General Counsel's motion.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

The complaint alleges that the Union is the recognized exclusive collective-bargaining representative of an appropriate unit;[1] that the Respondent and the Union are parties to a collective-bargaining agreement that expires November 30, 1989; that since March 18, 1988, the Respondent has demanded, as a condition of conducting second-step grievance meetings, that the Union permit audiotape recording of the meetings; that this condition is a nonmandatory subject of bargaining; and that since March 18, 1988, the Respondent has insisted to impasse on this demand. The Respondent's answer to the complaint states that "the allegations as contained in the Complaint are substantially true except that [the Respondent] denies that the activities as described therein is an unfair labor practice." Thus, the Respondent's answer admits the factual allegations in the complaint.

We have found that insisting to impasse on the use of a recording device during a grievance meeting constitutes an unlawful insistence on a nonmandatory subject of bargaining in violation of the duty to bargain in good faith.[2] Accordingly, the Respondent has admitted all the facts material to a resolution of the unfair labor practice issues raised by the complaint. There being no material facts in dispute, and in the absence of any cause to the contrary having been shown by the Respondent, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, a corporation, is engaged in the production and distribution of potable water at a facility in Butler County, Ohio, where it annually derives gross revenues in excess of $250,000, and purchases and receives at its facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Ohio. We find that the Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Since March 18, 1988, the Respondent has demanded, as a condition of conducting second-step grievance meetings, that the Union permit audiotape recording of the meetings, and since March 18, 1988, the Respondent has insisted to impasse on that demand. By their conduct, we find that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Pennsylvania Telephone Guild, supra; Hutchinson Fruit, supra.

[1] The appropriate unit is:
All full-time and part-time employees including, but not limited to, equipment operators, maintenance employees, water treatment plant employees, meter readers, janitorial employees, warehousemen, and all other production and maintenance employees. Excluded from the bargaining unit are all office clerical employees, purchasing agents, staking engineers, managerial employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

[2] See Pennsylvania Telephone Guild, 277 NLRB 501 (1985), enfd. 799 F.2d 84 (3d Cir. 1986), and Hutchinson Fruit Co., 277 NLRB 497 (1985). We decline to follow the Respondent's suggestion that we overrule these cases.

The Eighth Circuit's decision in NLRB v. Southern Transport, 355 F.2d 978 (8th Cir. 1966), relied on by the Respondent, is not controlling. As the Tenth Circuit stated in NLRB v. Bartlett-Collins Co., 639 F.2d 652, 658 (10th Cir. 1981), cert. denied 454 U.S. 961 (1981), Southern Transport did speak favorably of stenographic recording of bargaining sessions, but this was in relation to the court's decision that the insisting party's demand had been made in good faith. The Eighth Circuit did not consider whether the matter constituted a mandatory subject of bargaining.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

By insisting to impasse on and after March 18, 1988, on the use of a recording device during grievance meetings, the Company has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by insisting to impasse on the use of a recording device during grievance meetings, we shall order the Respondent to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, The Water Association, Butler County, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain in good faith with the United Paperworkers International Union, Local 1967, AFL–CIO by insisting to impasse on the use of a recording device during grievance meetings.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request by the United Paperworkers International Union, Local 1967, AFL–CIO, as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit set forth below, bargain in good faith by meeting, processing, and discussing with the Union grievances filed pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement. The appropriate unit is:

> All full-time and part-time employees including, but not limited to, equipment operators, maintenance employees, water treatment plant employees, meter readers, janitorial employees, warehousemen, and all other production and maintenance employees. Excluded from the bargaining unit are all office clerical employees, purchasing agents, staking engineers, managerial employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

(b) Post at its place of business in Butler County, Ohio, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by the Respondent's representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain in good faith with the United Paperworkers International Union, Local 1967, AFL–CIO by insisting to impasse on the use of a recording device during grievance meetings.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request by the Union, as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit set forth below, bargain in good faith by meeting, processing, and discussing with the Union grievances filed pursuant to the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement in effect between ourselves and the Union. The appropriate unit is:

> All full-time and part-time employees including, but not limited to, equipment operators, maintenance employees, water treatment plant employees, meter readers, janitorial employees, warehousemen, and all other production and maintenance employees. Excluded from the bargaining unit are all office clerical employees, purchasing agents, staking engineers, managerial employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

August 16, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On December 11, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Howard I. Grossman issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a brief in support, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions,[2] to modify the remedy,[3] and to adopt the recommended Order.[4]

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] In adopting the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by locking out its employees, we note that the lockout was implemented following the Respondent's repeated, unlawful refusals to provide the Union with information it had requested for bargaining. Within the context of these preexisting unfair labor practices, the Respondent's subsequent lockout of its employees may not be found legitimate.

Similarly, the Respondent's failure to provide the Union with crucial information central to bargaining renders unlawful its December 8, 1986 meetings with employees. While it is true, as the Respondent contends, that an employer may properly meet outside the presence of the union in order to explain its contract proposals directly to its employees, this is not so when the employer, as the Respondent has done here, has denied the Union the very information it needed to evaluate those same proposals during negotiations. In such circumstances, the Respondent's dialogue with employees is not a privileged communication under Sec. 8(c) of the Act, but rather is an effort at circumventing its obligation to deal with the exclusive representative of those employees. Accordingly, we agree with the finding that the Respondent thereby violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Cf. United Technologies, 274 NLRB 609, 610 (1985), enfd. 789 F.2d 121 (2d Cir. 1986).

[3] Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide at the adjudicatory stage of a proceeding for the addition of interest at a fixed rate on unlawfully withheld fund payments. We leave to the compliance stage the question of whether Respondent must pay any additional amounts into the benefit funds in order to satisfy our "make whole" remedy. These additional amounts may be determined depending on the circumstances of each case, by reference to provisions in the documents governing the funds at issue and, where there are no governing provisions, to evidence of any loss directly attributable to the unlawful withholding action, which might include the loss of return on investment of the portion of funds withheld, additional administrative costs, etc., but not collateral losses. See Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 fn. 7 (1979).

[4] The General Coounsel's request for a visitatorial clause is denied in the absence of any evidence indicating a likelihood that the Respondent will attempt to evade compliance. Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Globe Business Furniture, Inc., Hendersonville, Tennessee, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Jane Vandeventer, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Charles Hampton White and Richard L. Colbert, Esqs. (Cornelius & Collins), of Nashville, Tennessee, for the Respondent.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HOWARD I. GROSSMAN, Administrative Law Judge. The charge was filed on 10 December 1986,[1] a first amended charge on 18 December, and a second amended charge on 23 January 1987, by Local 2338, Southern Council of Industrial Workers, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO[2] (the Union), and complaint issued on 27 January 1987. As amended at the hearing, it alleges that Globe Business Furniture, Inc. (Respondent or the Company) refused to furnish the Union with information on (1) its employees' addresses, telephone numbers, sex, ages, and marital status; (2) insurance costs, including present insurance cost and the past 2 years' loss experience, and factors used in determining Respondent's projected costs and rationale for increase in costs; and (3) Respondent's previous employee turnover, including documentation thereof. Further, the complaint alleges that the Company bypassed the Union and dealt directly with its employees by soliciting them to accept the Company's bargaining proposals. The foregoing actions are alleged to be violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

Further, the complaint alleges that Respondent engaged in a lockout of its employees in an attempt to modify a collective-bargaining agreement to which it and the Union were parties, and otherwise to undermine the Union, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

A hearing was held before me on these matters on 27, 28, and 29 April 1987 in Nashville, Tennessee, and the General Counsel and Respondent thereafter submitted briefs. On the entire record, and on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is an Indiana corporation with an office and place of business in Hendersonville, Tennessee, where it is engaged in the manufacture of furniture. During the 12-month period ending 26 January 1987, Respondent sold and shipped from its Hendersonville, Tennessee place of business products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of Tennessee, and purchased and received at the place of business goods and materials exceeding the aforesaid amount in value directly from points outside the State of Tennessee. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The pleadings establish that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Relationship Between the Parties

Since 1963 the Union has been the collective-bargaining represenative of Respondent's employees in a unit of production and maintenance, tool room, and shipping and receiving employees. The parties have entered into a series of collective-bargaining agreements and are currently parties to such an agreement, which was effective on 18 December 1986 and expires accordingly to its terms on 1 December 1989.[3] The issues in this proceeding concern events preceding and following the expiration of the prior agreement, on 1 December 1986.[4]

B. Bargaining in November

1. Summary of the evidence

a. Union's bargaining demand and request for information

By letter dated 2 September 1986, Ray White, executive secretary of the Southern Council of Industrial Workers, informed Company Vice President Frank Patterson that the Union desired to modify the then existing agreement, and requested the Company to begin negotiations with White's assistant, Timothy Byrd. White's letter also requested Patterson to furnish Byrd with the names, addresses, phone numbers, classifications, and wage rates of all employees, together with the age, sex, and marital status of each employee, the number of single and family insurance plans, and a complete breakdown on present insurance cost plus the past 2 years' loss experience.[5]

Company Industrial Relations Manager Danny Bates responded a few days later with a letter to Byrd. Bates stated that it would take him "a while" to get all the requested information, and that he might be unable to get some of it. In the meantime, Bates suggested that negotiations begin on 6 November.[6] In a later telephone conversation between Bates and Byrd, the former requested that the date be changed to 7 November.[7] The bargaining sessions in November principally concerned noneconomic matters.

b. The 7 November meeting

The meeting was held at the Gallatin City Electric Company, about 10–12 miles from Hendersonville.

The Union was represented by Byrd as chief spokesman, Local Union President Willie Jenkins, Chief Union Steward Clifford Wilkinson, and Local Union treasurer Dorothy White. The last three individuals were company employees. Respondent was represented by Vice President Patterson and Industrial Relations Director Bates.

Byrd testified that the Union submitted proposed written changes in the contract. A preprinted topic entitled "Article 22—Insurance" was followed by the comment "See Attachment." However, there was no attachment pertaining to insurance.[8] According to Byrd, he told the Company's representatives that the Union was unable to make a proposal on insurance because the Company had not provided the information requested in White's letter. This information was needed, Byrd informed the Company, so that the Union could get a competitive "bid" on insurance from the Southern Council of Industrial Workers Trust Fund. Byrd went over the information requested in White's letter. According to Byrd, the Company gave no reason for not having the information—Patterson merely shrugged his shoulders. However, Byrd affirmed that Bates said that the Company would give the information to Union President Jenkins within a few days so that the latter could forward it to Bryd.

Company Vice President Patterson agreed that the Union asked for the information requested in White's letter, but contended that Industrial Relations Director Bates submitted it in a handwritten note. Although Bates was called as a witness by Respondent, he did not testify about insurance discussions at the 7 November meeting—except to deny that there was any request for insurance information concerning unit employees until 13 December. Byrd agreed that he received a note, but at the next meeting. Patterson also contended that the Union's proposed modifications of the contract were submitted at a meeting on 17 November, and that the Union's reason for the absence of an insurance proposal was that it had not had time to get a bid from the Union's trust fund—not that it had been prevented from doing so by the Company's failure to provide the requested information.

c. The 17 November meeting

At the next meeting, on 17 November, the parties were represented by the same individual. According to Byrd, corroborated by Union President Jenkins and Chief Steward Wilkinson, the Union informed the Company's representatives that they had not yet provided the insurance information requested in White's letter of 2 September. In the absence of this information, the Union proposed a general increase in medical benefits, plus a dental plan. As indicated, Byrd agreed that Bates gave him a note; it indicated, according to Bryd, that the Company had paid insurance claims of more than $400,000 in 1985 and $438,000 in 1986. Also, the sheet of paper showed over 200 single employee plans, and over 300 family plans, a total of about 540. Byrd affirmed that he again asked for the information requested by White's letter, and that Patterson and Bates said they would have it the next day.

As indicated, Patterson gave a different chronology of events. In addition to asserting that the Union's proposals on contract modification were submitted at the 17 November meeting, he contended that there was no more discussion of insurance (i.e., no renewal of the Union's request for insurance information). On the other hand, Patterson also contended that on 17 November he gave Byrd a letter to the Company from Corroon & Black, the administrator of the Company's self-funded insurance plan.[9] Byrd denied seeing this letter before the hearing, and affirmed that he saw only a handwritten note from Bates.

d. The 18 November meeting

The same represenatatives met the next day, 18 November. Byrd testified that he then told Bates that the Company total of more than 500 unit employees—over 200 single and over 300 married employees—was false, and that Bates gave no reply. The Union argued that the Company's totals must have included nonunit employees such as clericals, and employees at the Company's wholly owned subsidiary, Summer Manufacturing, located at Franklin, Kentucky. Byrd demanded the insurance costs and employee totals only for unit employees at the Hendersonville plant. Bates called his office, and said that the unit complement was 377. Chief Steward Wilkinson agreed with this figure.

Company Vice President Patterson denied that there was any discussion of insurance or a request for insurance information at the 18 November meeting.

e. The 19 November meeting and comments by Company's chief financial officer

On the next day, 19 November, the Company's vice president in charge of finance, James Mills, attended the meeting. According to Byrd, corroborated by Wilkinson, Mills discussed company finances, and said that the medical insurance cost was either $1.40 or $1.46 hourly per employee.[10] The Union multiplied the number of employees in the plant times $1.40 times the number of work hours yearly, and came up with an asserted company cost of about $1.2 million for medical insurance. The Union's representative doubted the accuracy of this figure, and asked Mills whether it was true. He asserted that it was. The Union protested the discrepancy between the prior year's cost, $438,000, and the $1.2 million projection claimed by the Company.

Chief Steward Wilkinson testified that he told the Company that they as well as the Union knew that their $1.2 million figure was "ridiculous." Patterson agreed that the figure was high and said that he would try to get to Corroon & Black in a day or two, and get the matter "straightened out." Byrd affirmed that Patterson promised the information the next day.

Company Vice President Patterson acknowledged that Mills spoke at the 19 November meeting and gave "projected financial information." However, Patterson denied that there was any discussion of insurance or any request for insurance information. The Union asked to see the Company's audited financial statements. Mills did not testify.

f. The 20 November meeting

On 20 November the Company made its economic proposals to the Union.[11] They continued to include Company-paid insurance, but increased the employee deductible over that in the previous plan.[12] Whereas the Company paid for dependent coverage under the then existing plan, proposed that employees pay for this expense under the new contract.[13]

As shown hereinafter, these proposals were changed to an offer that the only employee payment for dependent coverage would be by "temporary" employees, and that this would be restricted to one-half the cost of such coverage. Whereas the old contract paid for all insurance costs (up to specified limits) for dependents and employees who had completed their "probationary periods," the Company's new proposal was that employees would first be covered after 120 days of employment, but that "new" employees would be required to pay one-half of the cost of their dependent coverage. The witnesses occasionally substituted "temporary" for "new" employees in identifying those employees who would be required to pay one-half of dependent coverage.

According to Byrd, the Union could not determine the actual cost for dependent coverage for new or temporary employees without getting some explanation from the Company for the difference between the $438,000 last-year cost figure, and Mills' projection of about $1.2 million for the next year. Although the Union asked for an explanation, the Company gave no answer. Byrd testified that Patterson just shrugged his shoulders, and that Bates said the Company could not get the information. Byrd responded to Bates that the latter could get information on insurance costs for every unit employee at Hendersonville from Corroon & Black. Bates again denied that he could get the information, and Byrd replied that Bates knew he could, that all Corroon & Black had to do was "punch their computer a couple of times" and get the information.

In addition, the Union requested information from the Company on the amount of savings that it would achieve as a result of its economic proposals.

[9] The letter, dated 30 October, states that the Company's medical insurance expenses in 1985 for "Globe employees" were about $432,000, and in 1986 about $438,000. "Projected" expenses for 1987 were about $91 for each employee and about $245 for each family (R. Exh. 1).

[10] Chief Steward Wilkinson testified that Mills gave $1.40 as the hourly cost.

[11] G.C. Exh. 8.

[12] G.C. Exh. 2, art. 22.

[13] G.C. Exh. 8.

Patterson testified that the parties agreed on language changes, and that the Union wanted to know the projected savings from the Company's economic proposal.

g. Union's request for insurance costs and other information concerning unit employees

As noted, the Union questioned the Company's projected insurance costs, based in part on its belief that those costs included nonunit employees. Wilkinson testified that the Union on 18 November requested costs only for unit employees.[14]

In an apparent effort to prove that the Union knew or could have learned the number of unit employees and thus their insurance costs, Industrial Relations Manager Bates testified about union access to timeclocks and timecards in the plant, and six union stewards. The existing contract had a checkoff provision, and the Company provided a union steward with a weekly checkoff report.[15] In addition, according to Bates, the Company distributes a seniority list twice yearly to the union president and a steward, and posts it on all three of the Company's bulletin boards.[16] Finally, a weekly seniority list is distributed to all supervisors. Bates agreed that salaried employees had a better health plan than hourly employees, and that the benefits were paid differently.

Union President Jenkins testified that there were 70–80 employees in the bargaining unit who were not members of the Union, and whose names were not on the checkoff list. Tennessee is a right-to-work state. He testified that he saw all three of the Company's bulletin boards daily during the last 4 months of 1986, and never saw an employee seniority list. The Union's president affirmed that he asked Bates for one in late 1986. Jenkins further testified that he could have obtained a list at any time—which he explained by saying that he got one, without management approval, from an office clerical. Jenkins asked Bates for a copy of the foreman's seniority roster, but never received one.

Examination of the Company's checkoff printouts supplied to the Union and the seniority lists assertedly posted on the bulletin boards shows that neither of these documents indicated the employees' addresses, telephone numbers, sex, age, or marital status.[17]

Chief Steward Wilkinson testified that he had access to the checkoff lists and the timecards, and from the latter could have counted the number of unit employees. Wilkinson stated that he agreed with Bates that the total of 377 unit employees was accurate, and that it was this figure that the Union used in its computation that Mills' $1.40 hourly insurance amount meant a total insurance cost of $1.2 million to the Company.

[14] I do not credit Bates' testimony that the Union first asked for unit insurance costs on 13 December. In addition to Wilkinson's explicit testimony, it is obvious from White's original demand letter that he was asking for information pertaining to unit employees. Patterson admitted that he knew the parties were negotiating only about unit employees.

2. Factual analysis

Union spokesman Byrd was a credible witness with good recall of the events. In addition, he was corroborated on various points by other union witnesses. The only company witness who testified about these events, Vice President Patterson, was inconsistent at times and was uncorroborated. Thus, Patterson's assertion that there was no discussion of insurance at the 17 November meeting is inconsistent with his claim that he then gave a copy of the Corroon & Black letter concerning that subject to union spokesman Byrd. In the absence of any testimony from Financial Officer Mills, I credit the union witnesses that Mills discussed company finances including projected insurance costs of 19 November. Patterson agreed that Mills gave "projected financial information," but denied that he discussed insurance. I do not credit this denial, or Patterson's other denials that the Union requested insurance information. I conclude that the Union on various occasions repeated the request for information in White's letter and told the Company the reason it needed this information—in order to get a competitive bid from the union trust fund. It is unnecessary to determine whether the Union's proposal was made on 7 or 17 November, although it is probable that Byrd was correct in affirming that it was given on the earlier date.

As set forth above, White's letter asked for various items of information about employees, the number of single and family insurance plans, and the past 2 years' loss experience. Additional requests for information were made during the November negotiations based on the Company's profered information—the costs specifically attributable to unit employees, and the reasons for the Company's projected increase in costs from about $438,000 to about $1.2 million annually.

The testimony of Byrd and Wilkinson corroborates the Company's evidence that it gave the Union a handwritten note with the 1985 and 1986 loss experience based on the Corroon & Black letter.[18] However, the letter specifies that it concerns the benefit plans of "Globe employees," not unit employees. The fact that this loss figure includes nonunit employees is further established by the Company's assertion of about 540 insurance plans—far more than the 377 employees that, Bates agreed, were in the unit. Such individuals included salaried employees who, according to Bates, had a better plan with benefits that were paid differently. It follows that the cost figures given to the Union in November did not portray the prior insurance costs of unit employees for two reasons—the figures included nonunit employees, and the latter had a different benefit plan.

Based on all the evidence, I conclude that there were 377 employees in the unit at the time of these negotiations. However, it does not follow that the Union would have been able to compute the prior insurance costs for unit employees even if it had had a reliable cost figure for all company employees—the variation in cost between unit and nonunion employees was such that a unit cost figure based on the proportion of unit employees

[18] R. Exh. 1.

(377) to total employees (540) would have been inaccurate.

Further, the Company claimed a "projected" cost for the forthcoming year with an increase from $438,000 to about $1.2 million. This was not explained by the Company despite the Union's request for clarification.

I therefore conclude that, through November, the Company did not provide any of the information requested by the Union, either in White's 2 September letter, or during negotiations. However, the parties did agree on various noneconomic matters.

C. Bargaining in Early December

1. The 1 December meeting, the Union's rejection of the Company's proposal, and the extension agreement

The period between the 20 November meeting and the 1 December meeting included the Thanksgiving holiday. Union spokesman Byrd testified that he had other union business on the first 3 days of that week. However, Byrd affirmed, he offered to meet with the Company on the weekend before 1 December (a Monday), when the existing contract was scheduled to expire. The Company refused to, according to Byrd. Patterson denied this, and asserted that he offered to meet on Thanksgiving Day, the following Friday, or the weekend. Byrd was the more credible witness and I accept his version.

On Monday, 1 December, the Union advised the Company at the meeting that union spokesman Byrd would be available through Thursday of that week but would be unavailable on Friday because of other commitments.[19]

The Union submitted economic proposals,[20] as did the Company.[21] The latter included a new insurance provision that required all employees employed after 1 December 1986 (new employees) to complete 120 workday before being eligible for insurance benefits. Therefter, the Company would pay for new employees' insurance and the employee would pay for one-half of his dependents' coverage.[22] There was no change in coverage for existing employees. According to union spokesman Byrd, the Company said that it would save about $500,000 as a result of this proposal over a 5-year contract. Company Vice President Patterson testified that the savings would be $40,000 to $50,000, although the period in which they would be effected is not clear from the record.[23]

Byrd protested that the Company's stated insurance costs were not true, and asked why those costs would have increased over 60 percent from one year to the next. According to Byrd's uncontradicted testimony, the Company gave no response.[24]

The Union's membership rejected the Company's proposal on the evening of 1 December but voted to continue working during continued negotiations. Byrd called Patterson and requested a 15-day extension of the agreement. He conceded that he told Patterson that there would be a strike vote if the Company refused to extend the contract. Following a return call from Patterson, Byrd and other union representatives went to the plant in the evening and were presented with an extension agreement that provided that the extension would not go past midnight on 8 December, and that the exclusive issue to be discussed was the length of the contract. The Union demanded that this latter restriction on the remaining issues be omitted, and the Company agreed.[25]

2. The 2 December meeting

The Union continued to protest the validity of the Company's insurance costs, and the Company replied that they were based on "actuarial valuations." However, Patterson admitted that he told the Union that he would call Corroon & Black and get the dollar amount, based on actual loss experience, of the Company's proposal that new employees pay half the cost of dependent coverage.

The Union was also concerned about a "two-tier" employee system—the Company's hiring of "temporary" employees at lesser wage rates and benefits. The Company's 1 December proposal would have eliminated a prior restriction on the number of such employees.[26] In response to the Union's inquiry, the Company said that it planned to hire 100 temporary employees in the following year. The Union then asked for the Company's turnover rate during the past 3 years as a rationale for its projection of the hiring of temporary employees, and the Company promised to provide it the next day. The parties also discussed wages and other economic issues. Patterson agreed that Byrd said it was the Union's intention to negotiate without a strike.

3. The 3 December meeting

Bates told the Union that the Company had an 8–10-percent turnover rate, and that 40–50 employees annually had left the Company. Although Chief Steward Wilkinson said that he accepted this figure, Byrd testified that he told the Company it was "ridiculously high," and that the national average was less than 5 percent.

The Union continued to protest the accuracy of the Company's asserted insurance costs, and asked how much new employees would actually have to pay as their one-half share of the cost of dependent coverage.[27]

[21] G.C. Exh. 11.

[22] G.C. Exh. 11, art. 22.

[23] According to Patterson, the Company's proposal would achieve its greatest savings as a result of the insurance revision, with changes in wages, job classifications, and other categories resulting in lesser savings.

[24] On the same day, 1 December, the Union's auditor examined the Company's financial statement with Company Vice President Mills. Byrd testified on cross-examination that the Union's auditor could not determine the Company's financial status because the Company did not use "proper accounting procedures." However, the Union did not raise the issue again, and the Company's financial status was not an issue thereafter.

[25] G.C. Exh. 12.

[26] G.C. Exh. 11, art. 15, sec. 14.

[27] According to Patterson, the Union made this request on 2 December, and he told them on 3 December that it would be no more than $75 to $76 monthly. However, he agreed that it was "excessive," and promised a lower figure based on "actual" costs.

Finally, the Union renewed its demand for the information requested in White's 2 September letter, and the Company promised to give it the next day.

4. The 4 December meeting

Byrd and Jenkins testified that the Company stated that one-half of dependent coverage for temporary employees would be about $75. This in turn was based on Corroon & Black's "projected" costs in their 30 October letter, which asserted a cost of about $91 for single employees and about $245 for family plans.[28] Byrd averred that the Company's reasoning on the $75 charge was as follows: "You take $91 from $244, that leaves you with $150, and you divide by two which is $75 and that is what the figure would be." This was one-half the single rate, according to Jenkins.[29]

The Union asked the Company to provide the information previously requested and the Company replied that they did not have it. At that point, there was a recess which the Uion prepared a letter to the Company requesting (1) documentation (a) that 377 was the correct number of unit employees, and (b) that the employees' turnover figures previously given were accurate; (2) the projected number of employees in 1987; (3) the projected number of temporary employees in the next 3 years and the means of arriving at this figure; and (4) a determination about the projected temporary employees would be in addition to the estimated unit complement of 377. In addition, the letter repeated the previously expressed discrepancies between the 1986 and projected 1987 insurance costs, and requested the factors used in figuring the 1987 projection as well as an explanation of the 60-percent increase.[30]

The Union then delivered this letter to Patterson. Byrd affirmed that he told the Company that the information was needed because of the effect that the Company's proposals would have on temporary employees and the insurance costs of new hires. According to Byrd, Patterson said that he would give the requested information to Union President Jenkins and other union officials on the following day. Patterson agreed on cross-examination that he told the Union he would provide a response the next day.[31]

According to Byrd, the meeting closed with his announcement that he had to leave town and would call the Company about the next meeting. Patterson contended that Byrd promised to call him back the same afternoon, and to have the next meeting either on the same day or the following day, 5 December. Byrd did not call, according to Patterson. Union President Jenkins, however, testified that Patterson was reminded on 4 December that he had been advised 3 days before that Byrd would be out of town on 5 December. Further, according to Jenkins, it was agreed on 4 December that Byrd would call Patterson on the morning of 8 December (a Monday) to arrange the next meeting. I credit Byrd's and Jenkins' testimony concerning the way in which the 4 December meeting ended.

After the meeting, Vice President Patterson asked Union President Jenkins for a meeting the next day, 5 December. Jenkins refused because Byrd was out of town. Patterson testified that Jenkins called early on 6 December stating that there could be no meeting because Byrd was out of town. Patterson also asserted various preparations for a 5 December meeting. Jenkins denied the call, and I do not credit Patterson's testimony—he knew on 4 December, or before, that Byrd would be out of town on 5 December and that there would be no meeting on that day.

5. Company's final proposal on 6 December and Union's rejection

Byrd returned home on the evening of 5 December and found messages from Patterson and Bates waiting for him on his telephone recorder. Patterson wanted a meeting on 6 December, and Bates left his work number. Patterson called Byrd early on Saturday, 6 December, and requested a meeting that day. Byrd responded that he had a meeting in the afternoon with Ray White and that evening with the negotiating committee. Patterson then said that he would deliver the Company's "final proposal" that morning to Jenkins and the other committee members. Byrd replied that, under these circumstances, the committee was not compelled to present the proposal to the membership. Byrd asked whether the Company had given Jenkins the information that it had promised on 4 December. Patterson replied that the Company had not done so. Byrd then responded to Patterson that the Company was not negotiating in good faith. He repeated the Union's need for the information. Union President Jenkins confirmed that he asked Bates for the requested information on the morning of 5 December, and that the latter said he did not have it.

Patterson and Bates personally went to Jenkins' home on Saturday morning, 6 December, and attempted to deliver a company proposal. Jenkins refused to receive it on the ground that the committee would have questions about it, but the Company's representatives left the proposal and a cover letter in Jenkins' mailbox and distributed copies to other committee members, including Byrd.[32]

The Company's proposal suggests various benefit increases for current employees, lesser benefits for employees hired after 1 December 1986, and other provisions. The Company's 1 December proposal that new employees pay one-half of the cost of insurance coverage for dependent[33] is amended to provide that the cost to the employees would be calcualted on the prior year's actual cost to the Company. However, there is nothing in the proposal itself to indicate the dollar value of that cost.[34]

[28] Supra, fn. 9.

[29] Without quarreling over the Company's arithmetic, its apparent reasoning was that subtraction of the cost of a single employee plan from the cost of a family plan resulted in the cost of dependent coverage, and that half this amount would be the Company's proposed expense to be paid by new employees. These figures are based on Corroon & Black's projected costs for 1987 rather than the actual costs for prior years (R. Exh. 1).

[30] G.C. Exh. i4.

[31] Patterson also contended that he could buy only estimate future sales and the number of employees.

[32] G.C. Exhs. 15 and 16.

[33] G.C. Exh. 11, art. 22.

[34] G.C. Exh. 15, sec. II, art. 22.

Although the prior agreement limited the Company to 15 temporary employees, after which it was required to advance the most senior temporary employees to probationary or full-time status,[35] the Company's 6 December proposal changed this to allow the Company 50 temporary employees, after which the most senior temporary employees would obtain "seniority right" only in the event of layoff or recall.[36]

The Union's membership met on Sunday, 7 December, and voted to reject the Company's proposal but to continue working and to send the negotiating committee back to the bargaining table. The issues preventing acceptance were the Company's proposal on new or temporary employees and on insurance. The lesser benefits for new or temporary employees would have created a "two-tier" employee system, and the insurance proposal was not understandable. Byrd read the latter proposal based on actual costs according to its terms, but told the members that the Company's proposed $75 charge was based on projected costs.[37]

D. Patterson's Meeting with Employees on 4 or 5 December

1. Summary of evidence

The complaint originally alleged that the Company attempted to bypass the Union and deal directly with employees by soliciting them on 8 December to accept the Company's bargaining proposals. The complaint was amended at hearing to allege 13 and 15 December as additional dates of such activity. Further, the record contains evidence of company meetings with employees about the bargaining on other dates.

Patterson testified that he had a "communications meeting" on 5 December with 16 to 20 "first shift employees" in which he explained the Company's 1 December proposal. The Company had received word from employees that they did not understand the proposal and believed that the Company was trying to cut benefits. At this meeting, various employees, including Randy Shehane, told the Company that it should "take" its proposal "to the employees."

Randy Shehane, a union vice president, testified on cross-examination that he had served "on something at the Company that is called a communications committee," which held monthly meetings with management. On 1 December, the Company's maintenance superintendent called union members out of the shop and asked them whether they understood the Company's proposal of that day. At a "communications meeting" on 4 December, there were various nonunion employees who had not attended union meetings and who stated that they did not understand the Company's 1 December proposal. Shehane himself said this, and agreed that it was possible that somebody at this meeting suggested that Patterson meet with employees and explain the proposal, although Shehane did not recall suggesting this himself.

2. Factual analysis

I credit Shehane's testimony that a superintendent called union members out of the shop on 1 December and asked them whether they understood the Company's proposal.

The record is not clear on the nature and function of the "communications committee." If it was a union committee, there appears to be no reason why its meetings with management would be attended by employees who not only were not members of the committee, but were not even union members. It is also unclear whether there was one meeting on 4 December, one on 5 December, or two meetings.

I conclude that on 4 or 5 December, Patterson addressed "first shift employees," as he testified, who for some reason were present at a management meeting with the communications committee. At this meeting, Patterson explained the Company's 1 December proposal. Some employees, including Shehane, suggested that he explain the proposal to employees. Patterson in fact had already done so at the meeting prior to receipt of this advice.

E. The Events of Monday, 8 December—Patterson's Further Meetings with Employees, His Conversation with Byrd, and the Lockout

1. The meetings with employees

a. Summary of the evidence

Patterson and Bates held various meetings with employees on 8 December. Shehane testified about a meeting with 50 to 60 press and maintenance employees that began about 10 a.m. and lasted about an hour. According to Shehane, Patterson said that the Union had "misled the membership," and that he wanted to explain the Company's proposal before the members voted on it.[38] In a question-and-answer period following his speech, Patterson was asked why the employees had been required to work the previous Saturday. His answer was that there had been "a threat of either a lockout or a strike." Somebody asked Patterson whether he would "lock the doors," and he replied that the Company would do so if necessary.

Union Steward Walter Brinkley testified that he attended a meeting of about 30 employees that began about noon and lasted 30 to 45 minutes. Patterson read parts of the Company's proposal from a screen, and said that he wanted to make sure the employees understood it before they voted on it that night. Somebody asked why the Company had not answered Byrd's questions, and Patterson replied that he had done so to the best of his ability. The Company's vice president said that if the employees "didn't vote on it that night that the gates would be locked."[39]

[35] G.C. Exh. 2, art. 15, sec. 14.
[36] G.C. Exh. 15, sec. II, art. 15, sec. 14.
[37] Testimony of Byrd and Jenkins.

[38] Patterson obviously was unaware that the membership had already rejected the Company's proposal on the previous day.
[39] On cross-examination, in response to a leading question concerning whether Patterson had threatened the employees in any way, Brinkley answered in the negative.

Patricia Jones, a sewing machine operator, testified that she attended a meeting of about 30 cutting, sewing, and receiving employees that began about 2 p.m. Patterson read the contract from a projector and told employees that the Union either did not understand it or had not explained it accurately to the members. Patterson further stated that the employees did not realize how serious the problem was and that there could be a lockout.

Union President Jenkins testified that he attended an employee meeting on 8 December at which Patterson "showed slides and read the contract." Jenkins asked Patterson whether the employee's one-half share of the insurance expenses was still $75, and Patterson replied that it was.[40]

Company Vice President Patterson denied that he told employees he was going to lock them out. However, he asserted that employees asked him whether there was going to be a strike or a lockout, and whether they could continue to work. According to Patterson, the fact that the employees asked these questions gave him the "option" to lock them out, and he so advised them. Patterson also asserted that the Company's insurance proposal on 6 December was based on the previous year's actual cost. However, he agreed on cross-examination that he did not give the Union the actual figures on unit costs prior to 8 December, and that the Company first asked for this information from Corroon & Black on 14 December. By letter from Corroon & Black dated 15 December 1986, the Company received the "actual cost (of insurance) for the bargaining unit employees" for the year ending 1 September 1986.[41]

b. Factual analysis

I credit the testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses and conclude that the Company held employee meetings on 8 December during which Vice President Patterson read the Company's last contract proposal and said that the Union had misled the members about it, and stated that there might be a lockout. Further, as noted, the Union Steward Brinkley testified that at the meeting he attended, Patterson said the "gates would be locked" if the employees "didn't vote on it that night." I credit Brinkley's testimony and conclude that Patterson thereby communicated to employees the message that there would be a lockout if the employees did not vote favorably on the Company's proposal—it is obvious that he did not intend to close down the Company if the employees accepted the last company proposal.

I further conclude that the Company had not given the Union the actual cost of one-half of dependent coverage at that time, and, indeed, did not even have it. I credit Jenkins' uncontradicted testimony that Patterson told employees on 8 December that the cost was still $75. Since this figure was based on Corroon & Black's "projected" cost figures in its 30 October letter,[42] the clause in the Company's 6 December proposal—that the employee's share was based on actual cost—was either erroneous or incomplete.[43]

2. Byrd's conversation with Patterson and the lockout

a. Summary of evidence

Byrd was scheduled to go to Athens, Georgia, on other union business on 8 December. He affirmed that he called Patterson's office at 7 a.m. that day pursuant to his undertaking during the last negotiating session on 4 December. According to Byrd, Patterson's secretary said that he was in meetings and was unavailable. While on the way to Athens, Byrd called again and spoke with Patterson's secretary about 9:30 or 10 a.m. Patterson was still busy. Finally, about 4:30 p.m., Byrd spoke with Patterson and advised him that the Union had rejected the last offer but was not threatening to strike. The members wanted to continue working and negotiating and there were other issues to discuss. Patterson replied that he was locking out the employees at midnight. Byrd responded that the Company had other options such as implementing its final offer, and that the employees were not going to strike under any circumstances. This ended the conversation and Byrd immediately returned to Tennessee.

Patterson testified that he "could not believe" that Byrd was "on the road to Athens," but agreed that Byrd tried to call him. Patterson contended that he tried to call back. Bryd finally reached Patterson at 4:30 p.m. Patterson agreed that Byrd said the men wanted to continue working but denied that he said there would be no strike. According to Patterson, he told Byrd that he was not going to allow the employees to continue working because the Company had "tried to meet during this time and that time." Accordingly, the parties were at impasse, and the Company was exercising its rights to shut the plant down. Byrd offered nothing further, according to Patterson.

The Company therefore shut the plant down at midnight on 8 December. Its reasons, according to Patterson, was that the Union had rejected the last company proposal, and that it was necessary "to bring this thing to a head . . . and place some pressure on Mr. Byrd to get back to Tennessee to negotiate a contract." According to Byrd, the Company had never previously asserted that the parties were at impasse.

b. Factual analysis and summary

Patterson's admission that Byrd said the men wanted to continue working is the equivalent of saying that there would be no strike. Accordingly, I credit Byrd's testimony on this issue. Although Byrd did not specifically sug-

[40] On cross-examination, Chief Steward Wilkinson, in response to a leading question, asserted that the Company's 6 December proposal did away with projected costs and was based on the prior year's actual cost.

[41] G.C. Exh. 24.

[42] Supra, fn. 9.

[43] It is clear from the foregoing that Wilkinson's testimony, cited above, fn. 40, is inaccurate. In cross-examination of Wilkinson on the Union's demand letter of 4 December (G.C. Exh. 14), counsel elicited a statement that that letter did not demand the actual dollar amounts of the insurance coverage. However, as shown above, the Union demanded this information on 2 or 3 December, Patterson gave the figure of $75 to $76, and agreed that it was "excessive."

gest the date of another bargaining session, I credit his testimony that he told Patterson that the union members wanted to continue negotiating, that there were other issues to discuss, and that the Company had options other than a lockout.

In summary, the parties' last bargaining session on 4 December included the Union's written request for information and the Company's promise to supply it the next day. The Company did not do so. It tried but failed to arrange a meeting on 5 or 6 December. The union spokesman's reasons for his unavailablity on those days were communicated to the Company. The Company submitted another proposal that the employees rejected because of concern about temporary employees and insurance costs. On the next day, 8 December, Vice President Patterson spoke to employees, had the conversation with Byrd described above, and shut down the plant at midnight.

F. Communcations Between the Parties and the Meeting on 13 December

1. Summary of evidence

Vice President Patterson wrote a letter to Byrd dated 9 December "confirming" their conversation on 8 December that the membership had voted to continue to work without a contract and had rejected the Company's proposal. The letter further advised that the Company "plans to exercise its rights as to not operating the plant without a contract."[44] Byrd wrote a letter dated 12 December in which he affirmed that he had told Patterson that the employees were ready to work under the old contract, to continue negotiating, and were not threatening to strike. Further, Byrd had offered to let the Company implement its last offer pending further negotiations. The letter also accuses the Company of engaging in an illegal lockout and unfair labor practices.[45]

Byrd received a call on 10 or 11 December from the Federal mediator for the purpose of arranging a meeting. This was accomplished and the meeting was held at the usual place, the Gallatin City Electric Company. The Union was represented by the same individuals—Byrd, Jenkins, Wilkinson, and Dorothy White—while the Company was represented by Patterson, Bates, and company counsel. The Federal mediator was also present.

According to Byrd, the Union said that there was no sense in having a meeting if the Company did not provide the information previously requested, in particular, information on the insurance costs and the turnover rate. Byrd read or delivered his letter of 12 December to Patterson, and reminded the Company of the Union's requests in Ray White's 2 September letter and the Union's 4 December communcation. Patterson stated that he would try to call Corroon & Black immediately and the meeting recessed. The Company's representatives returned to state that they were unable to get the information at that time, but might be able to get it by 15 December at which time they would call to arrange a meeting.

Patterson agreed with most of Byrd's testimony, except that he testified that the Union's request for insurance information had a new element—whereas the Union had previously requested the "projected cost on the Company's total insurance program," it now wanted the "projected costs (for) the hourly bargaining unit." Patterson averred that Byrd was acting "very independent."[46]

2. Factual analysis

I credit Bryd's testimony regarding this meeting. Patterson's assertions that the Union had previously requested the cost of the Company's total insurance program, including the costs of nonunit employees, and first requested the "projected" costs pertaining to unit employees on 13 December are inaccurate for the two reasons previously given—the Union had previously asked for the actual costs pertaining only to unit employees.

G. Patterson's Conversation with Wilkinson on the Evening of 13 December and Meetings at Shoney's on 15 December

As indicated, the amended complaint alleges that the Company attempted to bypass the Union on 13 and 15 December as well as on an earlier date. Chief Steward Wilkinson testified that he and his wife were attending a company Christmas party on Saturday evening, 13 December. After supper, Patterson came to their table and said that they had to "discuss this thing and get it resolved." Wilkinson replied that he was there to have a good time and did not want to talk business—he was going to dance with his wife. A short time later, Patterson came back and said that they "really needed to discuss this."

Wilkinson told Patterson that changes had to be made in the Company's insurance proposals and the hiring of temporary employees. The Union could not accept an arrangement whereby some employees paid for insurance and others did not—this would split the Union. Instead, Wilkinson suggested all the employees might pay a smaller amount and had in the past paid $3.08 weekly for dependent coverage. He also suggested that the Company delay in the hiring of temporary employees. Patterson said he would draw something up, and Wilkinson suggested that Patterson call him Monday morning at his home. Patterson's testimony agrees with this account on the essential points.

Patterson called Wilkinson on the morning of 15 December and met with him and Union President Jenkins for lunch at Shoney's. Company President Parks was present. The Company's representatives presented a rough draft of an agreement, and Jenkins again asked for the information the Union had requested.

[44] G.C. Exh. 18. The letter was sent to a former address of Byrd's but he received it 2 days later.

[45] G.C. Exh. 17.

[46] Patterson also noted that Byrd was wearing a T-shirt of the United Furniture Workers, which was seeking representation at the Company's Sumner subsidiary. Byrd theorized that the Company wanted a poor contract in Hendersonville in order to influence the voters at Sumner in a forthcoming Board election on 19 December.

The parties met again at Shoney's later the same day. In addition to the original union representatives, Dorothy White was present on this occasion, while James Mills and a Corroon & Black representative were on the Company's side.

The evidence is conflicting on the nature of insurance data presented by the Company. Chief Steward Wilkinson testified that he was shown a Corroon & Black letter dated that day (15 December). The letter in fact shows insurance costs for unit employees for the prior 2 years and indicates that the cost had gone down. There is no reference to future projected costs.[47] Nonetheless, Wilkinson asserted that the Corroon & Black representative spoke of "projected" costs and said that "there was no way of nailing it down to a dollar and cents figure." Union President Jenkins testified that the costs on Corroon & Black's "first sheet" had gone down but "then the next year they went triple high, triple the difference with their records showing a trend of everything . . . going down and then all of a sudden it was going to triple." Jenkins told the Company that they "could get it cheaper from Aetna," said that he could never understand the Company's figures. Company Vice President Patterson testified that the Corroon & Black representative, a "Mr. Beard . . . tried to explain again . . . that those were projected costs based off actual valuations."

I conclude that at this meeting the Company did show Jenkins, Wilkinson, and White a Corroon & Black letter dated 15 December showing actual unit employee costs for 1985 and 1986.[48] There is no credible evidence that the Union's representatives were given copies. The Company also showed them a prior letter from the same firm projecting higher costs for 1987.[49]

The Corroon & Black representative responded to Jenkins' objections in essence by arguing that they were irrelevant, because the parties were then discussing a flat weekly rate of $3 for all employees. The Company also suggested other "options."[50] Company President Parks asked the Union's representatives whether they could "handle Mr. Boyd."

H. Meetings on 16 and 17 December and the Final Agreement

The parties met again on 16 December. The Company was represented by Patterson, James Mills, and the Federal mediator was again present. The Union's representatives were joined by Southern Council Executive Secretary Ray White. Union Vice President Randy Shehane was also present.

White told the Company's representatives that he was the Union's exclusive bargaining agent, that he had designated Byrd as his representative, and that the Company's meetings with other union representatives were unlawful in the absence of Byrd. Patterson testified that is was the first time he had been so advised.

The Union again asked for the requested information on insurance and the turnover rate. There is no evidence that the Company showed either of the two Corroon & Black letters (on insurance) at this meeting, and Byrd flatly denied that he ever received information on the actual cost of insurance for unit employees. The Company presented the Union with another proposal,[51] and offered to allow the employees to return that night if the Union ratified it by midnight. Failing ratification, a new lockout would go into effect. Thereafter, the mediator informed the Union's representatives that the Company would no longer meet with them face to face.

Nonetheless, negotiations were conducted on 17 December, with the mediator acting as an intermediary between the Union's representatives stationed at Shoney's Inn, and the Company's representatives at the Gallatin Electric Company. The Union presented various written questions that the mediator carried to the Company and to which the Company responded. Thus, the Union asked whether the Company intended to utilize temporary employees as in the past in a manner not detrimental to full-time employees, and the Company answered affirmatively. The Union asked questions about new hires and queried about other "options" that the Company had suggested in its 15 December meeting with the "local" committee. The Company responded with various monthly charges in lieu of the weekly insurance charge.[52]

A final agreement was executed on 17 December. It provided, inter alia, for insurance coverage according to a benefit schedule for all employees who had completed 120 working days. All employees were to pay $3 weekly for insurance coverage. The agreement increases the number of temporary employees the Company may hire from 15 to 25,[53] and continues to compensate them at wage rates less than that of regular employees.[54] The employees returned to work on 18 December.

Byrd credibly testified that the Union never received from the Company the number of single and family insurance plans, as requested in Ray White's 2 September letter.[55] Further, the Company did not provide documentation on the number of bargaining unit employees or the number of turnovers, nor did it supply the factors used in calculating the "projected" increase in insurance costs—all requested in the Union's 4 December letter.[56] Finally, the parties stipulated that the Company did not provide the Union with information on the names, addresses, age, sex, telephone numbers, and marital status of unit employees as requested in White's letter.

> It is well established . . . that Section 8(a)(5) of the Act imposes on an employer the duty to furnish a union, upon request, information relevant and necessary to enable it to intelligently carry out its statutory obligations as the employees' exclusive bargaining representative. And, under the standard relevancy as applied by the Board and the courts, it is sufficient that the Union's request for information be supported by a showing of "probable" or "potential" relevance.[57] Florida Steel Corp., 235 NLRB 941, 942 (1978).

It is clear that information concerning the cost of employee insurance[58] and other employee benefits[59] is relevant and necessary in order to enable the bargaining representative to meet its statutory obligations. In this case the Union wished to compare the costs of the employer's self-insurance plan with the costs of plans offered by a union trust fund, and communicated this need to the Company in support of its request for information concerning the addresses, age, sex, telephone numbers, and marital status of employees, as well as the number of single and family insurance plans. The Board and the courts have concluded that this information must be produced when requested by the Union pursuant to its statutory obligation.[60]

The Company's argument that the Union knew or could have learned the number of unit employees is irrelevant, because even with this knowledge the Union could not have determined the actual costs of their insurance for the reasons given above. Although the Company did give the actual cost insurance of unit employees to the "local" committee on 15 December, this is no defense since the Company did not supply all the requested information, and that which it did no supply was not timely—the information was provided very late in the bargaining after repeated union requests,[61] and after the Company had engaged in a lockout.

Further, as noted, the Company refused to supply factors to justify an increase in its "projected" insurance costs during the first week of December. The Company's argument that this information was not needed on 15 December since the parties were then considering a flat weekly charge is not persuasive for essentially the same reason that its late submission of factual insurance costs was inadequate—the Union required this information at least by the time of the early December bargaining, prior to the lockout. Although the parties did reach agreement on an insurance provision that incorporated a weekly charge for all employees, the Union never received all the information that it needed to compare the employer's self-insurance plan with alternative union trust fund plans.

The complaint also alleges Respondent's unlawful refusal to supply documentation for its asserted turnover rate. The Union demended this information on 2 December in response to the Company's stated plan to hire 100 temporary employees in the following year and the Company's "two-tier" employee system, under which temporary employees received lesser wages and benefits than other employees. When the Company responded on 3 December that the annual turnover rate was 40–50 employees, union spokesman Byrd replied that this was "ridiculously high," and the Union's letter of 4 December requested documentation of this figure. Byrd told the Company the reasons the Union needed this information and the latter promised to supply it the next day. However, the information was not supplied. Instead, the Company's 6 December proposal raised the number of permissible temporary employees from 15 to 50, and altered the rights of senior temporary employees to progress to full employee status. The issue of temporary employees was one of the reasons that the employees, on 7 December, rejected the Company's 6 December proposal, which was followed by the Company's lockout on 8 December. Finally, on 16 December, the Union again asked for the requested documentation on the Company's turnover rate. It was not supplied. Although the parties ultimately agreed on an increase in temporary employees from 15 to 25, the fact that the documentation on the turnover rate was never supplied contributed to the employees' rejection of the Company's 6 December proposal and thus to the lockout.

The fact that the Company proposed an increase in the number of temporary employees who already worked at lesser wages and benefits, and proposed further diminishment of their rights, went to the core of the employer-employee relationship. The Union represented all the employees, and it was its statutory obligation to explore the Company's asserted rationale for these proposals. Accordingly, I conclude that under the broad standard of relevance governing union requests for information,[62] the Union has supported its request for documentation on the turnover rate with a showing of at least probable or potential relevance.

I therefore find that Respondent, by refusing to supply, or delaying in supplying, the Union with requested information on insurance costs of unit emplolyees, including present costs and the past 2 years' loss experience, the number of single and family insurance plans, the factors used in determining a projected increase in costs, the employees' addresses, telephone numbers, sex, ages, and marital status, and documentation on previous employee turnover, thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[63]

2. Alleged unlawful direct dealing with employees

a. Factual summary

The evidence shows that a company supervisor asked employees on 1 December whether they understood the Company's proposal of that day, and that Company Vice President Patterson explained the proposal to employees on 4 December. Some employees, including Union Vice President Shehane, suggested at that meeting that Patterson explain the proposal to employees. Following submission of another company proposal on 6 December and its rejection by the Union on 7 December (unknown to Patterson), the Company's vice president on 8 December read details of the last proposal to employees, declared that the Union had misled them about it, said that there might be a lockout, and communicated to employees the message that the plant would be closed down if they did not vote favorably on the plan that night.

After a regular negotiating session on 13 December, Company Vice President Patterson approached Chief Steward Wilkinson in the evening at a social occasion and said that the matter needed to be resolved. After an initial rejection by Wilkinson, Patterson again approached him and the steward responded with suggestions that led to meetings 2 days later between the Company and members of the Union's bargaining committee, absent Chief Spokesman Byrd. The Company's president asked the Union whether it could "handle Mr. Byrd." At this meeting, the Company for the first time showed Jenkins, Wilkinson, and White documentation of the actual costs of insurance for unit employees, which had been going down, but continued to argue the validity of "projections" for the next year showing that costs were going up. At the regular meeting the next day, 16 December, when Executive Secretary Ray White and Chief Spokesman Byrd were present, the Union again asked for the insurance data but the Company did not provide it.

b. Legal analysis

It is well established that it is unlawful for an employer to negotiate directly with individuals when they have a bargaining representative.[64] However, Section 8(c) of the Act provides that the expression of views, argument, or opinion does not violate the Act "if such expressison contained no threat or force or promise of benefit."[65]

The Board has recently affirmed that "free and open discussion by all parties . . . affords the best chance for successful conclusion of negotiations . . . . Indeed, employees ought to be fully informed as to all issues relevant to collective-bargaining negotiations and the parties' positions as to those issue."[66] The mere fact that an employer outlines to employees the details of contract proposals which he had presented to the union does not constitute a violation of the Act.[67] In another case, the employer sought to inform employees of the employer's proposals to the union and said that the employees might strike if his proposals were not accepted. An actual strike voted had been conducted and the employees of other employers in a multiemployer association, of which the employer had formerly been a member, were actually on strike. The Board concluded that by these and other actions the employer did not engage in direct dealing with employees or make coercive comments. Putnam Buick, 280 NLRB 868 (1986), enfd. sub nom. Machinists v. NLRB, 827 F.2d 557 (9th Cir. 1987).

Nonetheless, the Board in Putnam Buick also noted that "violations of Section 8(a)(5) will be found if employer communications with unit employees during collective-bargaining negotiations are coercive or invite direct bargaining between the employer and the employees" (280 NLRB at 869).[68] And, in a case where the employer threatened discharge of employees if they did not vote in favor of the employer's proposed decrease in wages, the Board concluded that the employer had engaged in unlawful direct dealing. Chestnut Ridge Mining Corp., 268 NLRB 374 (1983).

In the case at bar, union spokesman Byrd did say on 1 December that there would be a strike vote if the Company did not extend the expiring contract. However, the contract was extended and there was no strike vote. Company Vice President Patterson told employees in one of his 8 December meetings that there was "a theat of either a lockout or a strike." A threat of a lockout could only have come from the Company. As for a strike, there had been no threat during the events following the last bargaining session on 4 December and the Company's submission of its 6 December proposal. Although union members on 7 December voted to continue working and negotiating, this was a vote on the Company's last proposal, not a strike vote. Finally, on 8 December spokesman Byrd explicitly informed Company Vice President Patterson that there would be no strike despite the Union's rejection of the last proposal. Patterson, however, communicated to employees on 8 December the message that he would lock them out if they did not vote favorably on the Company's last proposal that night. This was followed by an actual lockout at midnight, and, in later negotiations, another lockout threat.

I conclude that Patterson's statements to employees on 8 December that the gates would be locked if the employees did not vote favorably on the Company's last proposal that night were coercive.[69] These statements tended to force union members to accept the Company's last proposal, which they had already rejected in a union meeting the day before. Accordingly, I find that Respondent thereby engaged in unlawful direct dealing with employees in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[70]

Continued

As indicated, the amended complaint also alleges that the Company's conversation with Chief Steward Wilkinson at the Christmas party on 13 December, and with Wilkinson, Local Union President Jenkins, and treasurer White on 15 December also constituted unlawful direct dealing with employees.

There is little doubt that the Company preferred dealing with the local committee rather than with Byrd, and that it was Vice President Patterson who initiated the discussion with Wilkinson at the Christmas party. Moreover, the Company showed the Corroon & Black "actual" insurance costs only to the local committee, and Company President Parks asked members of the committee whether they could "handle" Byrd, who acted "very independent" according to Patterson.

It is true that Southern Council Executive Secretary Ray White asked the Company to begin negotiations with Timothy Byrd. Nonetheless, the amended pleadings establish that "Local 2338, Southern Council of Industrial Workers, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO" was the statutory bargaining representative of the unit employees.[71] Wilkinson was not only chief steward of Local 2338, but also a member of the Union's negotiating committee. Although Patterson approached Wilkinson at the party, it was the chief steward who advanced a formula to resolve the insurance issue and who suggested that Patterson call him the following Monday morning.

Jenkins and White, who, with Wilkinson, met with company representatives on 15 December, were also members of the Union's negotiating committee and were union officers. Jenkins was the president and White the treasurer. In a case with similar facts, the union president claimed that he met with employer representatives only as an individual. Nonetheless, his actions and those of another committeeman, although "not actually negotiations, were representative in nature." BASF Wyandotte Corp., 276 NLRB 1576, 1584 (1985). In the case at bar, the Company's representatives and the local committee discussed at least one of the principal issues in the negotiations, the cost of insurance to unit employees. I conclude that Wilkinson's actions on 13 December, and his and those of Jenkins and White on 15 December, were representative in nature, and that the Company did not engage in lawful direct dealing with employees during those meetings. Accordingly, I shall recommend that this allegation be dismissed.

3. Alleged unlawful lockout

Respondent argues that the 8 December lockout was lawful because the parties had reached impasse. No economic agreements had been reached and the Company "from December 4 through December 8 . . . was unable to persuade Byrd to bring the negotiations back to the negotiating table."[72] When Byrd talked with Patterson on 8 December, he "did not request any further negotiation session; offer any counterproposals; or request another extenstion." In addition, he did not "specify any particular problems that the Union had with the Company's final offer."[73]

Accordingly, Respondent argues, the parties were at impasse and it was entitled to lock out its employees "for a lawful purpose, namely to persuade the Union to return to the negotiating table and to consider the Company's proposals."[74] Further, neither the "absence of any reasonalbe fear of strike nor the absence of an impasse makes a lockout in support of bargaining demands unlawful."[75]

Respondent's summary of the facts is not in accordance with the credited evidence. Thus, although the parties may not have reached agreement on economic issues, this was due "in part to the fact that they had agreed to discuss noneconomic issues first and had reached some agreement on these matters. It is also inaccurate to assert that the Union failed to state its disagreement with the Company's 6 December proposal. On that day, when union spokesman Byrd was informed that the Company had not delivered the promised information to Union President Jenkins, Byrd told Company Vice President Patterson that the Company was bargaining in bad faith. It is clear that the Union's objection to the Company's "final proposal" was that it was not accompanied by relevant information that the Union needed in order to evaluate it, and that this objection was communicated to the Company.

The Company's stated purpose of the lockout, to "persuade the Union to return to the negotiating table," also distorts the facts. The Union had never left the bargaining table, except for brief and reasonable absences of union spokesman Byrd in connection with other union business. The Company knew that the last negotiating day in the first week of December would be 4 December, a Thursday, because Byrd was scheduled to be out of town on other union business on Friday. It was agreed that Byrd would call the Company the following Monday, 8 December, to arrange another meeting. The Company then tried to compel a Saturday meeting, but Byrd was previously scheduled for two other meetings that day on the Union's negotiations with the Company.

As agreed, Byrd tried to reach Patterson at 7 a.m. on Monday, but was informed that the Company's vice president was in meetings and was unavailable. After repeated attempts throughout the day, Byrd finally reached Patterson at 4:30 p.m. and was informed that a lockout would begin at midnight. It is untrue, as asserted by the Company, that Byrd made no counterproposals. He suggested other alternatives to a lockout such as the Company's implementing its last offer pending negotiations. Although Byrd did not then request an extension of the contract, his original request for a 15-day extension had previously been rejected by the Company in lieu of a shorter extension. The fact that Byrd was "on threaten employees in order to win acceptance of its proposal. Further, Patterson on 8 December discussed a later company proposal, not the one referred to by Shehane. The latter was not then a member of the bargaining committee and has not been shown to be speaking on behalf of the Union at that time.

the road to Athens" (on other union business) did not make him unavailable for a meeting on Tuesday—in fact, Byrd returned to Tennessee Monday night after learning about the lockout.

The Board has stated the criteria for determining an impasse as follows:

> Whether a bargaining impasse exists is a matter of judgment. The bargaining history, the good faith of the parties in negotiations, the length of negotiations, the importance of the issue or issues as to which there is disagreement, the contemporaneous understanding of the parties as to the state of negotiations are all relevant factors to be considered in deciding whether an impasse in bargaining existed. Taft Broadcasting Co., 163 NLRB 475, 478 (1967), enfd. 395 F.2d 622 (D.C. Cir. 1968).

Even if Respondent's unlawful conduct prior to the lockout were to be disregarded, it would be difficult to find a bona fide impasse on the facts in this case. During the 4 days of bargaining on economic matters that began on 1 December, the principal disagreement was not over the substantive nature of the Company's proposals, but, rather, with the factual data asserted by the Company to justify those proposals. This is insufficient to warrant a finding of impasse. "All items on which the parties had not agreed are not necessarily items causing an impasse; mere discussion of unresolved items falls short of unlawfully, president demands to the points of impasse." Sanderson Farms, 271 NLRB 1477, 1479 (1984). In this case the only persistent demands were those of the Union for information—and even on this issue the Company did not refuse outright, but continuously promised to supply the information, only to default until late in the negotiations at which time it supplied only part of the information. Further, as indicated, the Company's asserted reason for the lockout—to bring the Union back to the bargaining table—is based on an erroneous factual premise.

However, I need not base an impasse finding on the Taft Broadcasting criteria alone, because the Company did engaged in unlawful conduct prior to lockout—it engaged in direct dealing with employees and refused to supply relevant information demanded by the Union. It is well established that such conduct bars a finding of a bona fide impasse.[76]

Respondent has not advanced any business reason for the lockout—unless its asserted but invalid claim that it needed to get the Union back to the bargaining table can be called a business reason. The obvious object and tendency of the Company's threat to lockout its employees was to compel them to vote favorably on the Company's last proposal. By such threat, which formed a part of its unlawful direct dealing with employees, the Company thereby demonstrated its union animus.[77] Considering these factors together with the Company's unlawful refusal to give relevant information to the Union,[78] and the absence of a threat to strike,[79] it is clear that the lockout was unlawful.[80]

The cases relied on by Respondent are inapposite.[81] The issue in those cases was the legality of the hiring of temporary replacements after a lawful lockout, which followed the employer's presentation of legitimate bargaining positions. As the Board noted, "there is no evidence that the Respondent engaged in bad-faith bargaining before or after the lockout." Harter Equipment, 280 NLRB 597 (1986). In contrast, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) prior to the lockout by its direct dealing with employees and by its refusal to supply information to the Union. Accordingly, following the above-cited cases where the lockout was preceded by unlawful bargaining, I conclude that the lockout was intended to compel employee acceptance of Respondent's last bargaining proposal, and thus to undermine the Union. This conduct tended to discourage membership in the Union and was thus violative of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

In accordance with my findings above, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Globe Business Furniture, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 2338, Southern Council of Industrial Workers, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All production and maintenance and tool room employees, shipping and receiving employees, working group leaders and janitors employed by Respondent at its Hendersonville, Tennessee plant excluding all office clerical and plant clerical employees, draftsmen, guards, technical and professional employees and supervisors as defined under the National Labor Relations Act.

4. Since about 1963 and at all times material, the Union has been the designated collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the above-described appropriate unit, and has been recognized as such representative in prior collective-bargaining agreements with Respondent.

5. By refusing to timely supply the Union requested insurance costs of unit employees, including present costs and the past 2 years' loss experience; and by refusing to supply information on (a) the factors used in determining a projected increase in costs; (b) the number of single and family insurance plans, the employees' addresses, telephone numbers, sex, ages, and marital status; and (c) documentation of previous employee turnover, Respondent thereby committed unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. On 8 December 1986, by bypassing the Union and attempting to cause its employees to accept Respondent's last bargaining proposal, Respondent thereby committed an additional unfair labor practice in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

7. On 8 December 1986, by locking out its employees until 18 December 1986 in an attempt to compel them and the Union to accept its last bargaining proposal, Respondent thereby discouraged membership in the Union and thus committed an unfair labor practice in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

8. The above-described unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

9. Respondent has not committed any unfair labor practices except as specified here.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent had engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent unlawfully refused to supply the Union with timely information on the insurance costs of unit employees, including the present costs and the past 2 years' loss experience, I shall recommend that, on request, it forthwith gave such information to the Union. The fact that Respondent did submit such information on 15 December 1986 is an insufficient reason for not requiring it do so again, since said submission was not timely, was given only to the local committee and not the full committee, and the documents themselves were not supplied.

Having found that Respondent unlawfully refused to give the Union information on factors used in projecting an increase in insurance costs of unit employees, the number of single and family insurance plans, the addresses, telephone numbers, sex, ages, marital status of such employees, and documentation on previous employee turnover, I shall recommend that Respondent be required, on request, to submit such information to the Union.

Having found that Respondent unlawfully locked out its employees from 8 to 18 December 1986, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the unlawful lockout, buy paying each of them a sum of money equal to the amount he or she would have earned during the lockout, less net interim earnings during such period, to be computed on a quarterly basis in the manner established by the Board in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and to pay into any employee benefit funds established by the last contract the sums that Respondent would otherwise have been required to pay absent its unlawful lockout, with interest on such payments as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[82]

On the basis of these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[83]

ORDER

The Respondent, Globe Business Furniture, Inc., Hendersonville, Tennessee, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to timely supply Local 2338, Southern Council of Industrial Workers, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO as the statutory bargaining representative of the employees in the unit stated below, with the insurance costs, including the present costs and last 2 years' loss experience of the unit employees. The bargaining unit is:

> All production and maintenance and tool room employees, shipping and receiving employees, working group leaders and janitors employed by Respondent at its Hendersonville, Tennessee plant excluding all office clerical and plant clerical employees, draftsmen, guards, technical and professional employees and supervisors as defined under the National Labor Relations Act.

(b) Refusing to supply the above-named labor organization with the factors used in determining a projected increase in insurance costs for 1987, the number of single and family insurance plans in the aforesaid unit, the unit employees' addresses, telephone numbers, sex, ages, and marital status, and documentation of previous employee turnover in the aforesaid unit.

(c) Bypassing the above-named labor organization as the statutory representative of the employees in the above-stated unit, and attempting to cause the employees in that unit to accept its last bargaining proposal, or any bargaining proposal.

(d) Discouraging membership in the above-stated labor organization, or any other organization, by locking out its employees in an attempt to compel them to accept its last bargaining proposal or any other bargaining proposal, or by discriminating against them in any other manner with respect to their hire, tenure of employment, or terms and conditions of employment.

[82] Under New Horizons, interest is computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest accrued before 1 January 1987 (the effective date of the amendment) shall be computed as in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[83] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effecutate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, supply the above-named labor organization with the insurance costs, including the present costs and the last 2 years' loss experience, of the employees in the above-stated unit; the factors used in determining a projected increase in unit insurance costs for 1987; the number of single and family insurance plans in the aforesaid unit; the unit employees' names, addresses, telephone numbers, sex, ages, and marital status, and documentation of previous employee turnover in the aforesaid unit.

(b) Make whole each employee whom it locked out from 8 until 18 December 1986, and pay into each employee benefit fund established by the last contract the sum that Respondent would otherwise have been required to pay, absent its unlawful lockout, except to the extent such sums have already been paid, in the remedy section of this decision.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of reimbursement due employees under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its plant at Hendersonville, Tennessee, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[84] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 26, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

[84] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refused to supply Local 2338, Southern Council of Industrial Workers, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, as the statutory representative of the employees in the unit listed below, with the insurance costs, including the present costs and last 2 years' loss experience, of the unit employees, the factors used in determining a projected increase in insurance costs for 1987, the number of single and family insurance plans, the unit employees' addresses, telephone numbers, sex, ages, and marital status, and documentation of previous employee turnover in the unit. The unit is:

> All production and maintenance and tool room employees, shipping and receiving employees, working group leaders and janitors employed by Respondent at its Hendersonville, Tennessee plant excluding all office clerical and plant clerical employees, draftsmen, guards, technical and professional employees and supervisors as defined under the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT bypass the above-named labor organization, or any other labor organization, in an attempt to compel our employees to accept any of our bargaining proposals.

WE WILL NOT lockout our employees in an attempt to compel them to accept our bargaining proposals, nor in any other way discriminate against them.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, supply the above-named labor organization with information on all the items listed above.

WE WILL make whole every employee whom we unlawfully locked out from 8 to 18 December 1986, and WE WILL pay any required amounts into any employee benefit fund, to the extent we have not already done so, with interest.

Martin Industries, Inc., Huntsville Division and International Molders and Allied Workers Union. Case 10–CA–22189

August 16, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On March 17, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Robert A. Gritta issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Martin Industries, Inc., Huntsville Division, Huntsville, Alabama, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Josephine S. Miller, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Brent L. Wilson, Esq. (Elarbee, Thompson & Trapnell), of Atlanta, Georgia, for the Respondent.
Hubert Coker, Coordinator, of Madison, Alabama, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT A. GRITTA, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on 30 July 1987 in Huntsville, Alabama, based on a charge filed by International Molders and Allied Workers Union (the Union) on 11 December 1986 and a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 10 of the National Labor Relations Board on 3 February 1987.[1] The complaint alleged that Martin Industries, Inc., Huntsville Division (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by refusing to grant its employees quarterly merit wage increases and the annual general wage increase. Respondent's timely answer denied the commision of any unfair labor practices.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to introduce evidence, and to argue orally. Briefs were submitted by the General Counsel and Respondent.

On the entire record in this case, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor on the witness stand, and on substantive, reliable evidence considered along with the consistency and inherent probability of testimony, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION AND STATUS OF LABOR ORGANIZATION—PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that Martin Industries, Inc., Huntsville Division is an Alabama corporation engaged in the manufacture of gas and wood burning heaters in Huntsville, Alabama. Jurisdiction is not in issue. Martin Industries, Inc., Huntsville Division in the past 12 months, in the course and conduct of its business operations, shipped products from its Huntsville, Alabama facility valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points located outside the State of Alabama. I conclude and find that Martin Industries, Inc., Huntsville Division is an employer engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I conclude and find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ISSUES

1. Whether Respondent's withholding of merit wage increases from its Huntsville employees on 1 July and 1 October 1986 and 1 January and 1 April 1987 violated the Act.

2. Whether Respondent's withholding of its annual general wage increase from its Huntsville employees in August 1986 violated the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

There is little or no factual dispute involved here. Historically, Respondent operated four plants in Alabama. The plants were located in Huntsville, Athens, Florence, and Sheffield.[2] The Florence and Sheffield plants are unionized whereas the Athens plant is nonunion. The Huntsville plant, at all times material, was the subject of a union organizational drive culminating in several Board-conducted elections.

Over the years, Respondent maintained a policy of granting annual general wage increases to the Huntsville employees. Pursuant to the policy, all employees at the Huntsville facility received the following wage increases:

January 1980, an increase equal to 14 percent of their hourly wage.

January 1981, an increase equal to 10 percent of their hourly wage.

January 1982, an increase of 30 cents per hour.

August 1983, an increase of 25 cents per hour.

August 1984, an increase equal to 7 percent of their hourly wage.

August 1985, an increase of 30 cents per hour.

In addition to the general wage increase policy, Respondent maintained a quarterly merit wage increase policy for the Huntsville employees. The policy provides:

[1] All dates are in 1986 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] The Florence plant was sold 1 January 1987.

> Your supervisor should evaluate your job performance, attendance, and attitude at the end of your first ninety (90) days of employment and may increase your base pay. Future pay increases will be considered at the end of each calendar quarter, if evaluation indicates a raise is warranted, until the top pay scale of the job classification is reached. An employee does not "automatically" advance to the top pay classification. Advancement depends upon the employees' demonstration of skill and qualifications in the judgment of his supervisor.

The same merit wage increase policy and annual general wage increase policy apply to the Athens facility employees.

Events of 1986 at the Huntsville Plant

On 17 January, the Union filed a petition for representation of Respondent's employees in Case 10–RC–13267. An election was conducted on 2 April. The unit of employees voting was:

> All production and maintenance employees, including plant clericals, lead men, quality control inspectors, warehouse employees, control repair division (CRD) employees and machine shop employees at the employer's Seminole Drive and Governors Drive, Huntsville, Alabama location, but excluding all other employees of the employer, including office clericals, guards, watchmen and supervisors as defined in the National Labor Relations Act.

The tally of ballots showed approximately 179 eligible voters with 85 votes for the Union and 87 votes against the Union. No ballots were challenged, but one ballot was voided.

The Union, on 9 April, filed objections to the election. The Regional Director, on 14 May, issued a Supplemental Decision and Direction of Second Election based on the Union's meritorious objections. A second election was conducted on 11 June. The resultant tally showed that approximately 175 voters were eligible and 86 ballots were cast for the Union with 85 ballots cast against the Union. No ballots were challenged or voided. On 16 June, Respondent filed objections to the election. On 18 June, a second supplemental decision, order directing hearing on objections, and notice of hearing was issued by the Regional Director, dismissing certain objections and scheduling the remaining objection for an evidentiary hearing. Following the Regional Director's decision, Respondent discontinued its quarterly merit wage increase policy at its Huntsville facility for the bargaining unit employees. The quarterly merit wage increase policy at the Athens facility continued uninterrupted.

On 7, 8, and 12 August, a hearing on objections was conducted in Huntsville, Alabama. Within this same timeframe, Respondent discontinued its annual general wage increase policy for the Huntsville employees within the appropriate bargaining unit. However, all nonbargaining unit employees at Huntsville received the annual general wage increase in August. Likewise, all employees at the Athens facility received their annual general wage increase in August.

The hearing officer, on 3 October, issued a report and recommendation on objection finding merit to Respondent's objection and recommending that the Board sustain the objection. On 10 April 1987, the Board adopted the hearing officer's report and recommendation and issued a Decision and Direction of Third Election. Respondent, on 13 April 1987, granted a general wage increase and reinstated its quarterly merit wage increase program for its Huntsville facility employees.

Respondent discontinued the quarterly merit wage increase program and the annual general wage increase policy for the bargining unit employees at the Huntsville facility because its objections to the second election were pending final resolution by the Board. All wage increases were withheld from the bargaining unit employees at Huntsville without explanation to the employees.[3]

Louis Martin testified he is now the vice president of engineering and in 1986 was plant manager of the Huntsville facility. As plant manager, he had partial responsibility to decide the range of wage increases under the merit wage increase policy and based on his supervisor's evaluations to decide the amount of merit wage, if any, within the established range, to grant each eligible employee at Huntsville. Martin also had partial responsibility to decide the amount or percentage of each annual general wage increase for Huntsville employees.

Each year merit wage increases are given 1 January, 1 April, 1 July, and 1 October with supervisory evaluations completed a week prior to the start of the quarter. Albeit, all Huntsville employees received the merit wage increase on 1 April, Martin did not participate in the wage decision because he had previously assumed his new duties and was no longer the plant manager. The annual general wage increase is given in August in both the Huntsville and Athens divisions. The merit wage increase range for 1986 was zero to 20 cents. Following the election within a week or two, Martin consulted counsel about the propriety of giving merit wage increases for the third quarter. Counsel's advice was to discontinue the merit wage increase program for bargaining unit employees at Huntsville, but to continue the merit program uninterrupted at the Athens facility. Thus, no merit wages were given 1 July or 1 October 1986 or 1 January or 1 April 1987 at Huntsville for all employees involved in the union organizing campaign. Nonunit employees continued receiving their merit wage increases each quarter. Likewise, no supervisory evaluations were made during those same quarters for any employees involved in the union organizing campaign, but nonunit employees continued being evaluated.

Respondent also consulted with counsel on the propriety of giving the annual general wage increase to the Huntsville employees in August 1986. The decision was to withhold the annual general wage increase from the Huntsville bargaining unit employees and to grant the increase to the nonunit employees. The decision was based solely on the union organizational status of the Huntsville plant and the case pending before the Board. Additionally, Respondent granted the annual general wage increase to all employees at the Athens facility.

Immediately following the Board's Order of 10 April 1987 directing a third election, Respondent reinstated its merit wage increase program and granted merit wage increases to the bargaining unit employees of the Huntsville Division. At the same time, the bargaining unit employees received the general wage increase previously withheld in August 1986.

Martin stated that neither wage increase was withheld from the Huntsville employees to punish or discriminate against employees voting for the Union.

Analysis and Conclusions

The General Counsel contends that Respondent's actions of withholding wage increases while a representation case is pending are per se violations of the Act. Alternatively, the General Counsel argues that Respondent has failed to rebut her prima facie case of discrimination.

Respondent argues that its actions of withholding the two wage increases were lawful because it was maintaining the status quo required by the law. Respondent further contends that the instant case is distinguishable from the cases involving wage actions immediately prior to an election or the cases involving ultimate certification of the union, creating a presumption that prior instituted changes in wages were unlawful. Respondent would place controlling emphasis on the fact that its objection to the second election was meritorious to make legitimate both the withholding of wages as well as the reinstitution of the wage programs.

Both parties have cited Board and court cases to support their differing positions. Those cases considering, prejudice to the collective-bargaining posture of the parties, an employer's obligation to bargain where the wage increases are discretionary, or the interrelation between organized and unorganized units separate and distinct from one another, I have considered to be inapposite and therefore not helpful to my determination. The remaining citations, particularly those employing the approach of looking at all the relevant circumstances to determine whether the employer intended, by its actions, to discourage union activity, I found helpful and did consider.

On the surface, wage issues, like those in the instant case, appear to fall within that "damned if you do and damned if you don't" category but "it ain't necessarily so." Where the facts show otherwise, an employer will not be found in violation of the Act.

Several Board cases over the years have reaffirmed yardsticks to be followed by employers undergoing a union organizational campaign. I am guided by the following rules of case law:

> Absent compelling economic considerations for doing so, an employer acts at its peril in making changes in terms and conditions of employment during the period that objections to an election are pending and the final determination has not yet been made. [Mike O'Connor Chevrolet-Buick-GMC Co., 209 NLRB 701 (1974).]

> [D]uring union organizing [a]n employer must take the action that it would have taken were there no union activity underway. [Associated Milk Producers, 255 NLRB 750 (1981).]

> [W]ithholding of pay raises from employees who are awaiting the holding of a Board election violates the Act if the employees otherwise would have been granted the pay raises in the normal course of the employer's business. [Progressive Supermarkets, 259 NLRB 512 (1981).]

> When an employer, prior to a union campaign, has an established wage increase policy, the suspension of that policy during the union campaign will normally be found to violate Sec. 8(a)(3) unless the employer postpones the increases only for the duration of the campaign and informs the employees at the time of the postponement that the sole reason for its action is to avoid the appearance that it seeks to intervene in the election, and the Board finds that this in fact was its reason. [Smith & Smith Aircraft Co., 264 NLRB 516 (1982).]

> [Generally,] an employer violates Section 8(a)(3) and (1) when it varies from its established practices of granting wage increases and other benefit improvements because of the pendency of a representation campaign or because a labor organization has been elected by its employees to represent them for collective-bargaining purposes. [Not the law of the case but an affirmation of the general rule.] [Peabody Coal Co., 265 NLRB 93 (1982), enfd. in part 725 F.2d 357 (6th Cir. 1984).]

It is undisputed that Respondent had an established wage policy respecting quarterly merit wage increases and annual general wage increases. The quarterly increases were based on a range of zero to 20 cents and the annual was a percentage increase usually decided in late July. Further, the decisions to withhold the quarterly increases for 1 July, 1 October 1986, 1 January, 1 April 1987, and the annual general wage increase of August 1986 were based on the Union's presence in the continuing organizational campaign and the advice of counsel. Throughout Respondent's entire organization, the only employees denied wage increases were the bargaining unit employees at Huntsville. All other employees, including nonbargaining unit employees at Huntsville, received all wage increases due pursuant to the established wage policies.

Respondent argues that employers are in peril, no matter what they do, because the risks are too great during union campaigns. Here, the risks emerged in January, but were assumed when the 1 April quarterly merit wage increase was implemented just prior to the first election of 2 April. The risks apparently only became perilous to this Respondent after the 11 June election won by the Union. Indeed, Respondent contends that the peril ceased to exist with the Board's Order setting aside the second election and directing a third election on 10 April 1987, and therefore on 13 April 1987 the aborted wage programs were once again reinstituted. Somewhat contrariwise, Respondent also contends that its cessation of the wage programs was its way of maintaining the status quo. Clearly, the status quo is evidenced by the wage increases granted to the Athens plant employees and the nonbargaining unit employees of the Huntsville plant, not the withholding of wage increases for selected employees. Although the Board recognizes that employers can freely give benefits to unrepresented employees while negotiating wages with the representative of other employees, the key is the established bargaining obligation of the employer. Here no such obligation is establshied, but rather, employees supporting the Union still are faced with an election of their chosen representative. That is to say, here, the employees' vote is still subject to influence by Respondent's wage policies policies that Respondent wants to control, as if by a valve, and turn on or off depending on the outcome of an election.

Additionally, Respondent argues that the absence of any evidence that it used the withholding of the wage increases to undermine employee support for the Union or made comments implying that the Union or the employees' selection of the Union was the cause of the withholding, preclude any finding of discrimination. As further support for its argument, Respondent emphasizes the testimony of Martin that the decisions to withhold the wage increases were not based on a desire to punish or discriminate against employees for selecting the Union as their collective-bargaining representative. But, admittedly, the wage increases were withheld because of the pending representation case and only after the employees selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

In my view, it is impossible to separate the effects of Respondent's wage policy conduct on the employees from the conduct itself. The merit wage and annual wage practices were well established. All employees knew to expect five wage increases during any given year. Without any explanation for the cessation, bargaining unit employees would clearly attribute the loss of wages to the successful union campaign, just as the nonbargaining unit employees would attribute their continuing wage increases to the lack of unionization. Thus, by its silepce, Respondent has squarely placed the onus for no wage increases on the union activity of its employees. A reasonably prudent employer would have foreseen that such a sterile cessation of past wage practices for bargaining unit employees would be viewed by those employees as punishment for past union activities and as a warning for the future exercise of Section 7 rights in subsequent elections. Although I cannot discredit Martin's self-serving testimony of the nonbasis for the decisions to withhold the several wage increases, I can, and do, conclude and find that the foreseeable effect of the decisions to withhold wages outweigh the probative value of Martin's statement. In the least, a cancellation of expected wage increases is obviously susceptible of being understood by bargaining unit employees as interference with their union organizational rights. The legislative mandate prohibits interference, whether intentional or not, and whether pursuant to bona fide competent advice of an expert. Advice of counsel therefore is not a defense to conduct found unlawful because of the coercive effect on employees. I therefore find that Respondent has unlawfully interfered with its employees' Section 7 rights and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. I further conclude and find that Respondent, by failing to continue to apply its established wage increase practices to bargaining unit employees and by failing to grant wage increases pursuant to those practices to employees who would otherwise have received them, but for their selection of the union as their bargaining representative, is sufficient to support the inference that the employees' protected activity was a motivating factor in Respondent's decision. Respondent's unlawful motive is further evidenced by the preferential treatment accorded the unrepresented employees who received without interruption all the wage increases pursuant to Respondent's wage policies. Such disparity tends to discourage employees' exercise of their Section 7 rights. The General Counsel has clearly established a prima facie case of discrimination under the Board's decision in Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). Just as clearly, Respondent would not have taken the same action in the absence of the protected union activity of its employees. Accordingly, I find that Respondent, by withholding the wage increases from its bargaining unit employees while granting the wage increases to its unrepresented employees, has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

My conclusions and findings are further supported by the fact that the reinstatement of the withheld wages was precipitated by the Board Order nullifying the election won by the Union and directing a third election.

Conclusions of Law

1. By canceling scheduled wage increases for bargaining unit employees during a union organizational campaign, Respondent has interfered with employees' exercise of Section 7 rights in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. By failing to give wage increases to bargaining unit employees because they selected a union as their bargaining representative, while granting the wage increase to its unrepresented employees, Respondent has discriminated against its represented employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

3. The unfair labor practices described above have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tends to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The Remedy

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.[4]

[4] The General Counsel moved for a remedial order containing a visitatorial provision authorizing "discovery," if necessary, to monitor compliance with the Board's Order. The need for such an order is not demonstrated and I therefore deny the General Counsel's motion.

Having discriminatorily denied wage increases to its bargaining unit employees of its Huntsville Division, Respondent must make evaluations of those employees for 1 July and 1 October 1986 and 1 January and 1 April 1987, and grant increases in accord with its merit wage increase policy. Also, quarterly interest on the merit wage increases shall be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950); and New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[5]

In addition, Respondent must grant to its bargaining unit employees the same annual wage increases given to nonrepresented employees in August 1986, less the amounts received in April through August 1987, with interest, computed in the manner prescribed above.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[6]

ORDER

The Respondent, Martin Industries, Inc., Huntsville Division, Huntsville, Alabama, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Canceling scheduled wage increases for bargaining unit employees of the Huntsville Division during any union organizational drive.

(b) Discriminating against its bargaining unit employees of the Huntsville Division by withholding wage increases because they selected a union as their bargaining representative.

(c) In any like or relate manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Evaluate bargaining unit employees of the Huntsville Division in accord with its merit wage policy for the quarters beginning 1 July and 1 October 1986 and 1 January and 1 April 1987, and grant wage increases for those quarters to all eligible bargaining unit employees with interest as outlined in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Grant the same general wage increase to bargaining unit employees of the Huntsville Division as it granted to nonrepresented employees in August 1986, less those amounts previously received in April through August 1987, with interest as outlined in the remedy section of this decision.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its offices in Huntsville, Alabama, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[7] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 10, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[5] Interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[6] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[7] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

> To organize
>
> To form, join, or assist any union
>
> To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
>
> To act together for other mutual aid or protection
> To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT cancel scheduled wage increases for our bargaining unit employees at the Huntsville Division during any union organizational drive.

WE WILL NOT discriminate against our bargaining unit employees of the Huntsville Division by withholding wage increases from them because they selected a union as their bargaining representative.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole all bargaining unit employees at the Huntsville Division for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from our discrimination against them, plus interest.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On May 18, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Boyce issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs [2] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Southern California Developmental Health Services, Inc., Camarillo, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Mori Pam Rubin, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Gary Gill, Executive Director and Kathi Mottaz, of Camarillo, California, for the Respondent.

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

The Respondent's sole exception is to the judge's finding that the Board has jurisdiction in this matter. The Respondent asserts that it was not the operator of the instant health care institution but merely managed it for the operator, so that the jurisdictional standard of $500,000 for retail enterprises should apply rather than the $250,000 standard for health care institutions as defined in Sec. 2(14) of the Act. The Respondent, however, stipulated to facts that indicate it was, during the relevant period of time, the Employer in this matter. Furthermore, the judge credited testimony that showed the Respondent acted as the employer and operator of this health care institution.

Accordingly, we find that the admission in the uncontroverted stipulation remains binding, and that the judge's assertion of jurisdiction is proper. Milford Manor, 233 NLRB 1283 at fn. 1 (1977); see also Resident Home for the Mentally Retarded of Hamilton County, 239 NLRB 3, 6 (1978).

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD J. BOYCE, Administrative Law Judge. This consolidated matter was tried in Los Angeles, California, January 11 and 12, 1988. The complaint, based on charges filed by Teamsters Union Local No. 186, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO (the Union), alleges that Southern California Developmental Health Services, Inc. (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by discharging Lesi Crowel, Brenda McMillian, Bruce Pickrell, and Gwenndolynn Thompson on February 22, 1987; by discharging Vincente Woodward on February 23, 1987; and by discharging Benjamin Long on March 4, 1987.[1]

The complaint alleges that Respondent further violated Section 8(a)(1) on February 16, 1987, when Facility Administrator Jean Turnage "impliedly threatened an employee with loss of employment because of that employee's union activity"; and on February 24, 1987, when Executive Director Gary Gill "promised an employee increased benefits if he refrained from supporting the Union."
